

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. THE KNICKERBOCKER MAGAZINE.

EDITED BY LEWIS GAYLORD CLARK.

This is pronounced, by the press of America and England, "the best Magazine in America." It has now begun its thirty-fourth volume, and in its list of upward of a hundred contributors, are found the names of every distinguished writer, male and female, in America, with several equally prominent of Great Britain, Turkey, Sweden, etc. A new volume, containing a superb engraving, a portrait of the editor, engraved by Cheney, from a painting by Elliott, was commenced on the first day of July, 1849. The following notices of the Knickerbocker are from the American and English press, to which might be added hundreds of others.

"The last Knickerbocker is exceedingly good. Some of the articles are worthy of Blackwood's palmiest days. The Editor's Table is in Mr. Clark's happiest vein; varied and racy in a remarkable degree."—New York Commercial Advertiser.

"The Knickerbocker seems to increase in attraction as it advances in age. It exhibits a monthly variety of contributions unsurpassed in number or ability."—National Intelligencer.

"The Knickerbocker is one of the most valuable Magazines of the day, and outstrips all competition in the higher walks of literature."—Albany Argus.

"The Knickerbocker Magazine is now beyond a question the magazine of the country. Whoever wishes his money's worth, and something over, let him subscribe now to 'Old Knick,' and our word for it, the Editor's Table alone will amply satisfy his expectations. It is not a periodical to be lightly glanced over and thrown by, but it forms a library book to save and re-read. A set of the Knickerbocker, bound up in volumes, on the shelves of one of our popular libraries, is more consulted (so the librarian has often told us) than any other similar work."—Boston Daily Transcript.

The London Examiner.—"This very clever Magazine is the pleasantest periodical in the United States. Its articles, which are numerous and short, various and interesting, are well worthy of imitation by our Magazines on this side of the Atlantic."

London Morning Chronicle.—"Judging from the numbers before us, we are inclined to consider this the best of all the American literary periodicals. Its contents are highly interesting, instructive and amusing."

REDUCTION IN PRICE TO CLUBS.

The publisher has determined to do every thing in his power to bring the Knickerbocker within the means of all, and invites the attention of those who feel an interest in circulating the best American literature, to the following terms to clubs, viz:

|--|---------|
| For five copies sent to one address, the price will be | $20 00 |
| " ten " " " " " | 35 00 |
| " twenty " " " " " | 60 00 |

Post Masters throughout the United States are invited and requested to act as agents. To all those who may interest themselves in getting up clubs, we will send a copy free so long as they keep up, and remit regularly the yearly payment.

To the Subscribers and all interested in our Work.

The publisher desires to avail himself of this opportunity to thank those who have manifested their unabated interest in the Knickerbocker, by sending subscribers. Quite a number have done so, and no doubt with a very slight effort on the part of some friends, our list might be doubled. As a further inducement for this effort on the part of our patrons, we wish to say, that no pains of expense will be spared to enhance the value of the work, and our pages will prove that our readers will receive at least as large a share of benefit from our increased means as we could expect ourselves.

AGENTS WANTED FOR THE KNICKERBOCKER MAGAZINE.

Enterprising, active agents are wanted in every town and city in the United States, to procure subscribers for the Knickerbocker. To competent, active persons, with satisfactory references, the most liberal terms will be allowed. Apply, post paid, to SAMUEL HUESTON, 139 Nassau-street,

MAGYAR AND CROAT.

The past year, which has just closed its iron door for ever, has been full of solemn warnings. The God of Nations has caused the sun of prosperity to shine with unwonted splendor upon this continent, whilst dark night has fallen upon the most parts of the Old World. Ours has been the triumph of the sword and the victory of the weak; powerful and honored abroad, prosperous and happy at home—who would not be grateful for such blessings? But fearful and sad has been the fate of our transatlantic brethren; thrones have been overturned and kings banished from their land; nations have risen in arms to fight against their own kindred and the voice of liberty has been drowned in the cries of murdered patriots.

There is in fact no epoch in modern history, when Europe has been so universally, so deeply agitated. Neither the bloody times of religious persecution during the thirteenth, nor the unintermitted wars of the seventeenth, nor even the period of awful commotion at the end of the eighteenth century, can show us any year so full of sudden revolutions and thorough changes as the year 1848. From all sides and at every instant do we see the political stage invaded by new actors, so unexpectedly appearing and so little known before, that we have hardly time to examine their characters and trace their origin to centuries long past, when a new race appears and claims its part in the great drama.

That the French Revolution has produced this great European movement, is only in some respects true. For the revolution of last February was not a political movement; it was not brought about by a party, or the people, nor foreseen by those who profited by it, much less by those who were its victims. It was, as all the world now knows, nothing less than a social revolution, full of bloodshed, meanness and sadness. Still it has its providential end, which will characterize its history, when the smallness of means, the multiplicity of agents, the miseries of detail, will disappear in the distance, leaving nothing on its mad canvass but great world-moving events, or nothing less than the establishment of a Republic in France was necessary to rouse formal, palsied Germany, to give new hopes to Poland, to overthrow the proud mediæval house of Habsburg and to break the chain that rivetted Italy to its eternal oppressor.

Paris was, as usual, the spark that set fire to all the combustible material of the Continent. The flame spread rapidly and the proportions of the gigantic conflagration are hardly yet determined. Far from it; but ideas, institutions and men begin, at least here and there, to appear in the dark mêlée: tendencies are showing themselves and taking form, plans for the future are marked out and cognate elements combine for common purposes. We begin to see the two great principles now agitating the Continent of Europe: the desire of forming new political institutions and the resurrection of the nationality of ancient races.

The latter, a movement only about sixteen years old, is by far the most important and the most interesting; it has already overthrown an ancient dynasty and broken up Empires of a thousand years' standing; thanks to it, Germany is no longer German, Hungary no longer Hunnish, and Greece no longer Greek. By its magic touch there rises in the very centre of Germany a Bohemian nation, counting millions, speaking a new language and claiming its own time-honored institutions! In the land of the proud Magyar, five millions of Croats suddenly shake off their fetters, invoke the memory of their ancestors, who fell defending their hearths and their faith against the legions of Trajan, and send an army to enter triumphantly the old Imperial city! Moravia all at once remembers its Slavonic origin and joins the great League into which even Silesia, that richest province of poor Prussia, is anxious to be admitted. All clamor, all fight for the restoration of their nationality, but all at the same time claim greater liberty and perfect independence. For it is the people, the so-called low people, who alone had preserved the national tongue of their forefathers. Now, of a sudden, nobles and scholars, high and learned men, remember their long-forgotten mother tongue, seek for its purer forms in distant centuries, free it from the rust of ages and wield the polished weapon from the professor's desk and the preacher's pulpit, in the salon and the Parliamentary Hall, in behalf of their great and noble cause. Tired of being French, or German, or Magyar, been less fortunate than even the smallest of European races—for never during that long series of centuries, and amidst all the overthrows and changes of which their country has ever been the theatre, had they found the hour or the place to recover their independence as a people. And yet, in spite of Macedonia and Rome, their first but not successful enemies, in spite of the Bulgarians who imposed their own name upon a part of their native land, in spite of the Turks, who for centuries have occupied the larger portion of their country—in spite even of the Magyar and the Austrian who reign over the rest, they had remained uncorrupted and undismayed amid all the vicissitudes of time. The cry of nationality had been heard far away in their vast steppes and found an echo in their hearts, warmly attached to the memory of their forefathers and full of ardent love of independence. They had shaken off the yoke of the Magyar: a handful of men, they had risen against millions of a proud and warlike race that had ruled them since time immemorial, and now they had come to claim the assistance of their brother Slaves. For Slaves they had ever been, and Slaves they were yet with heart and soul. But the Magyar hated them, for he was their conqueror—and the Teuton hates the Slave.

And with this hatred they had lived for a thousand years, conqueror and conquered in the same land, yet ever separated by all the external signs which perpetuate the remembrance of the victory of one and the defeat of the other race:—the Magyar, always on horseback, always in arms, proudly displaying the insignia of command and showing himself master of the soil; at his side the not less proud Croat, cultivating under the rude dominion of foreign masters fields whose harvest would not be his, covered with miserable sheepskins, chained to the glebe, with no traditions but slavery and no legal existence but in the words of his lord: plebs misera, gens contribucus aut potius nulla!

But now the Croat's ancient nationality was reuscitated; a long forgotten people they reappeared on the stage and claimed their place among the nations of the earth and their vote in the affairs of Europe.

With the modesty of true pride they spoke not of the days of ancient Rome when their fathers owned all the rich lands from Drave to Danube, from the foot of the Alps to where now stands the city of Belgrad and where the mighty river suddenly turns its course towards the East. They disdained to quote their own historians who, carried away by their pride and patriotism, count the imperial Assyrian and the illustrious Trojan among the ancestors of their race; they disdained even to say with the unlettered of their own brethren in fierce simplicity, "we are Romans." They were content to be Slaves.

And Slaves the Croats are, even the first born of the Slavonic race; for their traditions say that when Rome's Proconsuls made the yoke of the Eternal City unbearable, ancient Illyria (of which the Croatia of our day formed part) sent three armies out under the command of three brothers. Tchech, Leck and Russ were their names and three great kingdoms they founded: Bohemia, Poland and Russia. But the vast steppes of Illyria were a sad inheritance; they were the gigantic high roads on which tribe after tribe, nation after nation, poured down from the mysterious East upon the fertile lands of Middle Europe. They came by hundreds of thousands, they came by millions, and the poor Sclavonians bowed their head like the pliant reed before the storm and rose again after it had passed. Six times had they seen fierce and savage hordes pass through their land towards the West, never to return, when there came a still fiercer horde and a more savage tribe from the distant Ural mountains. They were brothers of those Huns who, under Attila, had filled Western Europe with horror and carnage—the last on the native soil of the Croat, but invincible warriors and a powerful nation. Millions followed each other in vast armies during the whole of the ninth century, fearful enemies, striking terror into their foes by their countless numbers and strange tactics, until finally they found themselves lords of the soil and gave to their new conquest its Latin name Hungaria. But Magyar was the name by which they were then known to their brethren and Magyar they are still in their features, language and manners. Brave and intelligent, they hide under the calm and reflective physiognomy of an Oriental nation, a passionate heart and an enthusiastic spirit.

Germany gave them civilization and the blessings of the Christian faith,—their great king, St. Stephen, a constitution breathing liberty and equality, and the race became a mighty and renowned nation. The whole of Illyria owned their allegiance, and Hungary was already one of the powers of the earth, when their king Mathias entered Vienna and was crowned Emperor of Germany. Still they retained their laws from the times of St. Stephen and preserved them nobly through all the invasions of Tartars, the conquests of Turks and even the wars with great Austria; for those institutions were based upon that only solid foundation of all legislation, national genius, which it were well for the European nations of our day not so entirely to abandon for the sake of mere theoretical liberty or fantastic notions of nationality.

* About the year 1000.

Admirable as these laws and institutions were, they still bore from the beginning the germ of their final destruction in them; their leading principle being that the only means of governing the strange diversity of subjugated populations by the few and the strong, was the paramount strength of the royal power. This principle was handed down as a government-tradition to all the successors of St. Stephen. Besides, the Magyars gave laws only for themselves, the conquering nation; they only were thus organized, remaining forever a victorious army in the land of those who have ever been nothing more than plebs contribuens. They were all of them nobles and warriors, owning the land by the right of their sword and holding it under the title of a military fief. Hence their barbarous latin term Insurrection for the military service that every Magyar is obliged to render for his fief, hence also the Magyar word Hussar for the soldier, whom every twenty had to send mounted into the field.

Thus they prospered and became more powerful abroad and more tyrannical at home, extorting from their weakened monarchs greater liberties and higher privileges—but always for the Magyar alone; the Croat, the German, the Roumain or Walachian remained still plebs nulla. Their period of greatness and success was however rapidly drawing to an end. The Turk, their fearful neighbor, had grown bolder and more and more dangerous, until the Crescent threatened once more to banish Christianity from Europe. Army after army was poured into the fertile valley of the Danube, and fortress after fortress fell into the hands of the Infidel. And a strange king was the king of the Magyar, whom Providence called upon to resist Soliman the Magnificent, the conqueror of Rhodus. Nature had marked him for a strange fate, for, born before his time, he was a bearded youth in his fourteenth, and a gray headed man in his eighteenth year. Betrothed even before he was born and crowned when two years old, he ascended the throne at ten, was married at fifteen and died at twenty. What a master for the proudest nobility of Europe! What an adversary for the first general of his age! Three hundred thousand Turks invaded the land of the Magyar, and at the fearful battle of Mohacz fell forever the national life and independence of Hungary; a part of the beautiful country was made a Turkish province, the remainder passed under the dominion of Austria, and Hungary, after a race of unparalleled brilliancy and after a most heroic and romantic resistance takes foreign masters and is buried in the history and the monarchy of Austria.

A sad fate has been the fate of the Magyar

under Austrian rule! Bloody are the pages of his history during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, for fearful is the struggle between the proud freeman and the cunning oppressor. The accounts of their rebellion form the most lamentable history of any nation, and such were the effects of their stubborn resistance and the licentiousness and cruelty of the Imperial armies, that at one time human flesh was publicly sold in the land of the noblest race of Europe!

The skillful policy and the patient genius of the Austrian sovereigns were directed towards a complete change of their constitution; an absolute monarchy was to be established and the language, the customs and the laws of the Magyar were gradually suppressed. Their pride was broken, and never was a race prouder of their tongue and more jealous of their liberty. Even the Magyar of our day shows it yet in every word, in every action. His tall, muscular stature is that of the man given from early childhood to rude bodily exercise; the fierce, piercing look speaks of unyielding pride, and his costume, the brilliant "dolman" of the Hussar, richly embroidered in gold and pearls and but partly covered by the "Attila" tunic of black velvet, reminds him constantly, in form and name, of his lofty descent. The noble Magyar—and every Magyar is noble—never appears without his large curved sabre, trailing on the ground, and whilst elsewhere the Halls of Legislature are closed to the armed man, the Magyar enters them boldly, his left hand on his sword and his brethren say: He had his arms and he has voted; his vote then was a free vote! The Magyar loves his language, and a beautiful, sonorous language it is, by its natural loftiness and majesty of expression well fitted for a people of warriors and orators, and the very fact that it is an idiom separated from all other known tongues in the world, a language "without a mother or sisters," but adds to its peculiar charms. That the Magyar is often carried away by his national pride, and in solemn earnest assures us that his Lords are more noble than all the kings of the earth, that some of them trace their descent through Attila up to Noah, or that St. Stephen is the first saint in Heaven, and that the Revelation was given to the world in the language spoken in Heaven, in Magyar, is a failing also of other nations of Europe and may well be pardoned in a people sighing under a foreign yoke and delighting in dreams of former greatness.

For dreams were all the Austrian left him from the times of the chivalrous Ferdinand, whom he called in to his aid and made his king, to save him from the Infidels, to the days of fallen Metternich. Not that there was a tyrannical disposition in the monarchs of Austria, or a national hated against the Magyar, but the Habsburgs had ever turned their eyes only to the Occident, and their ambition had always been to retain for Austria her rank as a Western power. All interests and exigencies, not subservient to this their great aim, were set aside and overcome. Thus the immense Empire gradually crystallized around the small hereditary provinces in Germany; Italian, Bohemian, and Slave were equally sacrificed to these German tendencies, and the whole policy of Austria reduced itself to her resistance of all development of constitutional rights at home and the claims of nationality abroad.

Prompted by such motives, she deprived the Magyars, one by one, of their high privileges, regardless of all the solemn promises made by every Emperor before his election as king of Hungary and in spite of the humble prayers and urgent remonstrances of the oppressed race. A German Governor took the place of their self-chosen Palatin, military and civil offices were given to strangers, foreign troops were sent into their land and quartered on nobleman and priest, and even their faith, that of Calvin, was not spared by their catholic masters.

And still the Magyars, fretting and sighing under the hard yoke, were a noble and a loyal race; for when the great Frederick drove Maria Theresa from all her hereditary states, Hungary became the asylum of the fugitive Empress, who, the royal infant in her arms, appeared in the midst of the assembled nobles to implore their assistance for their king. And they drew their swords and crowding round their august guest they cried: Moriamur pro rege nostro! Their devotion and their bravery saved the Austrian monarchy and they were told that the slave who had saved his master's life was free!

But soon both their loyalty and their services were forgotten, when Joseph II. sacrificed all that was left of freedom and independence in the hand of the Magyar to his fanciful plans of making Austria one great homogeneous monarchy. The kingdom was treated like a conquered province, royal commissaries exercised unlimited powers, the last privileges were taken from cities and communities and a simple imperial edict abolished with one stroke all the rights and immunities of the Magyar nobles! The administration of justice was reorganized after German models, the Magyar language was prohibited and the German imposed as the tongue of him who thus conquered Hungary in times of undisturbed peace. The Magyars trembled with indignation at such unmerited insult, but before they could rise to avenge their grievously offended race, Joseph, unhappy, sick and doubting himself, signed, with trembling hand, a decree abolishing all his reforms in Hungary. He signed it, strangely enough, in Magyar, the very language he had proscribed, but the decree, far from being an avowal of his wrongs, was merely an act of extreme weakness.

Soon after this fatal acknowledgment of his error, which only increased the discontent prevailing in Hungary, the French revolution broke out and its disastrous consequences threatened once more the very existence of the House of Austria; and once more did the Magyars show their loyalty and gallantry; they granted willingly and joyfully horses, money and men, all that was asked, begging in return only that their children might be allowed to fight under their own officers. Nobly, most nobly, did the brave Husars fight and again the Magyar helped to save the Austrian Empire. But not Republics alone are ungrateful. Never was country worse rewarded than Hungary, for all the sacrifices she had made for the cause of Europe and of Austria. The moment her treasures and armies were no longer needed, her services were forgotten and only her former resistance remembered. Again were Imperial Commissaries sent to govern the kingdom, again was the Magyar language proscribed, their national Diet abolished and their most sacred rights disregarded. How their proud, independent spirit could so long brook such injustice and tyranny would be almost inexplicable but for the skill, firmness and conciliatory spirit of the Viceroy or Palatin Joseph, one of the Austrian Archdukes, and the immense superiority of Austria as one of the Great Powers of Europe.

But the patience of the Magyars was at last exhausted; their national pride, so long suppressed, at last awoke and after aspiring for centuries with a noble ambition to the liberty they had enjoyed in days long gone by, they broke the chains with which force and cunning, unsurpassed in modern times, had so long fettered them. They now showed that they had not in vain obtained the name of the Englishmen of the East. Their Magnates, members of the higher nobility and rarely seen without their retinue of several hundred men, or maintaining, like the Esterhazy, whole regiments at their own expense, formed an Upper Chamber, closely resembling the House of Lords, whilst their Elective Chamber was in every respect a faithful copy of the Lower House of England. Nor was the division of the kingdom into counties wanting; with their system of representation and independent administration; they had their clubs under the name of casinos, the large balconies of their massive houses were their hustings and public banquets gave ample opportunity for political oratory. Their Magnates followed the example of their English brethren even in the pride they took in placing themselves at the head of every political movement, pretending to be or being really ready to sacrifice their own privileges whenever the good of the Commonwealth should require it; and the younger sons would serve as secretaries in the Diet, or during vacations, canvass the country and thus enter the Lower House.

When therefore the opportunity came, they were not found unprepared and wanting, as their German brethren, in political education, whilst the resuscitation of their national feelings raised their patriotism to the height of almost sacred enthusiasm. Their scholars had studied the history of their race and taught it in lecture-room and public square, to the surprise and admiration of their fellow-citizens; eloquent patriots had inspired the people with the glorious deeds of their ancestors and the consciousness of their own rights and the name of Magyar had become once more an honor among them.

These were the days when the wave of revolutions, passing over the continent, reached Vienna and roused it from its apparently happy slumbers. But to the surprise of all Europe, it was here that the most fearful explosions followed each other in most rapid succession. One day saw the work of centuries fall to pieces and the father of European politics, Prince Metternich, a fugitive and an exile. Another day and the liberal cabinet of Ficquelmont fell with equal rapidity and disgrace; a third revolution drove the weak Emperor himself out of "his beloved city." A Diet, elected by universal suffrage, as a constituent body, took the affairs of the country in their hands and soon after, following the example of the Parliament of St. Paul, enacted executive measures.

The revolution of Vienna was, however, the first of those movements which were not so much undertaken for the sake of political reforms, but manifested the characteristic of the revolutions of 1848, by demanding political emancipation only for the sake of the final independence of the different nationalities. Magyar-students, it is said, had been the leaders of this revolution, and at the first news of their success, the second Chamber of Hungary, with the concurrence of the Upper House, sent an address to the Emperor, demanding a Magyar-Cabinet, responsible to their own Diet, a national guard and universal representation, without distinction of rank or property. One thousand Magyar noblemen in their brilliant national costume ascended the Danube and presented this petition to the Emperor. It was granted, for at that moment there was on the whole continent no government that could have refused.

The latin "Hungary" was abolished, and with the deliverance from the German yoke, the "Magyar Orszag" (the kingdom of the Magyar), apparently reduced to decrepitude, rose young and strong, inspired by ardent love of liberty, to take once more its place among the kingdoms of Europe. At the head of the movement, and now the soul and the director of the new government, was a man who, like his race, had even in servitude cherished lofty aspirations, and in silence prepared himself for the great work carved out for him by History. Not more than twelve years ago Kossuth was a poor attorney in the employment of several deputies, when some magnates of the liberal party discovered his superior talents and untiring activity. At their instigation he undertook to publish a journal, containing reports of the Sessions of their Diet, which, to avoid the severe laws against the printing of such documents, were lithographed and thus sent to every county in the kingdom. The bold and daring enterprise met with unexpected success, but the Austrian government, justly afraid of its influence on a nation like the Magyar, found means to have the journal confiscated. Nothing daunted, Kossuth continued it by employing a number of copyists and sending it out in written copies! After the adjournment of the National Diet he travelled through the country to see with his own eyes and teach with his own lips; but he was soon arrested for one of his public speeches, kept in prison for nearly three years without ever being brought before a judge and almost accidentally liberated by a general amnesty. Having thus become a martyr of the popular cause he soon found himself in the Lower House and at the head of the opposition. Thus qualified by slow and gradual, but thorough political education, he rose with his country and when Hungary in March, threw off the yoke of the German Kossuth, by the will of the people, seized the supreme power and displayed an energy and wisdom, fully equal to the emergency and his lofty position. His eloquence, by friend and foe spoken of with admiration, and his ardent, unsuspected patriotism won him the hearts of his countrymen, and, by birth, education and character, the true representative of the Magyar race he soon rose to such power that, to apply the fatal test of our day, he could issue two hundred millions of florins in paper money and see the Diet, unasked, impose capital punishment on all who would obey the Emperor's decree and refuse to take these notes!

But, strange fate! hardly had Hungary freed herself from Austria and begun to prepare for the struggle with that power, when an enemy arose within her own limits, small in number weak in appearance, and strong only in the same feeling that nerved the Magyar, in ardent patriotism. The cry of nationality had found an echo even in the farthest parts of Europe, and penetrated to the most remote branches of the Slavonic family. And when Hungary was Hungary no longer, but once more the Land of the Magyar, there rose the children of the soil and asked: What have we in common with the Hun? adding in their barbarous Latin, notamus magyari-ari! Should the Magyar be allowed to appropriate to himself the harvest he had sown with the aid of other nations, and which all had labored to ripen? Should he, without drawing his sword, be allowed to claim alone the fruits of long peace, as if the Croat had not fought by his side with equal bravery against the Mongol, the Tartar and the Turk? They pleaded, not without justice, that they had never been serfs of the Magyar but an "annexed" kingdom with their own Diet and independent administration and bearing to Hungary the same relation that Hungary bore to Austria, that of regnum in regno. We have always, they said, complained of the tyranny of our stronger brother, the Magyar, even when we yet obeyed a common master, but what will become of us when, deprived of the protection of our father, we shall be left to his unrestrained rule? Let the Magyar resuscitate his own race, reassume his language and enjoy once more his national independence, but let him not deprive us of the same rights he is so eagerly claiming for himself!

It is certainly strange that the Magyar, then whom there is none more anxious for liberty and proud of independence, should attempt to impose the same yoke on the Croat which he bore so impatiently, and while he resists to his utmost the attempts of Austria to recover her rebellious province, speak of Croatia as trying under favor of the general revolutionary crisis to rise with impunity against the Hungarian Monarchy! The Magyars—for Hungarians there are no longer—have but one excuse: they pretend that Croatia dreams of the famous Pan Slavism and is anxious to aid in establishing the gigantic Slave Empire to which we have referred. Proud of having once saved European Christianity from the Moslems they now are prouder still of what they believe their lofty and providential destination: to be a bulwark against the encroaching influence of Pan Slavism. They delight in the thought that Russia will march her forty millions of Slaves against them, for their gallantry is one that is flattered by the power of their enemy, and, firmly believing that the triumph of Magyarism would be the triumph of reason, intelligence and liberty, they hesitate not to oppose themselves, a race of a few millions and without any affinity to other nations of the earth, to an Empire than which, since the times of Rome, Europe has known none more powerful and more gigantic.

In June the struggle began and war was declared between Magyar and Slave. The last attempt on the part of Austria to conciliate those whom she was then still disposed to call her subjects failed; the proud Magyar refused to yield in anything to the demands of the Slavonians, and the Croats, following the example of the races around them, were determined to recover their nationality or to die in the attempt. When the crisis really came the courtiers and politicians of Vienna were not slow in seeing the advantage they might derive from it for their own cause. It was then that they first gave up the West and turned their eyes to the East, to the Slavonic race; applying the old maxim of divide et impera they declared the Magyars "rebellious republicans" and sanctioned the attempt of the Croats the more readily as they found at their head a loyal subject and a highly distinguished officer of the army. Baron Joseph de Jellachich, a Slave by birth, had manifested from early youth a warm sympathy for the interests of his oppressed brethren, and when his signal services in Italy were to be rewarded he claimed as his only favor a place among his fellow Croats. This was granted and he lived for years as one of the Colonels commanding on the armed frontier (against Turkey) in their midst, honored and loved as a father. It is here that by his paternal care, his rational endeavors to enlighten his race and improve their condition, and by his personal kindness, he gained that popularity which afterwards made him in all but name the sovereign of a great people. He spoke to them in their own language, the forbidden Illyrian, for, said he, "it is the tongue my mother spoke and I am proud of being able to speak it and to speak it to you!" He lived with them and fought with them; standing alone in the world, they were his only friends and his children.

And when they rose to shake off the yoke of Magyar laws and Magyar language, they held a great Diet in their city of Agram, and, appealing to all the members of their large and powerful family, they declared themselves, after a thousand years' oppression, once more a free and independent nation. Their poet, Gaj, had prepared their minds by his erudite works on their language and history, and this race of shepherds and slaves who but ten years before were without schools and written laws, now, as by magic, and under the inspiration of highly-wrought patriotism, produced philologists, scholars, poets and publicists, and an irresistible enthusiasm filled the minds of all with visions of the future greatness of a noble race. Not disdaining to learn even from their enemies they followed the example of the haughty Magyar in every measure calculated to raise and strengthen this feeling, and perhaps more fortunate even than their foes they elected Jellachich their Ban and Sovereign. It was in the large palace of the Congregation, as their Parliament is called, that their wise elders and the Greek and Catholic bishops, in their gorgeous robes, were seated on one of three oblong tables, raised on a low platform, whilst the other two were occupied by the members at large, surrounded by a graceful balustrade, below which stood the literati or young men who had passed the necessary examinations, all admitted to witness the meeting, but to vote only when of noble birth. Their picturesque costume was much enhanced by the richly ornamented arms with which every member was amply provided, and their whole bearing presented a strange but attractive mixture of the Orient and the West. Long were their debates and stormy, and many an eye flashed with anger and spoke of future bloodshed; many a sword was half-drawn, and the storm under which the impassionate Assembly moved to and fro, seemed about to break out with perfect fury, when one of the white-haired bishops rose and with a low, trembling voice spoke a few words in Illyrian, of which the foreigner would have understood but the last, the name of Jellachich. Zivio! Zivio! was heard from old and young, from priest and nobleman, and shouts interminable rent the air, and from the midst of the Peers there rose a man of small, slender stature, and his clear commanding eye, in calm, firm steadiness, wandered from face to face. An instant, all were quiet as if awed by his glance, but then broke forth such bursts of applause and enthusiasm, as only the Orient knows to conjure up. He moved not; not a feature changed. It was not pride—much less indifference: he felt the ovation and when he began to speak, his voice was thick as with deep emotion. Few were his words and mild his speech, but it was the gentle evening-breeze that fans the flames till they rise to the very heavens.

That day Jellachich was elected Ban of Croatia, and representatives came from distant regions—from Serbia, Illyria, and even from the northern Slavonic provinces, and hailed their great chief. Bishops of the two great churches officiated, with all the pomp of the East, at his solemn installation, and from Vienna came the news that the Ban had been appointed the Emperor's Lieutenant for Hungary! Thus he who but a year before had been a poor Colonel in a far-off province, found himself suddenly sovereign of an independent kingdom and commander-in-chief of all the Austrian troops and fortresses in Hungary. He hesitated not to declare himself openly in favor of the Emperor's cause, a faithful subject of the House of Habsburg and an enemy of all the enemies of Austria, but above all, of the revolutionary Magyars. What he demanded was a One United Austria, giving equal rights to all nationalities which form part of the great monarchy. The different races were to be represented in a common Parliament at Vienna, where, of course, the Slavonic races would, owing to their numerical strength, have an overwhelming majority. In fact, therefore, Austria would cease to be German, and by a constitutional majority become Slavonic.

This the Ban calls the good cause of Austria, and with this war-cry a powerful army left Croatia, crossed the Drave, and unfolding the imperial banner, summoned the Magyar fortress Essegg to surrender to those who came "under the venerated authority of the Emperor, their father." Thus opened the war between Magyar and Croat and Magyar and Austrian, a fearful civil war, with all the horrors to be expected from the hatred of races, the fury of serfs but recently franchised, from political and religious fanaticism, and the ferocity of semi-barbarous populations.

The Magyars seem to be fully aware of their dangerous position; suspected by Germany, hated by the Slaves, isolated among the nations of the earth, they were left alone, as they say, to resist this conspiracy of monarchs and races against them. In Vienna they were ungratefully denounced as an undisciplined and rebellious nation; in the North armed bands of Slaves from Bohemia and Moravia tried to join their Southern brethren in Croatia where Jellachich had already attacked them with a powerful army, and in the East Russia threatened with her two hundred thousand men in arms, ready to crush every movement in favor of republicanism. If Heaven itself surveys with pleasure a brave heart struggling with the storms of fate, what a glorious sight must not a nation be, struggling for the sacred cause of liberty against nearly all Europe!

When the news of Jellachich's invasion reached Pesth, Kossuth caused himself to be carried, sick and suffering, to the Diet; supported by two men, pale and exhausted, he made, as he then thought, his last appeal to the Assembly.—He spoke words of fire, now appealing to the sacred memory of their ancient forefathers, now showing how their cause was the cause of liberty for all Europe; he electrified the Assembly, and raised the energetic patriotism of the excitable Magyar to a fanaticism that centuries will not be able to allay again. The scene was one of unsurpassed grandeur, such as the annals of history have but rarely to record. Borne on the shoulders of some of his friends, he then went to the fortifications, where the Deputies themselves, spade in hand, repaired the walls of the city, or broke up the pavement to raise barricades, while the women on the flat roofs of their houses heated pitch and oil to receive the invading enemy. The Parliament in the meantime declared itself permanent; a Committee of Public Safety was appointed; Kossuth was chosen Imperator with unlimited power, and every man able to bear arms, was ordered forthwith to join the army which thus included the regular hussar, the national guard, and the peasant with his national weapon, the scythe.

It is sad that this bright page in the history of so noble a race, should have been stained with a deed that no excitement and no passion can excuse. Like General Br a in Paris, Prince Lichnowsky in Frankfurth, and Count Latour in Vienna, was it in Pesth also an old tried soldier who fell ingloriously in an inglorious cause.

The Emperor, relying on the rapid march of the Ban of Croatia and the apparent hesitation of the Magyars entirely to throw off their allegiance to Austria, sent Count Lamberg as Commissioner to make a last attempt at reconciliation. For this purpose, the venerable old General left Pesth to cross the Danube, when, on the bridge, an infuriated mob recognized his brilliant uniform in an humble hackney-coach, dragged him out and butchered him in a manner which of itself disgraced the whole nation. Soon after, a Count Zichy, a Magyar-magnate and cousin to the Princess Metternich, was detected in carrying on a secret correspondence with the Croats and after a summary trial, hung as a traitor.

There was great and well-founded indignation at Vienna. Jellachich was ordered immediately to dissolve the Magyar Diet, and to reduce the country by fire and sword to obedience; but ere he could march to execute this order, the last revolution broke out in Vienna, and he hastened thither to aid his Emperor's cause, while the Magyars collected an army to assist the Republican party.

Vienna is fallen, and for the moment the cause of the Slaves is triumphant. At the side of Western Europe we see an Eastern Europe rise, heretofore hardly known but as the formidable phantom of Pan Slavism, rarely as a friendly power. Millions of Slaves, not Russians, but almost all opposed to them and mostly differing with them in religion, are rising, coalescing and forming institutions which shall reconcile and combine the cultus of ancient laws and traditions of the country with the demands of modern civilization. Let the old races of the Continent beware! Let them remember Rome and the Barbarians! Let them examine the questions now agitated on the banks of the Danube and the shores of the Mediterranean, and well consider that there is waiting for their downfall a powerful and uncorrupted race, forming one tenth part of all mankind and united by the sacred tie of common blood and the strong bond of one common language—a race, warlike and victorious, represented even now in the armies of Europe by their only successful Generals—Radetzky, Windischgraetz and Jellachich!

In attempting to present here a few glimpses at Europe in 1848, we have been led to choose the distant and unknown Slave nation as the first of our series, because we believe this movement to be the only one likely to have permanent effects on the state of things in Europe. Not that the revolutions which have disturbed more or less the peace of almost every nation will remain without their momentous consequences. The providence of God does not ordain such fearful commotions without a wise purpose, although centuries may pass before it becomes manifest to our short-sighted minds. Even were there no other benefit to be derived from such a crisis, it must have enlarged and strengthened those countries by elevating all the members of the same state to the consciousness of their dignity as citizens, and by exciting in all men of the same blood a warmer love of their common race and country. But we apprehend that the wishes of those who, from a pure, but abstract love of freedom, hoped for the establishment of republics in Europe, will be doomed to disappointment. We have happened of late to meet more than one of those in whose hands had been the government of European countries for long years; and from prudent Guizot, whom no fault of his own, but solely the selfish policy and reluctant half-confidence of Louis Philippe, caused to fall, to the newly risen Kossuth with his ardent enthusiasm for liberty, not one but was convinced that the establishment of republics at present, could not be hoped for and should not be desired, that France would soon return to monarchy, that Germany would never attempt a republic while Poland remained quiescent, and that Italy would but slightly change her political institutions by forming a federal union.

If however, the movement in favor of republicanism be comparatively fruitless and produce but few radical changes in the political aspect of Europe, it is far otherwise with the question of nationality. Austria has de facto become a Slavonic Empire; the Emperor has determined to reside hereafter in Prague among his three millions of Tchech-subjects, and a union of these Slaves with their brethren in Hungary, Serbia, Moldavia and Wallachia is already preparing. This change will, we fear, seriously affect the principle of political balance in the Old World : a door has been opened in the very centre of Europe for the admission of a new race, giving it access to the Adriatic and thence to the Mediterranean, and the interests of the Western half of the Continent will henceforth be more directly exposed to the influence of a power tremendous in itself, and by its close alliance with one of the most numerous races of the world, silent and mysterious in its ambition, but successful in whatever it has attempted.

THE LAST ADIEU.

"There is a touching part of the Greek-funeral service, in which relatives and friends are invited to embrace the deceased (whose face is uncovered) and so bid their final adieu."

"She died ; yet Death could scarcely chill
Her smiling beauties."—MRS. WELBY.

The summer sky is calm and bright,
The Earth looks gay with flowers—
The birds are glancing in the light,
Or warbling in their bowers—
But oh ! my heart is dark and chill,
I would this fevered pulse were still.

The Heaven, that bends so calm above,
As if God's smile were there,
Is like thy brow, departed love !—
And scarce more pure and fair—
"Dust unto dust"—but not while grace,
So angel-like illumines thy face.

How still thy raven tresses lie !
How paled thy cheek's rich bloom !
How dimmed the lustre of thine eye !—
And yet no trace of gloom,
No trace, no trace is o'er them cast,
For Grief is dead : and Death is past.

Aye ! Death is past ; but can the power,
So dread a change that wrought
On those pale features in an hour,
Change the soul's love—or thought ?
Do beings in the untrodden sphere,
Dream of the days they lingered here ?

A sunbeam, through the o'erhanging trees,
Breaks radiant on thy brow,
Where the dark locks a perfumed breeze,
Is stirring gently now—
Was it a smile thy spirit sent,
From the fair, bending firmament ?

A moment ! and I fondly deemed
So life-like was the ray,
That over eye, lip, ringlet beamed,—
All had not passed away
Of the ethereal, magic flame
That warmed so late thy heart and frame.

But my sweet vision, like a bird,
With that brief lustre fled,
And not Love's most endearing word,
Can waken more—the dead—
'Tis hard the beautiful to lay,
Oh ! Earth ! on thy cold couch of clay—

Still a strange something tells my heart—
Thy presence haunts me yet—
That kindred-natures cannot part,
Nor kindred souls forget—
Death's tyrant—power is more than vain,
Belovéd ! we shall meet again.

NATIONAL BALLADS.

There is, perhaps, no similitude more trite and familiar,—certainly there is none more striking and true, than that which likens the origin and progress of nations to the growth and development of children. As a mere figure of speech, to illustrate the periods of increase and decay, it is undoubtedly just and appropriate : but this resemblance, which may be traced as well in the ruined tower, or the tottering oak, is not the most interesting analogy, suggested by such phrases, as the infancy, the maturity, and the old age of nations.

Let a country, fit for the habitation of man, be possessed by a people partly civilized. Let them lay the foundations of a state, and go on, through a succession of ages, to build up, to strengthen, and to extend their dominion : let them reach the culminating point of greatness, and fall into that decline which full surely awaits every work of human hands : and there will be found not only in the power and resources of the nation, at these different epochs, but in the temper and character of the people, in their thoughts and feelings, their passions and pursuits, a remarkable coincidence with those of the corresponding divisions of human life.

These remarks, it is obvious, will not apply to the history of colonies from a highly civilized parent stock. When emigrants leave the soil of their ancestors, to plant in other climes the seeds of future nations, they carry with them the experience and knowledge of the past—the discoveries of science, the treasures of art, the fruits of thought and study—bequeathed to them by their predecessors. They begin their separate existence, at that stage of cultivation, which the mother country had already attained : nor can we expect to discover, in their subsequent progress, the characteristics which belong to an earlier civilization. For these we must look back to the rude annals of the race from which they sprung.

The child is a creature of impulse and feeling. His dormant reason can only be awakened, stimulated, guided and supported, by means of his affections. But his very instincts, for the most part, prompt him to what is good. It is true, that pride and selfishness are soon at work within him. It is true, that the excess, even of commendable feelings, will sometimes hurry him beyond the limits that divide every virtue from its corresponding vice. But, nevertheless, the main-springs of the youthful heart, with rare and lamentable exceptions, are truth, justice and generosity. It loves the beautiful, reveres the pure, admires the daring, is awed by the sublime, weeps over the pathetic, abhors the cruel, burns with indignation at oppression and wrong, and swells with a noble sympathy at the triumph of the innocent and the downfall of the guilty. Let him who doubts the fidelity of this sketch, recall his childish emotions, when he listened at the nurse's knee, to the sad story of the Children in the Wood, the valiant knight-errantry of Jack the Giant-Killer, and the terrible vengeance which overtook the bloody Blue Beard upon the battlements of his own castle. Let him do this: and, if his pulses beat as quickly now as it did in those early days, at the tale of rescued innocence and punished crime, he may rejoice that he has not been sorrowfully taught

"To know he's farther off from Heaven,
Than when he was a boy."

But, alas! few can boast such freshness of soul. The rough experience of the world, the busy cares of interest and ambition, the collisions and struggles, which task the intellect and rouse the energies of manhood, seldom fail to deaden our sensibilities and to develop, in excess, all our selfish tendencies. The love of pleasure, the thirst for gold and the lust of power, absorb the finer feelings of our nature. At every turn we inquire—"cui bono?"—what doth it profit me? Our motives of action are contracted into a narrow calculation of worldly ease or advantage. Here and there we do, indeed, find men, in whom the love of excellence still abides—who have replaced the ardor of youth with the surer strength of moral principle and religious faith. And, perhaps, few are not sometimes, nay often, moved to shake off their earth-fast fetters, and strike one generous blow for the welfare of their kind. But the short-lived impulse soon dies: the conviction of duty fades away from the mind: and we are plunged again into the tumult and strife of our daily existence.

Thus we push on and painfully win our way to the confines of age. The prime of life is passed. Its projects, conflicts, defeats, victories—all are at an end. We begin to descend the hill, and look doubtfully at the dark shadows which surround its base. We remember, with sad tenderness, the valley where we sported at morning; its sunshine and flowers, the joyous song of birds and the lovely radiance, which clothed even the homeliest objects in the hues of Heaven. We review, with a strange mixture of pride and self-reproach, all that we suffered and achieved, in the ascent of the mountain beneath the glare of the mid-day sun: the perils encountered, the obstacles surmounted, the wild joy of the struggle, the intoxication of success. Before us is no pleasing prospect. Each step that we take, still weaker than the last, brings us nearer to that "cold obstruction," towards which we are hastening. And we cling, with vain repinings, to recollections of the brilliant sunrise, and the glorious noon-tide of life's short day.

Is there not a close parallel between this our mortal career, and that which may be called the moral life of nations? Do not the changes in the temper and spirit of a people correspond with those we have been describing? Where, except in the first ages of a rising state, shall we look for simplicity of manners? for the strong tie of citizenship? for that frank hospitality, which designated, by the same word, the stranger and the guest? Where else do we find such examples of lofty patriotism, of generous self-devotion, of romantic courage and of high-souled clemency? To borrow a happy thought from one, who utters many of them, it is "far away in the early period of time, where the uncertain hues of poetry blend with the serener light of history," that we are to seek for those heroic hearts who loved to hear and to emulate the noble deeds of others. Such were the men who delighted in the majestic song of Homer, or the impassioned strains of the Celtic bards; such the men who left, as themes for future poets, the Pass of Thermopylæ and the Field of Bannockburn.

"Time rolls his ceaseless course." He bears away, on his resistless current, the landmarks of early civilization. An age of iron is to succeed. The sacred love of independence is supplanted by the unhallowed passion for foreign conquest. The minds that labored, and the hearts that bled for freedom and the right now exert their powers, at the bidding of unjust and unscrupulous ambition. The infant state, that but lately struggled to defend itself, has grown up into a mighty empire, upon the ruins of its weaker neighbors, the arts of peace, too, blessed as is their general influence, foster the greedy spirit of the time. "The land is full of harvests and green meads"—the cities teem with busy manufactures: the seas swarm with white-winged messengers of trade:

and the whole force of the people, physical and intellectual, is chained to the service of private gain, or public aggrandizement. The romantic feeling of other days is every where extinct: unless it survive in some mountain solitude, undisturbed as yet by the harsh clank of machinery, or the grovelling thunder of the rail-way.

At last comes the season of decay. The vices of excessive wealth and refinement have shot up in rank exuberance, and matured their deadly fruits. Luxury, sloth and licentiousness overspread the soil and choke the seeds of every generous emotion, every manly virtue. The hand of death presses heavily upon the body politic. Gone is the elastic activity of youth—the nervous vigor of manhood. Vainly does the palsied dotard recount now with exulting chuckle, and anon with tears, the proud achievements of by-gone days. These can avail nothing to stay the relentless decree of Fate. The haughty empire of the Assyrians and the colossal strength of Rome,—their glories tarnished, their triumphs forgotten—lie prostrate in the dust, whence they arose.

We are now in the full maturity of life as a nation. Infancy, such as we have endeavored to portray, our country has never known. The founders of the American States were men born and reared in a highly civilized era, and were themselves in no way behind the intelligence and knowledge of their age. But it may not be uninteresting nor wholly unprofitable to recur to that distant time in which our own origin is to be discerned, mingled with the beginnings of the various European nations, whose blood courses in the veins of Anglo Saxon and Anglo American. It may be worth while to look back upon the thoughts and deeds of men who trod the earth before us, and who left their impress upon their own, perhaps upon succeeding generations: to glance at the records, rude and imperfect though they may be, of the mighty and prolific Past.

Among those records we shall find naught more deserving of attention than the ancient ballads; not unfrequently, indeed, they are the only sources of history and tradition. To us they are valuable as exponents of the character of the times which produced them: but, in those times, their office was more important—for they wielded no small influence over the manners and sentiments of the people who listened to them. The pithy saying of Fletcher of Saltoun*—"that if he could but make the ballads of a nation he would care little who made the religion of it"—has passed long since into a proverb. And equally familiar to every body is the remark of a pamphleteer of that day, that the famous "Lilliburlero" sung King James II. out of three kingdoms. The very triteness of these quotations proves their universal reception as political truths, and justifies the high estimate which has been placed upon the rude lyrics of a former day. Let us then devote an hour to the consideration of that poetry which had so large a share in forming and reflecting the features of contemporary history—to the labors of the old Chroniclers and Rhymers, the makers and the minstrels of National Ballads.

In the infancy of the arts, and especially before the invention of letters, poetry and music combined seem to have been naturally, and even necessarily, resorted to, on all public occasions. At the assemblies of the people, whether for religious sacrifice, or social festivity, their chief occupations were song and dancing. The solemnity of religious worship required for its expression a language more elevated than the common discourse of life, and produced the first attempts at rhythm, or measured speech. Melody soon came to its aid: pleasing the ear by musical cadences, and, through their agency, impressing more strongly on the memory and the heart the sacred poems with their fervent spirit of adoration. Hence the sublime strains of the Hebrew Prophets, and the classic hymns of Greece. Legislators, philosophers and historians, availed themselves of the same method, to proclaim the laws, to publish scientific truth, and to transmit to future generations the events of their own as well as of former times. At such meetings Homer sang his Iliad, a poem and a chronicle: a series of narratives in verse, wherein real occurrences are blended with the fabulous, and embellished with all the treasures of poetic genius and dramatic art. And thus were preserved the early traditions of all nations: the Arabs and the Persians, the Greeks and the Germans, the hordes of Scythia, and the Celtic tribes of Gaul and Britain.

The great characteristics of lyric poetry are its versatility, freedom and animation. It does not follow the stately march of history, but wanders at will in digressions and episodes. Unfettered by the continuous measure of more elaborate composition, it varies with the changeful current of passionate emotion. Sometimes it flows on in smooth tranquillity, sometimes it hurries along with the force and vehemence of a torrent. Now it rises into grandeur and sublimity—and now subsides into the tender and pathetic. Here it winds peacefully amid the chequered scenes of common life, and anon it swells with the mighty tides of ambitious policy, or thunders with all the tumult of furious war. Nor does it disdain the pursuit of lighter themes. The banquet hall and the bower of love—the revels of the noble, and the games of the rustic—the gay, the humorous and comic aspects of life—are reflected upon its surface, and relieve its deeper shades. Of all the countries of modern Europe, Italy alone has preserved, in the art of the Improvisatore, something like the diversified and spirited poesy of the olden time.

* This is sometimes rendered "give me the making of a nation's ballads and I care not who makes its laws." It is attributed now to one celebrated man and now to another. Very recently, a contributor to the Edinburg Review ("devil a lass," Mr. Lever would say) ascribed the maxim to Cardinal Mazarin! But we make our stand resolutely on Fletcher of Saltoun.

The character of different nations, as we are told by scholars conversant with their literature, is displayed in their early poems. The songs of the fierce Gothic people breathe of battle and slaughter: the Chinese treat of gentle and more peaceful subjects: the Greek is full of speculations upon Chaos, Creation and the physical history of the World: the Spanish and Moorish ballads mingle a chivalrous and martial spirit with much of refinement and delicacy: while the Oriental poets often, as in the Proverbs, and the Book of Job, present us with impressive lessons of moral and religious truth.

Much has been written about the origin and development of romantic poetry in Europe. Numberless theories have been maintained, combated and abandoned. The received opinion, at the present day, derives the first knowledge of this species of literature from the Scandinavian or Gothic tribes: and supposes it to have been modified—perhaps revolutionized—by the intercourse of the Crusaders with Eastern countries, and the influence of the elegant and polished Saracens who were so long seated in Spain. Thus, the “barbaric horror,” which invests many of the oldest fictions, is ascribed to the dark and gloomy superstitions of the North: whilst the more brilliant and splendid enchantments of later fables are traced to the people of those sunny regions, which produced the Arabian Night’s Entertainments. And the spirit of the latter, changed and colored by other accidents of time and place, still survives in the “marvellous machineries” of Tasso and Dante, and in the gorgeous “Fairy Queen” of Spenser.

In Europe, during the middle ages, ballads were made up of historical events, adventures of particular heroes, pictures of domestic and social life, the occupations and amusements of the people, their manners and customs, habits and tastes. At first, the historical details were probably correct in substance, and ornamented only to a small extent by the fancy of the chronicler: but, as in process of time, the narratives descended from age to age, changes crept in through the ignorance of some minstrels and the invention of others; new poems were composed with the same personages for the dramatis personæ, ascribing to them lives and exploits, in which the fable began largely to predominate over the truth: until at length these compositions became wholly unworthy of confidence, as vehicles of history, and were superseded in this, their original office, by annals of a more grave and imposing appearance.

For a long time, however, the metrical romances and the minstrels, by whom they were composed and sung, retained their place in the esteem of the feudal knights and nobles. The minstrel was a character of high distinction. His person was sacred. He was sometimes the ambassador, often the companion and friend of kings and emperors; and his services were rewarded with the most substantial as well as the most honorable marks of princely favor.

When Richard, the Lion-hearted king of England, was on his return from the crusades, he was treacherously seized and imprisoned by the Duke of Austria, whilst passing through his territories. For the space of a year, no tidings of him could be heard. At last Blondel de Neale, a minstrel, who had been brought up in his household after a laborious search for him in many lands, came to the castle in which he was confined and ascertained that an unknown prisoner was there kept with unusual strictness. He obtained access to the castle, without difficulty, in his capacity of minstrel: and, watching his opportunity, began one day singing a French song, which King Richard and himself had composed together many years before. When he had sung half the song he stopped: whereupon the king took up the unfinished strain and concluded it. Thus the minstrel became satisfied, where, and by whom, his master was detained: and, returning to England, made known his discovery to the queen and the nobles. A negotiation was immediately set on foot with the Duke of Austria, which resulted in the king’s ransom and liberation.

Such was the honored position of the minstrel, in the palmy days of the profession. But the number of those who embraced the calling, their idle and vagrant life, the silent but continuous change in the constitution of society, and the introduction of the prose romances, to which the art of printing gave birth, gradually effected their downfall. They were banished from the feasts of the nobility and gentry, and sunk by degrees into itinerant ballad-singers: in which character, for a long time, they were received, as favored guests, at the tables and firesides of the poorer classes. From their songs, or the fragments of them, preserved by tradition, have been collected the remains of ballad-poetry, in England and Scotland, by Dr. Percy, Sir Walter Scott, and other gleaners of less celebrity: encouraged in their work, by the successful labors of their brethren, in the no less fruitful fields of German and Spanish poetry.

We have adverted to the writers of prose romances, who supplanted the old minstrels, in the favor of the great. Possessed of somewhat more learning and a much larger share of pretension, than their fallen predecessors, they did not scruple to steal heroes and subjects from the old ballads, and reproduce them in other narratives, which they imposed upon their unlearned patrons, as authentic translations from original Greek and Latin manuscripts. Thus, while they affected a superiority, in point of dignity and correctness to the metrical tales of the minstrels, these interminable fictions, swollen to a portentous size by countless excrescences, grew into a deformity, that became constantly more and more unlike the truth of history. Sir Walter Scott makes an amusing apology for these prolix and discursive romances: "a book, which addresses itself only to the eyes, may be laid aside, when it becomes tiresome to the reader: whereas it may not always have been so easy to stop the minstrel in the full career of his metrical declamation." Such as they were, however, these books were "deemed and taken" (as legislators phrase it) by our simple ancestors for faithful annals; and were received with the same implicit confidence, that Lord Chatham is said to have bestowed on the historical plays of Shakspeare.

The model of most, or all, of these romances, is to be found, according to some critics, in the Ethiopics of Heliodorus, who was bishop of Tricca, in Thessaly, in the fourth century. This work contains an account of the amours of Theagenes and Chariclea; which, although written in a modest and reserved style, when compared with others of the same kind, did not escape the severe censure of the church. He was required, either to suppress his book, or to renounce his bishopric. As the story goes, literature carried the day against divinity. The good bishop would not desert the children of his fancy, and sacrificed, for their sake, his clerical preferment.

The emperor Charlemagne and king Arthur of England were the most distinguished heroes of European Romance. Turpin, archbishop of Rheims, under the former prince, is the reputed author of a fabulous history, the subject of which is the expulsion of the Saracens from Spain, and which has been the original of innumerable legends, concerning the exploits of Charlemagne and his twelve peers. In like manner, the history of Geoffrey of Monmouth has transmitted to posterity the life and exploits of king Arthur; which by the industry of the old chronicler, and his successors, have been so interwoven and confused with a mass of fictions, that some critics have utterly disbelieved the whole, and even denied the existence of the monarch himself. Around these great centres, revolved a host of luminaries, scarcely less splendid—Roland, Rinaldo, and Olivier—Sir Gawain, Launcelot du Lac, Palmerin of England, and a score of others, who constituted a common stock, for the use of minstrels all over Europe. Whenever a new ballad was to be elaborated, one of these worthies was selected, and a fresh chapter added to his biography, keeping up his traditionary character, and providing him with suitable adventures. They were brought out, like approved actors, in new pieces, especially adapted to their talents: so that, when the audience tired of one performance, the old favorites might be ready to re-appear in another drama.

But we are by no means to suppose that kings and nobles were the exclusive themes of minstrelsy. The beauty and virtue of their dames—the vicissitudes of faithful love, whose course, (as every body knows,) never did run smooth, were fruitful subjects of romance. Nor did they overlook the personages of humbler life. Many a good story is told of bold outlaws, like Robin Hood and little John—of stout yeomen, like the Tanner of Tamworth, and the Miller of Mansfield. In a word, all classes of people, gentle and simple, rich and poor, high and low, all found their appropriate places, and performed their proper parts. Indeed, the value of these productions, as materials for history, as representations of the social and domestic life of the times, has been highly esteemed by those most conversant with them. The testimony of Macaulay is eloquently given, in his description of what history should be.

"The perfect historian is he, in whose work, the character and spirit of an age is exhibited in miniature. He relates no fact, he attributes no expression to his characters, which is not authenticated by sufficient testimony. But, by judicious selection, rejection, and arrangement, he gives to truth those attractions, which have been usurped by fiction. In his narrative, a due subordination is preserved: some transactions are prominent, others retire. But the scale, on which he represents them, is increased or diminished, not according to the dignity of the persons concerned in them, but according to the degree, in which they elucidate the condition of society, and the nature of man. He shows us the court, the camp, and the senate. But he shows us also the nation. He considers no anecdote, no peculiarity of manner, no familiar saying, as too insignificant for his notice, which is not too insignificant to illustrate the operation of laws, of religion, and of education, and to mark the progress of the human mind.

"If a man, such as we are supposing, should write the history of England, he would assuredly not omit the battles, the sieges, the negotiations, the editions, the ministerial changes. But, with these, he would intersperse the details, which are the charm of historical romances. At Lincoln Cathedral, there is a beautiful painted window, which was made by an apprentice, out of the pieces of glass, which had been rejected by his master. It is so far superior to every other in the church, that, according to the tradition, the vanquished artist killed himself from mortification. Sir Walter Scott, in the same manner, has used those fragments of truth, which historians have scornfully thrown behind them, in a manner, which may well excite their envy. He has constructed, out of their gleanings, works which, even considered as histories, are scarcely less valuable than theirs. But a truly great historian would reclaim those materials which the novelist has appropriated. The history of the government, and the history of the people, would be exhibited in that mode, in which alone they can be exhibited justly—in inseparable conjunction and intermixture. We should not then have to look for the wars and votes of the Puritans in Clarendon, and for their phraseology in Old Mortality, for one half of King James in Hume, and for the other half in the Fortunes of Nigel.

The early part of our imaginary history would be rich with coloring from romance, ballad, and chronicle. We should find ourselves in the company of knights, such as those of Froissart, and of pilgrims, such as those who rode with Chaucer from the Tabard. Society would be shown, from the highest to the lowest—from the royal cloth of state, to the den of the outlaw—from the throne of the legate, to the chimney corner where the begging friar regaled himself. Palmers, minstrels, crusaders—the stately monastery, with its good cheer in its refectory, and the high mass in its chapel—the manor house, with its hunting and hawking—the tournament, with the heralds and ladies, the trumpets and the cloth of gold—would give life and truth to the representation. We should perceive, in a thousand slight touches, the importance of the privileged burgher, and the force and haughty spirit which swelled under the collar of the degraded villain."

Whilst we are copying this quotation, a history of England by Mr. Macaulay himself, is passing through the press. His admirers, (and who is not of this number?) will be eager to see, how far he has been enabled to realize his beau idéal of a historian, in his own work. That he will not be deficient in the art of historical painting, we are confident, as well from his high appreciation of it in others, as from the specimens of his book, which the publishers have vouchsafed to us, by way of whetting the literary appetite. We trust he may be found no less worthy of admiration, in the other requisites of a good historian.

But, whatever his merit in these particulars, he has been eminently successful in reversing the process. He has shown how the materials of history may be resolved into their original elements, and the lost ballads reconstructed. In his "Lays of Ancient Rome," he has presented us with vivid pictures of Roman life, public and private, such as we may conceive it to have appeared to one, living and moving in the midst of it. With consummate skill and taste, he has infused the spirit and energy of the Roman heart into English verse; and preserving the thoughts and feelings, objects and circumstances, which belong to that people—sacrificing no propriety of time or place—he has moulded the whole into language, the most natural and expressive to the English ear.

There have been also others, no less distinguished for their success, as restorers and imitators of National Ballads; among whom are conspicuous Scott and Leyden in the field of Scottish poesy, and Lockhart in his inimitable translations of Spanish ballads. But to them, as well as to the venerable Bishop Percy, already alluded to, we hope to do ample justice hereafter: for this article has already grown to such a length as to exclude the extracts which we had designed to offer to our readers. We trust they will not be unacceptable on a future occasion: but if we should be disappointed in the sympathy of those whom we desire to please, and our love of ballad-poetry seem to be overstrained, we must plead in excuse the invincible force of early association. These poems, as has been finely said of the classics, are to us "the early voice of the world, better remembered and more cherished still, than all the intermediate words that have been spoken: as the lessons of childhood still haunt us, when the impressions of later years have been effaced from the mind."

VOWS.

Vows ought to be cautiously made. Leigh, in his Journey to Nubia, says, Osman Bey Bardissi had made a vow, never to shave his head or his beard, till he should re-enter Cairo. For the sake of cleanliness, as well as Cairo, his followers must hope the event would be speedy.

EIGHTEEN SONNETS.

WITH NOTES.

I.

Eleven!—twelve! the aged man is gone
 With his chill breathing and his frosty hair.
 And wreathed around with leaves and blossoms fair,
 The New Year with his joyous gait comes on!
 Old Year I love you!—they shall never say
 I left you ere your death to greet the sun
 Uprising o'er the eastern horizon,
 Inviting all to bask beneath his ray.
 You gave me a dear love whose sunny smile
 Has scattered flowers upon my thorny path!
 A loving friend of never-changing faith
 From coldness free and every thought of guile.
 You taught me truth to love, deceit to shun;
 Therefore Old Year—my arm to lean upon!

How the changes of a few years, yea even of a single year, affect that strange and anomalous creature, man! The author has in this slight performance endeavored to record his obligations to the by-gone year. Alas! it has fitted away like the dry leaf of autumn to bury itself in the silent tomb of the Past. Another volume of our life is closed: we have turned over a new leaf, (though not in the favorable acceptance of the phrase,) each day, and in spite of the cheerful expressions made use of in the text, we rise from the perusal scarcely persuaded of any thing save the vanity of human wishes. The Future is before us, but we resolutely turn our eyes upon the Past, seeking for what, alas! we find not—consolation. As the ringing sounds of the midnight bell die away in the frosty air, our thoughts go forth with lightning speed, and finding nothing but a cheerless void, come back to tell us that all is vexation of spirit.

The author, being in this pitiable state of mind, would call the reader's attention to the following.

II.

I knew a politician warmer far
 Than lovers' vows or steaks of eating-house,
 And "Ah!" I cried, "sure 'tis my lucky star
 That points where I so freely may carouse,
 And bid my weary soul with trouble torn,
 Like to these elbows and this beaver here,
 Eat, drink, enjoy herself, no longer mourn—
 Seize on the golden hour withouten fear.
 But ah for mortal hopes, alas! alas!
 'Twas when I had a vote the sun did shine:
 I threw it clear away—but let that pass,
 Whatever comes no freeborn man should whine,
 I did it and was done in Forty-four
 And now in Forty-eight I'm done once more!

The cast of feeling here, as in the preceding, is seen to be decidedly mournful. The man who finds courage to exclaim so heroically, "but let that pass," after prospects so flattering as those unfolded at the commencement of this touching soliloquy, must ever command the admiration of the candid-reader. The noble sentiment conveyed in the antepenultimate verse of the stanza is only equalled by the calm and dignified tone of resignation in the succeeding couplets. Thus does the great mind bear up against and repel the assaults of adversity and misfortune!

III.

I dreamt, and in my dream the coming time
 Was shadowed forth, as when the rising sun
 Throws giant-like upon the matin rime
 The shade of him who makes his orison.
 I saw the telegraph amid the clouds
 Stretching from place to place without a pole,
 And in balloon-ships eager-hearted crowds
 Speeding like blooded racers to the goal.
 The air was clear, I saw no blinding fogs
 That rose before as from a mouldy fen.
 The Press was pure, unswayed by demagogues,
 The chairs of office boasted honest men.
 All things were bright and joyful—I awoke
 To other scenes and thoughts—hurrah for Polk!

The author here, it will be seen, indulges in prophecy, and like all prophets of the present day, his predictions are sufficiently striking, if not very certain of fulfilment. The Future, however, that bank which fools draw so largely upon without estimating their credit, and wise men invest their substance in, will present the best evidence of his claims on this head.

The telegraph is universally considered a very remarkable affair. As for ourselves we candidly confess that since the evening, when it was proved to a large and intelligent audience that the learned professor had patented the lightning and a striking quotation from the book of Job on the same subject, since that time we have fully coincided in this opinion, and from not entirely comprehending the theory of this wonderful instrument, have watched in the simplicity of our hearts to see the news go by.

By the means alluded to in the sixth line of the text, the learned professor will hereafter be enabled to stretch his line whither and in whatever manner he pleases without asking leave of any one to plant his poles. If the manner of carrying out this great improvement is not fully explained, we can only regret the fact. We have, further, too much respect for scientific books to reflect upon them in this particular.

A balloon-ship would be a novelty, but many persons doubt the possibility of such a contrivance and assert that any attempt of the sort will fall to the ground or end in smoke.

These are possible, however, and the time for them like Christmas—may be coming. In the meanwhile, we will indulge a hope that the world in its rage for morality and improvement will attend to the subject suggested in the lines which follow. The weight is already as great as we can bear, and like the poor criminal who underwent the peine forte et dure, it requires but little more to press us to death.

IV.

Upon a bank of sweetest wild flowers lying
 One clear and sunny day in lazy June,
 Late in the pleasing, languid afternoon,
 I dimly mused and fell asleep in sighing.
 Methought I saw a Persian dame of mien
 Most beautiful and fairy-like to see,
 Straight as an aspen or a poplar tree,
 And with the bearing of a gracious queen.
 She passed her slender fingers through my hair—
 She spoke in dulcet tones of such soft fire,
 I thought some murmuring Eolian lyre
 Its soul-enchanting notes poured on the air.
 I woke, and at my side—no Persian dame!
 I rose, and all my cheek was like a flame!

Youth—youth! what to your reckless mind, all confident of the coming years, is the proudest triumph of the grown up man!

How pleasant it is to wander forth in the balmy mouth of June, when the birds are singing, the green leaves gently moving to the breath of the cooling wind, the river's haze wrapping the distant landscape in a gauzy mantle, from which gleam up the glittering spire of the village church, the snowy sail of a seabound barque, or the lofty peak of a mountain range.

Go at noon. Then the flowers are as still as though the hand of death were on their fibres, the distant wheat reposes like a field of gold in the bright sunlight, the birds are at rest, the leaves all motionless, and even the school-boy deep in the mysteries of ball and marbles, deserts the play-ground and wanders into the shady wood, where lying on the sod, his hand beneath his cheek, his bosom open to the air, he sleeps, and sleeping—dreams. Of whom?

Alas! alas! the season of youth is brief, yea as fleeting as yon thistle down, which floats a moment motionless on air, and then is borne as on the wings of the storm-wind to the yawning waves of the treacherous sea.

We were that school boy. Bread and butter was untasted, birch unheeded. Thus through all our youth we slept—and dreamt and at last have awakened. No Persian dame is at our side, neither the reality of that other. Only the shadow, alas! and that even, which we fondly dreamed would dwell in our hearts as the trace of an iron pen on a tomb of adamant, is melting away like the cool mists of summer, which make the morn so delightful, before the rays of the rising sun.

The author turning a deaf ear to the advisers who recommend an abandonment of his stylus for the time, in order that his soul, usurped by gloomy thoughts, may be restored, begs to introduce to the indulgent reader the following:

V.

Far on the sea the mountain billows roar
 With thunder-music in their god-like voice,
 Making the bold heart leap up and rejoice.
 As wrapped in foam they bowl upon the shore,
 Like ocean sprites that hold their revelry
 Where dolphins sport and sea-birds fit along,
 Filling the air with their discordant song
 In honor of the raging god of sea—
 My bounding soul goes forth and once again
 My swift bark is careering onward fast,
 Flying before the chill breath of the blast,
 And bearing me across the surging main.
 But then this blazing fire—these muffins hot,
 Who says the sea is best? I say 'tis not!

Here the form of expression is evidently borrowed. In fact the author has closely copied, but neither wittingly nor willingly, the strong and striking expression of the curious character claiming so much attention in King John.

They who have crossed

"The Alps and Appenines
 The Pyrenean and the river Po," will join at once in the sentiment here expressed. The owner's soul "goes forth upon the sea" and "leaps up" to hear the "howling of the billows," the "song of the seagulls" and the "revelry of the "ocean sprites," but after skimming the breakers and listening in thought to their roaring, he returns to warm his lower limbs at the chimney-corner, with the cheerful expression that whoever may declare these striking objects more attractive, he is constrained, from personal experience, to say that his friend labors under a mistake.

VI.

Down with the tyrants! 'tis the PEOPLE'S voice
 That comes to us in roaring thunder tones,
 The lightnings of their wrath from golden thrones
 Have hurled the despots, and they shout "Rejoice!
 Rejoice for freedom, oh most fair and dear
 Who fled from Europe's soil for many a day
 And westward to Columbia took her way
 To brace all breasts against the tyrant's spear."
 Great hearts! whose noble cause thrills all the soul
 Much need ye should with indignation join
 A holy moderation most divine,
 Then shall ye reach the lofty gleaming goal
 Whereon your eyes are fixed with ardent hope,
 Like Simeon's on the far-extended cope.

In presenting this small poem to the public the author is sorry to say that every critic has a right to examine it with his most fault-finding spectacles. Milton and other ancient writers, who enjoyed much popularity in their time, have celebrated in odes, sonnets and poems, the dawn, meridian and sunset of liberty. But these great writers lived long before the nineteenth century. They had not examined the glorious sample of independence unrolled before the world by America, brighter in the tints and more striking in the pattern, if the indulgent reader will allow of the expression, than any ever yet thrown down on the counter of the world.

The allusion to St. Simeon, in the concluding verse, was suggested by a perusal of Mr. Tennyson's poem on the subject, in which the martyr to be, is represented as standing on the summit of a lofty column, anxiously expecting the moment, which he states to be at a "quarter before twelve," when the angels will come to bear away his soul. Mr. Tennyson being only the "poet of a set," as the "New Timon" declares, and that in a far distant country, the author humbly suggests that his candor in acknowledging his obligation should be duly appreciated. If he ever dresses Lara in the costume of a "Nomad from the land of Morn," he will endeavor to be equally plain with the reader.

VII.

Oh, Mary! if a heart that beats for thee,
Thee only, dearest, may thy love procure,
May move thy virgin heart so soft and pure,
So full of love and sweet humanity—
If thou wilt smile on one, whose only store
Is fond affection, jealous care for thee,
To shield thy form from dark adversity
And wear thee in his spirit's inmost core,
Then turn on me thine eyes of liquid light
Give me thy lily hand in mine to press
And thou wilt fill my soul with happiness
My heart carissima! with deep delight.
She turned—her features like the blushing rose—
And placed her dexter thumb upon her nose.

The gesture here alluded to, of placing the right thumb upon the tip of the nose and gently moving the expanded hand in a circular direction, is thought to convey a playful species of satire, and if our memory deceives us not, was often accompanied with the jocular phrase "no you don't though!"

At any rate it appears that in this instance the gesture was only half repulsive, for the fair lady smiled and tripped away so provokingly that we were persuaded to follow.

The author would recommend the form of address used in this performance as one highly artistic and calculated to move the heart. The allusion to his jealous care to shield her form from the blasts of adversity, though he candidly confesses his entire want of any buckler for the purpose, has often, to our knowledge, produced a touching effect on the heart of the young lady. The Italian word of endearment is here used in order to give that flowing sound to the rhythm which is found in the old poets, and also as infinitely more ardent and expressive than the common English "dearest."

VIII.

Dumas, when o'er thy gasconading page,
I follow thee through never ending scenes
That gurgle out as from unstopped canteens
The grateful draught—when all the middle age
Comes forth in burnished armor as to say,
"By mighty spell of great enchanter's wand
We come to thee from distant shadow-land
Where long in darkest tombs of dust we lay"—
When Athos, Porthos, Aramis arise
Great, splendid, elegant, with many more,
I wonder at the hugeness of the store,
I'm full of admiration and surprise!
But then those poor dear creditors' demands,
Indeed Mossieu, 'twas shabby at your hands!

The late trial of M. Dumas for breach of engagement to write for the "Presse" and other newspapers, which created so great a sensation in the Parisian world, renders this subject of peculiar interest.

Notwithstanding the reprehensive terms used in the text, M. Dumas is, in the author's opinion, fully exonerated from the charges of fraud brought against him. What in another man would be fresh of promise is in this great writer a simple defect of memory.

What! shall he whom the Duke of Montpensier has written to by special courier to come and arrange the Spanish marriage, whose doors are besieged by turbaned Turks with missives from the Dey of Tunis to come and hunt the lion with him on the plains of Africa, whom even the great Southern statesman so earnestly entreats to leave Belle France and come to America,—is this great character to bend his lordly mind and eyes to mean accounts with sordid tradesmen?

We humbly think not. M. Dumas conducted six novels in as many papers at one and the same time, couriers were ready day and night to bear off the glowing sheets to the cavernous presses as they flowed like burning lava from the fiery breast of the great composer, the "Theatre historique," with its immense popularity, was to be supplied with food, and the indefatigable manufacturer, grown pale and thin above the midnight lamp, must go abroad upon the Boulevards or take a trip into the country to recruit his health. Instead of the Boulevard he went to Spain, in place of the fields of Picardy to the deserts of Africa.

M. Dumas agreed to write one hundred volumes in a given time, he could only write some fifty or three score; is M. Dumas then to blame for the confidence he reposed in his mighty ge-him, or responsible for the money he has pocketed?

The world must arrive at the irresistible conclusion that the writer is a great genius, and that he overtops his adversaries in matters of finance a thousand cubits.

IX.

Careering onward, queenly in her pride
The maid upon her milk-white palfrey borne,
Seemed like the rosy goddess of the morn
When reigning in her coursers eagle-eyed
She shoots her radiant glances o'er the plains.
Above her raven locks a snowy wreath
Of every flower that blossoms on yon heath,
When May comes blooming with the April rains,
Shone like a diadem of pearl and gold!
And in her lily hand the bridal-rein
So closely lay, methought that it was fain
To linger ever, never quit its hold.
But oh disastrous chance! oh villain girth!
Why died not sheep before your wool had birth!

The author regrets to state that the reader, from a perusal of this short effusion, can gain no knowledge of the circumstances as they actually happened. A just regard for historical accuracy entails, however, an explanation. The "milk-white palfrey," who is subsequently designated as resembling the "eagled-eyed coursers" of the sun, was in reality a grey horse of unexceptionable gait and gentleness of temper, but somewhat deficient in that fiery vigor so happily expressed in the fourth verse. He is further not aware that the young lady was clad with airy grace, or that her fingers were filled with leaves and flowers as the great painter has represented his "young Aurora." He is still further compelled to state that the aforesaid accident took place in his attempt to assist the young lady to the ground.

The subject is one which, in itself, could not be supposed to interest, but a judicious embellishment has raised it from the mud of commonplace to the niche of poetic dignity.

Thus does the imaginative mind invest even the occurrences of every day life with a poetical coloring!

Fair Mexico! amid the blooming groves
That gem thy radiant and most happy land,
Where joyously the Aztec maiden roves
And weaves of orange flowers a golden band
For her fair brow far purer than their hue
At early morn, when bending toward the ground
They sparkle bright bespangled with the dew
Like chalices with jewels set around—
Methinks upon thy lofty table lands,
Or on the bright sands of thy gleaming shore,
With one whose slightest wishes were command
This weary heart might feel at last secure.
But then the general's mouth so hugous great!
I might 's well live contented with my state.

Rabelais, so happily cut out in profile by Mr. Pope, tells us of a certain giant who came near making a meal upon his hero and some pilgrim friars. Mother Goose also, that best of mothers, over whose memory we hang with mingled tears and laughter, relates a pleasing account of a young man called Thumb who met with nearly a similar fate.

We recollect the tremor of affright we experienced on perusing these narrations, and so strong is the force of early impressions, like the brand on the juvenile thief, that our mind has never entirely recovered its equanimity on the subject. This accounts for the sudden reflection which follows the interesting picture drawn by the author's imagination of "I might 's well live contented with my state."

XI.

Strange! that the man exists whose sterile soul
Finds nought of pleasure in the dædal earth,
Nor in the azure waves that grandly roll
Where the great sun will give the morrow birth—
Whose mind, entranced with sordid thirst of gain,
Neglects the vocal groves, the sunset glow
And smiling pity, turns with cold disdain
From the fair scenes that make a heaven below.
When Buena Vista rolled its lurid smoke
The cannon, drawn by oxen, passed me by,
Dull beasts, with heads bowed down beneath the yoke
Their feet on bleeding hearts that gave no sigh,
Behold your image, man of sordid clay!
A lifeless mass bright with no quickening ray!

The moralizing tone is here attempted, though the author is aware with only moderate success.

The soliloquy is supposed to be uttered by a pale young gentleman, walking with folded arms by moonlight and reflecting on the rebuff his disinterested affection has received from the refusal of some elderly curmudgeon to bestow on him the hand of his young and wealthy ward.

It does not appear whether there was a necessity for his presence at the remarkable battle, alluded to in the text, or not, as he might have seen in some newspapers an account of it. But the beautiful allusion to the guardian's neck as "beneath the yoke" of avarice, with his feet "on bleeding hearts," his own to wit and that of the young lady, we submit belong entirely to the aforesaid melancholic youth.

How completely are our opinions and feelings colored and moulded by circumstances over which we have no control! Alas! that we resemble so much the bubbles on the shoreless sea of time, cast hither and thither by the surging waves, buffeted by the winds of misfortune and going out at last like a candle burnt to the socket, suddenly, totally.

Into such a train of reflection is the contemplative mind at all times liable to be led!

XII.

Methought Niagara above thy whirl
I hovered on an angel's airy wings,
Cutting the smoky mists that upward curl,
And yielding me to dim imaginings.
"A change came o'er my dream"—in a small boat
Hurled with the speed of lightening to the brink,
I felt my cold heart leap up in my throat,
I see the boiling hell! I die, I sink!
"Awaking with a start," in elbow chair
I find myself so warm and softly lying,
I wonder how, through mighty tracts of air,
The frolic mind, like rapid rail-car flying,
"Played such fantastic tricks," as school-boy may,
Turning and tumbling on a holiday.

Oysters are not the most judicious fare for the evening meal. They frequently superinduce a disposition to violent starts in the sleep, caused by the strange and terrible nature of the individual's dreams. Our bed-fellow has frequently complained of ferocious assaults made upon him in the dead of night, which caused him, as he declared, great suffering. Strange to say we were, on the next morning, totally unconscious of the circumstance.

Another effect of these edibles is presented in the above. The mind, like the school-boy having a holiday, flies away to the ends of the world, to great waterfalls, tremendous chasms, and-so-forth, amusing itself on the way with "turning and tumbling," as expressed in the text.

We had intended to write a dissertation on this subject which, like Urn Burial and other matters which appear barren, is really full of interest and capable of a great display of learning and research, but in consideration of the fact that the reader is quite as well versed in the causes and results of the phenomenon, we refrain.

XIII.

As down the street she gaily trips along,
Her small feet twinkling like revolving wheels,
With joyous spirit caroling a song
Like that which from sweet Philomela steals—
I feel within my breast a happiness
Deeper than fathom line and all my heart
Goes forth to meet her, for I do confess
That little form, so lithely fair, is part
Of my own being, and lest Appius
Or any other villian should draw near
To steal the little dove to me so dear—
Hallo! you man there of the omnibus,
In one more year that little maid is mine
And with her cash it is my fate to shine.

How sweet to see the little maiden of fifteen summers tripping along, her satchel upon her arm, her wimple gathered over her sunny locks of waving gold, her delicate feet scarce seeming to come in contact with the material earth, her blue eye dancing with the joy of health, peace, and freedom from that bitter guest experience!

Pass on sweet one! Were I as thou my thoughts would not be now in trembling doubt upon the slippery verge of deep despair. Secure in faith and hope, my heart would rise like holy incense to the gates of heaven, and angels on their snowy wings of light would bear it weary, sad, to Paradise.

Pass on dear one! Thy heart is white and pure. No misty sophistries thy thoughts enmesh, for thou art moulded in the form of truth, and all thy spirit is unclouded yet with the deep gloom of the fast coming years.

Dear little maid! Would that like thine my heart were clear and every leaflet of its tables smooth from the deep traces of my many sins.

Pass on in peace, security; for o'er thy head the guardian angels watch, lest any impious hand should sully what was made so purely fair!

The author, cap in hand, solicits pardon of the reader for the above train of reflection which he can only defend upon the plea that his pen being new-nibbed ran away like a fiery horse.

He would further say that something seemed necessary to restore him to the reader's good opinion after the cold-blooded nature of the above performance—which he has translated into verse from the original prose overheard by the author.

XIV.

Before great Balsamo I stand amazed,
His wondrous tricks I view with dread delight
From that great meeting on the "Thunder Height,"
When lion-like he bore the swords that grazed
His dauntless breast, and showed no sign of fear,
To where with Andrée, Rohan, Althotas he poured
The mighty flood of crafty thought deep stored
In his great mind to Satan's only peer.
But when the thought obtrudes this thing did raise
In its degree the storm that round the head
Of Louis Philippe roared, the man who fed
Great Alexander in his youthful days—
We really have no pity for the king
Whose crimes provoked this deep, this bitter sting.

This, as the reader probably guesses, has reference to the well-known "Memoirs of a Physician," by M. Dumas, in which he agitates the questions which are now agitating Europe and presents the world with an account of the sayings and doings of the great magician Cagliostro, otherwise Count Fœnix, otherwise Acharat, otherwise Joseph Balsamo. The Count, according to his story, lived many ages, had seen the revolutions of Egypt, the Lower Empire and other countries, and was either a great benefactor or a great scoundrel—which we are not able to say from the confused notions of the age on these subjects. The work of M. Dumas is, however, undeniably great in many points, in interest, extent, gallicism and diffusion. The chief feature though, with the exception of a decided leer towards monarchy, is its ultra democracy. The reader is convinced of the virtues of the people by a picture of the vices of their rulers, and we may say that, taken altogether, the book, if it were readable, would be very striking.

We should do M. Dumas the justice to say, that he declares in his "Gaul and France," that when the day came he would cry as loud as any one, "Down with royalty," though he should couple it with another sentiment, to wit, "God save the King!"

XV.

Fair Cincinnati! on Ohio's side
Thou standest in thy beauty all-supreme!
Glassing thy lofty minarets in pride
On the smooth surface of the gliding stream.
The murmuring of the mighty river's voice,
The city's hum which rises from below,
The gurgling of the brooklets that rejoice,
The grunting of the sullen boar and sow—
All these are pleasant, for in one I feel,
The soothing influence of the vesper hour,
The gruntings softly o'er my senses steal,
For they are all-expressive and have power
To make me feel in purse the goody gold
Or newest bills in heavy masses rolled.

This place which has received the name of the "Queen City of the West," is well calculated to inspire the mind of an enthusiastic lover of creation like ourselves.

It is further celebrated for a large trade in Porkers, which are brought hither by the great Northern Canal and slaughtered to make a hecatomb or sacrifice to the aforesaid queen. The author has endeavored to combine these two characteristics in his production, and if the reader objects to the word "minarets," he can only say that Cincinnati, in his humble opinion, has as much right to minarets or spires, as Constantinople, or any other abode of unbelieving Mussulmen.

The address is supposed to be delivered by moonlight, from the hills which embower the city, and the romantic feelings suggested by the hour and scene, are beautifully subdued by the thoughts of emolument connected with the plaintive note of the swine.

Such are the enjoyments arising from a well-regulated mind!

XVI.

The shutters clap, the windows rattle o'er,
As if the hand of some old giant dread,
Such as the valiant Hero whilome bled,
Came from the North with frozen snow, all hoar,

And placed his thumb upon the chimney tops.
The trees are turning sere and leafless now,
While downward from each sadly naked bough
The mellow apple in the night-time drops.
I heard of late a cry, "Old Zack is come!"
And with it came the trumpets' high fanfare,
Thrilling the ears; and through the trembling air
The deep-mouthed triumph of the rumbling drum,
"Old Jack" indeed is come, for look! the pane
Is all o'er crusted with a silver stain!

"We should first inquire," says Longinus in his first book, "whether in reality there is any art of sublimity or greatness of conception." We would say, with modesty, that this question is now decided, and in proof, we would refer the reader to the initiatory verses of this beautiful performance. The pun though, attempted in the latter portion, is execrable; we have no hope of anticipating the reader in this opinion. We have only to say in defence, that we have frequently heard the name, Jack or John, pronounced by interesting young ladies in a manner which bears us out most fully.

He who gives credit to the mysterious coincidences between the psychological and material universe, will find much matter for thought in the fact that both of the above celebrated characters "came" at the same time, and further, that the life of the renowned General has been written by Mr. John Frost.

XVII.

Far on the summit of an Alpine range,
The setting sun unfolding all his form
His lurid light betokening a storm—
A figure stood yclad in garments strange!
Around him rose the darkly-verdant palm,
Embowering the grey peak where he stood,
And, stretching far below, for many a rood
A streamlet wound now furious, now calm.
The figure raised his arm; I saw his face,
All gaunt with hunger, dreary with despair,
Then with his nails the Sear his breast did tear,
Cursed the enslavers of his haughty race,
And plunging from the dizzy summits' verge,
I saw him sink far down, beneath the surge!

The intention of the author here, is to depict the death of the last of the Aztecs, and if his picture is not as striking as Sir Edward Bulwer's in the death of Warwic the "Kingmaker," on Barnet field, we would say in extenuation that the life, misfortunes and death of a poor Indian who lives for independence and dies when it dies, cannot naturally compare with that of a great nobleman who perishes in a heroic attempt to uphold his usurped authority.

Cortes was a great man, and his subtil powers of mind are no where shewn more strongly than in his last campaigns against the Mexicans. He refused to treat with them, he exterminated, for he saw at a glance that these were not men to yield their necks to the man who got upon the throne of their kings. Let the "Sad night" tell how they fought and—we say it modestly—let the death of the last Aztec tell how they died.

Nevertheless, the poet is not satisfied with his performance, in spite of the self-pleased chuckle which is visible behind this mask of modesty. The curse which from time immemorial it has been the rule to put in the mouths of these characters is wanting. It was further his intention to produce an effect at the same time terrific and touching, upon the reader.

Alas! how often do the endeavors of the best meaning persons end in disappointment!

XVIII.

At the mid hour of night, I wake to hear
 A low-toned voice of tenderness and love,
 Such as the ever moaning turtle dove,
 Deep in yon leafy elm gives to the air—
 A voice which like the music of the lyre
 Touched by a master-hand, and o'er the seas
 Borne on the swift wings of the flying breeze,
 Brings yet some dim reflections of that fire
 Which gilded o'er our youth—a voice most dear—
 Most tearful, full of mournful tenderness,
 Such as in places of our happiness,
 In times by gone, we feel. The burning tear
 Uprushes from my heart and all my soul,
 Is buried in the waves that o'er it roll.

The only spot which detracts from the blaze of excellence in this beautiful specimen of thought and feeling, is the unwarrantable appropriation of a sentiment from the writings of a poet called Tennyson, who, before the publication of the "New Timon," that "greatest poem of the age," enjoyed some reputation in England. The

"Tears from the depth of some divine despair . . .
 In looking on the happy Autumn fields,
 And thinking of the days that are no more,"

are the lines here alluded to. The only reflection which aids to comfort the author, is that the aforesaid Mr. Tennyson is exceedingly obscured, almost annihilated indeed by the drastic and overwhelming blows of the great writer, upon whose shoulders has fallen the mantle of Shakspeare.

The author of the "Princess" and other pieces, is entirely out of fashion for the time therefore, and to this circumstance is to be attributed the present imitation, which is no longer liable to discovery by the world or redemption by its disconsolate parents.

TO SUSAN.

Maiden! like a fair spring blossom
 Thou art in thy dreaming youth.
 Purest sweets within thy bosom,
 Thoughts of tenderness and truth.

On thy cheek are youth's bright roses,
 Beauty's light within thine eye,
 And each radiant glance discloses
 Dreams of love and poesy.

Like the poets high-wrought dreaming
 Is thine image unto me—
 For its very brightness seeming
 A most lovely mystery.

With a spirit bright and queenly,
 Dwelling in thy dreams apart;
 Lusting tranquilly, serenely,
 To the music in thy heart.

Holy voices ever swelling
 In a sweet triumphal song,
 As if from some far off dwelling,
 Unseen spirits round thee throng.

Tell me thou whose song entrances
 What sweet thoughts with thee abide?
 Love-light dwelleth in thy glances,
 In thy smile unconscious pride."

Surely in thine unstained spirit,
 Love must make its holiest shrine;
 Veiled hearts like thine inherit
 Truth and fervor half divine.

Thou so bright, so rarely gifted—
 Child of genius, song and love,
 Be thy spirit ever lifted

E'en while fame's fair laurel wearing,
 Cherish that brighter part—
 Mid the world's vain glory bearing Woman's pure, unsullied heart.

MUSIC!

"Eat your Italianos! for my part I likes a simple ballat."

I desire, Mr. Editor, with your leave, to lay before the public my deplorable condition, in respect of music. This I do partly, I confess, in the hope of being consoled by sympathy; but, chiefly, from a benevolent desire to warn others against the evils, into which I am fallen.

I am a widower of—of—suppose we say of middle age. I have two daughters, one of whom is grown, and the other nearly so. They are good girls, and (in my eyes at least) sensible enough, and passably handsome. I have spared no pains in their education, nor any expense that my income would allow. Residing in the country, I have compelled myself to forego the solace of their society, for the last three or four years, that they might enjoy the best opportunities for instruction at the city schools—I beg pardon—I believe I should say "institutions." Well sir, they have passed through the usual routine. Milly—who is the oldest, graduated some six months ago: and her sister is now in the last year of the academic course, which will terminate, I presume, in the customary diploma.

My eldest daughter, who has been now some time at home, appears to have profited greatly by her studies, so far as I can judge. Her acquaintance with botany, geology, physics, and metaphysics—besides some other branches, that I cannot recollect the names of, is the admiration of the neighbors. For my own part, I get lost very often when I try to converse with her; but my own schooling was very limited, and my deficiencies are not to be wondered at.

All this is very well, indeed, and I am glad my money was laid out to such advantage. But—ah! these buts—there is one particular, in which I feel grievously disappointed.

I have been all my life a dear lover of music. The mother of my dear children, who is now a saint in Heaven, first won my heart, by her delightful voice. She sung—oh! my dear sir, you cannot conceive, with what taste and feeling—the beautiful old English ballads, and the exquisite songs from Rosina—And then, the unrivalled Scotch and Irish melodies—ah! me, I fancy I can hear her tones yet vibrating in my ear!—Alas! I shall never hear them again on earth.

Excuse my emotion, I pray you, sir. To proceed—it was my most anxious wish that my girls should be proficient in this charming accomplishment. I besought them to be diligent in their musical studies, and urged upon their teachers my extreme solicitude upon this subject. All parties promised me that my injunctions should be complied with: and I consoled my solitude with anticipating the delight of hearing my old hall echo once more with the melody of other days.

Milly came home. Now, thought I, now shall I reap the reward of all my self-denial. I had brought home a splendid rosewood piano—half a dozen octaves or more—it cost me $500. My daughter sat down to it, and dashed off a brilliant prelude, as if to try the tone of the instrument. Presently, she glided into a lively symphony, and began singing; but, imagine my surprise, when, instead of one of my old favorites, she struck up the refrain—

"De boatman dance, de boatman sing,
De boatman up to every thing."

When she had concluded, I choked down my disappointment, and, with a little compliment, (uttered, I confess, with some difficulty,) I asked her to play something else. Then followed "Dandy Jim of Caroline"—"Lubly gall, can't you come out to-night"—"It'll nebbber do, to gib it up so, Mr. Brown"—"Old Joe"—"Old Aunt Sally"—and a score of others, of which (I heartily thank Heaven) my memory does not retain a distinct impression. In vain, I asked for "Mary Morrison"—"The Last Rose of Summer," or "Her mouth which a smile." My poor Milly's mouth opened with a smile indeed—but it was a smile of compassionate astonishment. She had never heard of them—nobody ever sung such old fashioned things. I found my girl was indissolubly wedded to the Africans, and I groaned in spirit at the horrid amalgamation. I never again invited her to the piano—I could not so desecrate the memories of the past—and, when she does entertain visitors in this way, I generally betake myself to the back porch, and a pipe of tobacco.

However, I had a chance left—Maggie had not yet finished her education; and I determined she should be taught something better than the recreations of the flat boat and the corn-shucking. So, when she returned to school, I addressed a letter to the lady superintendent, in which I strongly condemned this style of music, and begged that she might be instructed in a more refined school. A very satisfactory answer was sent back. I was told that the former music-master had been dismissed, and a "Professor" employed, of the very highest reputation. From time to time, I received the most gratifying assurances of Maggie's rapid improvement. At last, my impatience to hear her became so great, that I resolved on a journey to the metropolis. After a long repose of some seventeen years, I made ready once more to mingle in the crowd of mankind, and brushed up my old clothes and old manners for the occasion. To Richmond I made my way, in company with our county members, and lost no time in finding out the house, where my daughter was placed. As soon as I decently could, after answering her natural inquiries about home and friends, I requested her to take her seat at the piano, which stood in the parlor. She complied with alacrity: and I must own that I was delighted with her magnificent execution—"No more negro melodies," said I to myself, "that touch betokens elegance of a different sort." Alas! I rejoiced too soon. The songs came in due course—but not my songs. First, she "dreamt that she dwelt in marble halls," till all my illusions were most painfully dispelled. Then she was "a Bayadere"—and next a "Bohemian Girl"—and so on, through half a dozen transformations, which appeared to me to smack very strongly of stage costume and foot-lights. Finally, she broke into some outlandish dialect, (which I am told is Italian,) and in which there was a wonderful repetition of "Pizzicaa" and "Spasimis," and "ardors," "si, si's" and "tra-la-las," absolutely without end. There was evidently a vast amount of passion in it, for, in all my life, I never heard such quavering, and trilling, and screaming, and agony, while the keys of the piano groaned and squeaked, as if in the extremest torture. How I endured it all, I cannot tell. My brow was bathed in perspiration—my breath came and went as if I labored under asthma—I feared every instant to see my poor child burst a blood-vessel—and my joy, when she got up safe and sound from the music-stool, swallowed up every other feeling.

But when I got to bed that night, I tossed and tumbled, in a tumult of uncomfortable reflections. I saw plainly that I was lamentably in the rear of "the spirit of the age"—Were I twenty years younger, I might hope to overtake it: but, as it is, I have not strength or courage to attempt the pursuit. I may die—but to "head it" is impossible—I shall submit to my fate—I go home to-morrow, and leave my Maggie to finish her career at school. I shall prepare for the dethronement of my household gods, and make way for the joint dynasty of Ethiopia and Italy. Revolutions never go backward—and the detestable usurpation must be consummated.

But I solemnly caution my friends, and contemporaries, to take warning by my example, and avoid the rocks upon which my music hath suffered disastrous shipwreck.

I am sir, very truly yours,

SANDY STUBBLEFIELD.

OLD VIRGINIA INN, }
December 1st, 1848. }

P. S.—I observe that my daughters write their names "Amélie" and "Marguerite." But I solemnly declare, that they were not so bestowed by their sponsors in baptism.

P. S. No. 2.—I had forgotten, in the extremity of my grief touching the music, to take notice of some innovations in the matter of dancing, which rather conflict with my old fashioned opinions. I find that names and things have undergone great changes—reels and country dances, (to say nothing of the grand old minuets) are among the things that were; and the fantastic toes of the rising generation, flourish in figures that would startle the propriety of our good old mothers, could they "revisit the glimpses of the moon." Thank heaven, my own daughters are not much infected with this disease, and I trust, in the seclusion of the country, they may escape further contagion.

SONNETS.

I.

Bell! if that old, exploded creed were true,
Which made the bright stars arbiters of fate,
What a long Heaven of bliss might I, and you,
And all, who love like us—anticipate—
For oh! how could they prophesy of wo
Those mild, forgiving stars, that lend their light,
Even to the clouds, enshrouding them from sight—
Like Goodness smiling on a treacherous foe—
And through the long, dark night are ever shining—
Alike on joy, and hearts in sadness pining—
This life would be a path ornate with flowers,
Darkened it may be, by some transient showers,
But they would be of April; only given,
That Earth might not become too much like Heaven.

II.

And do they not, dear Bell, in sooth possess,
One half the power of which old legends tell?—
An influence to hallow, and to bless—
Calypso's wand of love, not Circe's spell?
Look on them in their beauty, as they shower
Smiles on each other, light upon the earth,
And joy and peace on all of mortal birth;
And then deny them, life, and love, and power.
Ah! we at least should yield them sovereignty,
For the same stars shone on our natal hour,
An earnest that our hearts may one day be Folded like leaves, within the self-same flower,
To bloom and fade together: Sweet, with thee,
This were indeed—a glorious destiny.

CHANNING.*

BY H. T. TUCKERMAN.

Half a century ago, there might have been seen threading the streets of Richmond, a diminutive figure with a pale, attenuated face, eyes of spiritual brightness, an expansive and calm brow, and movements of nervous alacrity. An abstraction of manner and intentness of expression denoted the scholar, while the scrupulously neat, yet worn attire, as clearly evidenced restricted means and habits of self-denial. The youth was one of those children of New England braced by her discipline, and early sent forth to earn a position in the world, by force of character and activity of intellect. He was baptized into the fraternity of Nature by the grandeur and beauty of the sea as it breaks along the craggy shore of Rhode Island; the domestic influences of a Puritan household had initiated him into the moral convictions; and the teachings of Harvard yielded him the requisite attainments to discharge the office of private tutor in a wealthy Virginia family. Then and there, far from the companions of his studies and the home of his childhood, through secret conflicts, devoted application to books and meditation, amid privations, comparative isolation, and premature responsibility, he resolved to consecrate himself to the christian ministry. Illness had subdued his elasticity, care shadowed his dreams, and retirement solemnized his desires. Thence he went to Boston, and for more than forty years pursued the consistent tenor of his way as an eloquent divine and powerful writer, achieving a wide renown, bequeathing a venerated memory and a series of discourses, reviews and essays, which, with remarkable perspicuity and earnestness, vindicate the cause of freedom, the original endowments and eternal destiny of human nature, the sanctions of religion and "the ways of God to man." Sectarian controversy, the duties of the pastoral office, journeys abroad and at home, intercourse with superior minds and the seclusion made necessary by disease,—the quiet of home, the refining influence of literary taste and the vocations of citizen, father and philanthropist, occupied those intervening years. He died one beautiful October evening at Bennington, Vermont, while on a summer excursion, and was buried at Mount Auburn. A monument commemorates the gratitude of his parishioners and the exalted estimation he had acquired in the world. A biography prepared by his nephew, recounts the few incidents of his career, and gracefully unfolds the process of his growth and mental history.

It is seldom that ethical writings interest the multitude. The abstract nature of the topics they discuss, and the formal style in which they are usually embodied, are equally destitute of that popular charm that wins the common heart. A remarkable exception is presented in the literary remains of Channing. The simple yet comprehensive ideas upon which he dwells, the tranquil gravity of his utterance, and the winning clearness of his style, render many of his productions universally attractive as examples of quiet and persuasive eloquence. And this result is entirely independent of any sympathy with his theological opinions, or experience of his pulpit oratory. Indeed, the genuine interest of Dr. Channing's writings is ethical. As the champion of a sect, his labors have but a temporary value; as the exponent of a doctrinal system, he will not long be remembered with gratitude, because the world is daily better appreciating the religious sentiment as of infinitely more value than any dogma; but as a moral essayist, some of the more finished writings of Channing will have a permanent hold upon reflective and tasteful minds. His nephew has compiled his biography with singular judgment. He has followed the method of Lockhart in the life of Scott. As far as possible, the narrative is woven from letters and diaries,—the subject speaks for himself, and only such intermediate observations of the editor are given as are necessary to form a connected whole. Uneventful as these memoirs are, they are interesting as revelations of the process of culture, the means and purposes of one whose words have winged their way, bearing emphatic messages, over both hemispheres,—who, for many years, successfully advocated important truths; and whose memory is one of the most honored of New England's gifted divines.

To Dr. Channing's style is, in a great degree, ascribable the popularity of his writings; and we are struck with its remarkable identity from the earliest to the latest period of his career. A petition to Congress, penned while a student at the University, which appears in these volumes, has all its prominent characteristics—its brief sentences, occasionally lengthened where the idea requires it—its emphasis, its simplicity, directness and transparent diction. This is a curious evidence of the purely meditative existence he must have passed; for it is by attrition with other minds and subjection to varied influences, that the style of writing as well as the tone of manners undergoes those striking modifications which we perceive in men less intent upon a few thoughts. His character is, therefore, justly described as more indebted to "the influences of solitary thought than of companionship." Such is the process by which all truth becomes clearly impressed and richly developed to consciousness; on the same principle that, according to Mary Wollstonecraft, reflection is necessary to the realization even of a great passion. "I derive my sentiments from the nature of man," says one of Channing's letters. Perhaps it would have been more strictly true if he had said one man; for an inference we long ago derived from his writings, we find amply confirmed in these memoirs—that he was a very inadequate observer. Some of his attempts to portray character are as complete fancy-sketches as we ever perused. They show an utter blindness to the real traits even of familiar persons. Beautiful in themselves, it is usually from the graceful drapery of his imagination that the charm is derived. Indeed, Dr. Channing hardly came near enough to see the features in their literal significance. He drew almost exclusively from within. His subjects were what the lay-figure is to the artist—frames for his thoughts to deck with effective costume. When he reasoned of a truth or an idea, he was more at home; for in the abstract he was at liberty to expatiate, without keeping in view the actual relations of things—the stern facts and bare realities of life and character. Indeed, nothing can be more delightful to a refined and thoughtful mind, than to follow Channing in his exposition of a striking idea or truth—so clearly and dispassionately stated, then gradually unfolded to its ultimate significance, with, here and there, a striking illustration; and then wound up, like a fine strain of music, which seems to raise us more and more into light and tranquillity on invisible pinions!

Physical causes had no inconsiderable effect in modifying the action and shaping the career of Dr. Channing. His early letters exhibit a phase of character, which almost totally disappears as he advanced in life. A romantic hue, a spirit of good-fellowship, natural and beautiful in youth, and a sympathy with national and political movements, indicate that his original tendencies would have led to statesmanship, literature, or a still more active vocation. The solitude in which he lived at the South, as tutor in a private family, his early responsibility consequent on the death of his father, his narrow pecuniary resources and an illness which forever shattered his originally vigorous constitution,—all combined to thrust him, as it were, back upon himself; to bring him in contact with stern and oppressive realities at an early age, and render peculiarly vivid the consciousness of wants, capacities, and infirmities which only slowly and, as it were, incidentally, are revealed to less sensitive and thoughtful minds. Hence religion, both from his instinct and his circumstances, became early a necessity; and truth the only sustaining aliment of his lonely and aspiring heart. We are not surprised that a man so constituted should find his experience opposed to the fallacious notion that youth is necessarily the happiest season of life. Lord Bacon says, that natures so liable to great perturbations, only attain the self-command, and aptitude so requisite for action, at maturity. To such, existence is too oppressive, at first, to be pleasurable. There must intervene an epoch of struggle and conflict. The sensibilities cloud perception; doubt obscures truth; emotion prohibits calmness. Through repeated experiments, long reflection, vague excitement and alternations of fear and hope, the spirit gradually wins its advent into clearness and trust. Harmony is induced after repeated discords. A genuine relation to life and nature is, by degrees only, made apparent and confidently seized upon. Chaos must come again, as it did to the baffled warrior, ere peace succeeds disappointment, and faith perplexity. In these memoirs, this transition is distinctly marked, and was gratefully realized.

To chasten and subdue feeling was, in his view, no small part of a wise morality. Among the chief attractions of a future state to him, was the reconciliation which he believed would there occur between the reason and the heart. It was this attempt to suppress emotion which gave to his elocution its persuasive charm. The depth of the under-current was revealed by a prolonged intonation, almost tremulous yet singularly firm—suggesting a power restrained, a sensibility overawed by reverence—than which no phase of oratory is more truly affecting. And yet the man who could so impress an audience, seldom called out, in personal intercourse, any of the latent sentiment of others. He inspired respect more than he won confidence. His thoughts interested his friends more than himself. His name was an exponent of certain principles associated with human progress and moral truth, rather than an endearing household spell. In conversation he appeared mainly intent upon gleanings from his auditors new facts to aid his own speculations. If they had seen a new country, undergone a peculiar experience, or reflected deeply on general truth, he sought, by rigid inquiry, to elicit the result. Thus as a moralist, he pursued the same course as Goethe in his literary vocation—seeking to make his fellow creatures objective, recoiling from assimilation, and repelling all sympathetic approach, in order to render them subservient to a professional end. It is hardly extravagant to say that men of this stamp,—that is, with great self-esteem and at the same time metaphysical, artistic or philanthropic tastes, regard human nature very much as geologists regard the earth—as a wonderful cabinet on a grand scale, whence to draw gems of truth, or specimens of character, for the advantage of mankind.

Notwithstanding the apparent enthusiasm in regard to military prowess, it is evident that moral courage is better understood as civilization advances. The conviction has dawned even upon the common mind that tranquilly and with firmness to withstand public opinion, in a righteous cause, and be loyal to personal convictions, demands a manliness of character as rare as it is noble. No small part of the energy which lends impressiveness to Dr. Channing's writings, arises from the exercise of this valorous disposition. To one who witnessed the scene, for instance, when his election sermon was delivered in Boston, there remains a deep sense of the power of truthful oratory. In this discourse, he elaborately defined his idea of freedom. Every sentence commencing, "I call that mind free," told upon the audience. As he described the narrowing effect of bigotry, some of the prominent representatives of a tyrannical priestcraft, actually writhed in their seats; and those who sympathized in the largeness and elevation of his doctrine, exhibited in their enkindled faces, the best response to his earnest plea for the spontaneous and untrammelled action of individual thought.

We demur somewhat to one of Dr. Channing's favorite opinions—the equality of human nature. In his zeal for the dignity of man, he overlooks not a few of the indisputable facts of nature; and indeed often manifests an unphilosophical dislike to recognize what is opposed to his own views, however true. Thus, in a letter to Combe acknowledging a copy of his work on Man, he says—"The phrenological part I fear did me little good. I have a strong aversion to theories which subject the mind to the body." Such is by no means the case with phrenology justly interpreted;—it being rather the science of connection between material and spiritual attributes—indicating their mutual relation; but, were it otherwise, the question for a great thinker to decide is as to its truth; he must reverently explore, not presuppose, the laws of nature. In regard to human equality, more impartial observation would have led Dr. Channing to realize permanent natural distinctions in his fellow-creatures. There is, unquestionably, a nobility based upon this diversity—an aristocracy which no institutions can repudiate—it being a great natural fact. That the capacity of progress exists almost universally, we are not disposed to contradict; but history and experience are continually demonstrating the superiority of innate over acquired influences. Character has been most aptly defined as an instinct. Many of Dr. Channing's views were derived purely from his own individual sense of a truth; very few of them from a wide and inductive observation. He was a man of the closet, a looker-on in the world,—thoughtful, conscientious and deeply interested in many of the grand problems to be solved,—yet too far removed from the scene to estimate all its agencies, or perceive its entire consequences. Thus, in his essay on Napoleon, he weighs him in the balance of disinterested virtue and finds the modern conqueror infinitely wanting; but of the relation in which his achievements stand to the past and future, in a grand providential scheme of social regeneration, he seems never to have dreamed.

The influence exerted and the reputation acquired by Dr. Channing, is a striking instance of the triumph of consistency. The absence of versatility in his nature is remarkable. We scarcely know a parallel case in regard to any writer so generally recognized as eloquent. The traces of personal experience, observation of nature, or intimacy with books, are comparatively rare. Everywhere we discern the evidences of a life apart from human interests as they usually affect the individual. He reasons like one who has no personal stake in the issue of the question. A tone of superiority, a conscious exemption from the ruling passion of the hour, make him often appear like a judicious and benevolent arbitrator between humanity and the world, rather than a participant in the struggles, griefs and pleasures of life. This partly arises from the singleness of purpose and unity of thought to which we have alluded. He harps always on one string. His mind revolves around a few great truths. He is like one who looks upon a wide landscape through the single loophole of an isolated and majestic tower. The music of his soul is often grand, but it is, after all, a monotone. His favorite theme was the essential dignity of human nature, its capacity of progress and immortal destiny. Upon these convictions he founded his moral system; and his various essays and addresses are only varied illustrations of their claims. The process of his mental development seems to have been little more than frequent and continuous reflection upon these ideas; and the power over other minds which he thus attained, is a proof of the superior value of concentration over the diffusive culture of the age. Dr. Channing appears to have shrunk from great familiarity with other minds even through their writings. We perceive no evidence of that cordial sympathy with authors, which breaks out so genially in the correspondence of other gifted men. His criticism on Milton is rather an intellectual recognition of his genius than an affectionate tribute. In fact, in his studies as in his life, the predominant aim seems to have been self-possession. As he was accustomed to envelop his delicate frame with the utmost care, to guard against the bleak atmosphere, so he strove to throw a mantle of reserve around his spirit;—shunning the gregarious, intimate and familiar, and seeking to draw from others aliment to his own mind, rather than buffet with them the waves of controversy, or mingle with them the glow of emotion or the stream of thought.

This unsocial disposition is likewise, in no small degree, referable to the reaction of an impressive organization. His biographer judiciously defends it by declaring that Dr. Channing was "keenly sensitive to the morbid feelings by which untuned spirits communicate their discord even to one who has attained serenity." It is said of Bonaparte that he could, by an effort of will, discharge his face of all expression; and there are persons who, in a similar manner, can ward off the ungenial, while in contact with it, by inducing an abstracted or antagonistic mood. Channing seems to have been so alive to physical and moral influences, that his comfort was only secured by an icy barrier which chilled intruders. It is singular, however, to observe, that while he felt it to be his sacred, individual right thus to keep others shivering in the vestibule of his soul's temple, towards the race in general, the community at large, the broad interests of society, he appears to have been always conscious of a very near and responsible affinity. He writes of the elevation of the laboring classes, the destinies of Europe and the political aspects of his own country, as if they were somewhat assigned to his keeping. He seems always to feel, in regard to "human nature," as Hazlitt declares Wordsworth does towards the outward universe, a personal interest. Sometimes it would almost appear as if he were in a manner accountable, as an individual, for the advancement of the race; as if he were a prophet or a law-giver commissioned like those who ruled and guided the chosen people of God. He often speaks "as one having authority." This tone, though to the practical observer it is sometimes amusing, was doubtless instinctive. Dr. Channing consciously felt that the legitimate scope for his thought and inspiration for his feelings, lay in progressive views of society and widely-diffused sympathy for man.

The remark of one of the schoolfellows of Channing when the latter was cited as an example—"it is easier for him to be good"—at once recognizes a peculiar moral idiosyncrasy. We need but to glance over the records of biography to perceive that there is a distinct class of men who represent the saintly, as others do the heroic and political character. The retracy in which such natures ripen, was sought of old in the hermitage and convent; and now, as in the instance before us, in a kind of self-imposed monachism. It is, however, a serious question whether, after all, this is a healthful species of moral development. Let any human being of strong will, live upon a fixed system of meditative retirement, and his passions will grow calm, his interest in outward life diminish, and, with the requisite temperament, he easily becomes rapt in spiritual ecstasies. When a man is endowed with remarkable conscientiousness and veneration, as well as gifts of mind, he seems ordained to promulgate truth and quicken in others the sentiments so active in himself. Such was the case with Dr. Channing. Yet to us his memory is hallowed, because he was so "clear in his great office," rather than from an unreserved admiration of his personal example. As a moral rhetorician, his labors have reflected honor on his name and country; as a man—there were peculiarities arising from education, physical constitution, and tendencies of nature, which rendered him a very incomplete representative of humanity. No one more eloquently discoursed of philanthropy; but his interest in man, in the abstract, was no test of his ready sympathy with the individual. Indeed, we have observed one trait in modern philanthropists which has sometimes reconciled us to the culture of humbler virtues. They are, generally speaking, the last men to whom are confided personal griefs, or whose exclusive amity is sought. They generalize with the heart as well as the mind; burn with indignation at the wrongs inflicted on the natives of Africa, while often profoundly indifferent to the true welfare of one of their own household. How often some desolate human being, touched by their written appeals in behalf of a distant class of sufferers, is inspired with confidence to make them the recipients of secret troubles—to seek from them counsel and encouragement in loneliness and doubt. A benevolent father of the Catholic church, by the mere claim of his vocation,—a warm-hearted sailor by the very candid generosity of his soul, or one of Nature's sisters of charity—encountered, as they are, in all the circles of life—were a surer ark of refuge. The views of the professed lover of his race are too expansive. His benevolence is purely speculative. His sympathy with man, is like that which the mere botanist has for a flower, or the surgeon for a human form. It is rather professional than natural; and he who has sought a conference with such in order to relieve his overcharged heart, finds his utterance choked, his tears frozen, and every hope of recognition die within him! In these remarks, we design no indiscriminate application to the revered subject of the memoir before us. He accomplished good enough in his own way—perhaps the only one in which his efficiency was certain; but we desire to repudiate the common notion, that usefulness—in its highest sense—is confined to those broad fields of philanthropic enterprise, which an influential class among us seems to regard as the only legitimate arena of benevolence. We remember, as if it were but yesterday, at the close of a winter's day, soon after Dr. Channing's return from Europe, when his slender form all at once appeared before a group of mourners—one of the families of his parish, who were bereaved, during his absence, of their dearest earthly friend. As he stood among them in the twilight, and the flickering blaze revealed his high and placid brow,—the eyes of one of those motherless children—(in whose mind his image was associated with the sweetest counsels of maternal tenderness, and upon whom his priestly hand had been laid in baptism)—instinctively sought his face with a penetrating glance,—a silent appeal for some word of solace in that dark hour. At length he spoke—but it was to exclaim, "What a mysterious Providence!" The scene had awakened a speculative reverie, and not one tear of commiseration. His mind was busy in the attempt to reconcile to itself a sad visitation; but his heart swelled not at the sight of the young band left alone to the perils of the world. And when he rose to depart, and looked back upon them, it was only to remark, "I am going to my solitary home." His own family had not yet returned from their country residence. In a few days at least, their presence would brighten his fireside, while those he left, were destined for years to a home made solitary by death! This incident illustrates the truth we design to suggest—that the sympathetic and reflective character have distinct provinces of action, and that any one who, from the perusal of these interesting memoirs, should deem their subject a model to be practically adopted, with a view to attain the same moral results, would commit an egregious error. The truth is, the essence of Dr. Channing's life appears in his writings. There he emitted the vital aura of his few days of health. There he embodied the energy of feeling which other and less distinguished men give to the offices of friendship and love. He found, at an early age, that he must decide between the free exercise of social habits and feelings, and a sphere of utility based essentially upon contemplation. Had he possessed a greater mobility of character, power of adaptation, and facility of intercourse; especially had the affections of his nature been as individual as his intellectual processes, he would instinctively have cultivated the social duties and sentiments, and recognized in them, no small part of the grace and benignity of life. But his ill-health, the stern influences of his early life, the habit so remarkable in New England of regarding character at the two extremes of right and wrong; and suspecting all zest of life as intrinsically evil, led him to cherish will beyond sentiment, to feel with singular force, the responsibility incident to the right of choice in action; and hence to lean towards stoicism and penance. It is true, that as years advanced, the overstrained chords were a little relaxed, and he began to realize how much innocent delight is attainable through a receptive, truthful, genial spirit. He observed to one of his most intimate companions, as this softer experience dawned upon his mellow faculties,—that perhaps he had made a grand mistake—perhaps the most happy and satisfactory life was one passed in the free and earnest exercise of the affections and sympathies.

Egotism was a striking trait in Dr. Channing. He was jealous of the least encroachment upon his own individuality. The first person singular constantly appears on every page of his writings; and we learn from the letters now first published, that his views of mental philosophy corresponded with this egotistical instinct. There is a curious subject of speculation and one which we believe has not yet been satisfactorily discussed—the relation of egotism to genius and virtue. A peculiar self-confidence, in a certain sphere, uniformly characterizes great men in every department. Indeed, an ingenious writer* almost makes it appear, that decision of character is the essence of all superiority—and this is but the result of personal conviction—or faith in the results of one's own thoughts. Where this quality predominates—if united with any real moral or intellectual ability, it renders its possessor, in a measure, oracular. His opinions are rather announced as truths than suggested as possibilities. His calm trust in himself communicates itself to his writings and acts, and hence the authority they exert over the multitude. We deem this vivid sense of personality—this disposition to view all subjects in the light of conscious reflection, as the trait which gives nerve and clearness to Dr. Channing's diction, and impressiveness to his style. He had the serious, collected air of one who had enjoyed special revelations; who occupied a higher platform than his fellows, and like the mystics of the east,—by a singular discipline and seclusion, had attained clearer glimpses of the unseen and the eternal. Egotism, if it does not betray itself offensively, is a vast source of influence. We forgive even its disagreeable manifestations, when united with genius or character. As a man of action, Napoleon was the greatest egotist that ever lived; and how much his success was enhanced and secured by the unwavering confidence this quality inspires! The boorishness of Dr. Johnson was forgiven because of the sense which underlaid his dogmatism. Dr. Channing's egotism was that of a moralist. He enunciated his views of man's nature and duties in the same authoritative style that the bard of Rydal interprets the revelations of nature, or Davy expounds a scientific discovery.

There is a fresh-water spring that gushes up through the sea on the Genoese coast, and by the force of its jet reaches the surface untinged with the brine around it. Dr. Channing's ideal of virtue was apparently to preserve an inward force whereby his nature could penetrate and rise above adjacent life without imbibing its qualities;—intact, free and sustained. His loyalty to this principle undoubtedly is one cause of his clearness, force and persuasive rhetoric. Perhaps it was the only course for such a man to pursue; and its results sufficiently prove its efficiency. Yet it would be a great error to urge its universal adoption. As a moralist Dr. Channing chiefly erred by deriving nearly all truth from his own consciousness. He was eminently fitted to attain harmony through meditation. His genius was essentially monastic. But the greater number of human beings can only improve through a sympathetic culture. They assimilate the means of growth and inward felicity through love rather than will. They advance in proportion as they forget themselves in "an idea dearer than self," and instead of purposing individual good as an ultimate end to be consciously sought, they instinctively yield themselves up to nature, truth and affection to work what results they may. It has been thus with great men. It was so with Shakespeare and Burns. It is so with the adventurous, the poetical and the heroic character. To fall back upon consciousness, to isolate life, to seek a superhuman alliance with truth, would be to mar and enfeeble both their usefulness and virtue. It is surely possible to fraternize without losing identity, to accept the graceful, the wise and the kindly agencies of life, without compromising any private right. Yet, according to the school of which Dr. Channing is the most eminent exponent, there is something dangerous and fearful in the social order instituted by God. Emerson thinks we should "sit like gods on separate peaks." In the spirit of this philosophy there is a certain degree of truth. Poets and sages have emphatically indicated the office of solitude, as holy, mysterious and desirable; but when the exclusive principle is suffered to overlay elements equally important, we protest against it as false, irrational and inhuman.

One problem, therefore, irresistibly suggests itself in the contemplation of such a life and its results—the comparative worth of individualism and sympathy. Dr. Channing embodied a principle that lies at the foundation of modern philosophy and constitutes the distinctive feature of German literature. He esteemed intuition far above observation; he looked chiefly within and seldom around for truth; in a word, he fortified his own moral nature and dwelt therein, scarcely ever yielding himself to the outward, the distant or the familiar. This is the tone of his writings and the spirit of his character; and to this we cannot but refer much that was peculiar and enduring in his agency. In a general point of view and in regard to the majority of human beings, perhaps it is neither feasible nor desirable that individualism should be so completely realized. Yet it seems the characteristic which almost universally belongs to the functions of genius and conscience; and in this age of multitudinous experiment, and in this country of broad and varied external activity, no lesson can be brought home with more needful advantage. It is deeply interesting to trace its gradual and concentrated influence, its distinguished fruits and limitless associations as unfolded in these pages.

To produce an adequate impression either in literature or art two conditions are indispensable—a command of the materials and an effective subject. Language is the medium of the rhetorician, ideas his vantage ground. Over the latter Channing obtained a characteristic mastery. Without the subtle tact of the poet, he possessed a grasp of expression whereby he effectually made words the vehicle of truth—rapid, direct and significant. In opposition to the hopeless theories of life and destiny nourished by the gloomy theology which prevailed originally in his native region, he seized upon certain expansive and encouraging thoughts based on the latent powers of the soul; and these he strenuously developed as motives of action and pledges of growth. The existence of conscience, will and moral sensibility in man, few have the perverseness to deny; and from these he deduced high conceptions of the ability and rights of our common nature. To aspiring, gentle and lofty souls such appeals came as divine auguries. Upon such, the influence of his discourses fell with a cheering import. They awoke a faith in the recuperative energy of the moral instincts. They sounded like the summons of a clarion amid the desolate gloom of remorseful meditation. They quickened into new life the repressed elasticity of the mind; and by imparting a consciousness of power, called into action hopes, aims and sentiments, which, unevoked, might have long slumbered in impotent despair. This was a high service. Let it be duly honored. We believe it to be the only process by which a class of men, among the noblest of their kind, can be effectually roused and comforted; and in view of the sphere of utility thus realized, it is scarcely grateful to criticize the example which these memoirs reveal. Yet, there is a vast difference between character and thought, opinion and life, habit and genius. For the truths to which Channing attached such inestimable value, we refer to his writings; for a portrait of the man, we are indebted to his biographer, and that suggests many inferences which serve to throw new light upon the actual relation between personality and faith. One great principle we everywhere see displayed is that the generation of an inward force is the great end of all that deserves the name of education. Not in scholarship, readiness, tact or discipline—but in the capacity to think wisely, to feel truly, to act justly, lies the absolute greatness of man. It is in vain to evade or conceal this primal fact. In Channing's own words, "to get a disposable strength of intellect," is after all the one thing needful in all genuine mental culture. Doubtless this is to be attained in various ways, according to the tendencies and gifts of the individual; in his case it was by meditative rather than external intentness that the boon was sought and found. And to enforce this law, as the requisite of similarly constituted beings, seems to us the essential truth to be gleaned from these volumes. It is only partially recognized in our systems of education and individual theories. Lamb says a man may lose himself in another's ideas as easily as in a neighbor's grounds. We may be so diverted from all singleness of purpose and individuality of life, as to defeat the very object sought abroad, even among the richest fields of experience. "To thine own self be true" was a maxim of the sagacious and prudent courtier; more nobly interpreted, it is also the doctrine of moral insight, and one which Channing has most admirably illustrated.

The French Directory, in a letter to the Spanish Admiral Massaredo, thus alluded to England:—"From a small corner of the earth, which the sun seems to light with regret, England pretends exclusively to the sovereignty of the seas."

THE PLEASURES OF THOUGHT.

BY SIDNEY DYER.

I.

For what was man designed? to live and die?
To mingle back to dust and be forgot?
To feel the ills of life and then to lie
In drear oblivion in the grave and rot?
O, cruel fate! were this his hopeless lot;
'Twere better far that life be ne'er should know,
Than thus to be, and wish that he were not;
To long for pleasure's stream, yet mid the flow
Of sorrow's turbid wave to sink in deepest woe.

II.

He wears an upright form of heavenly make,
With soul and sense mysteriously combined;
Which oft, like well-tuned harp-strings, doth awake
A thrill of rapturous pleasure in the mind.
But sense alone ne'er yields the bias designed,
When into man was breathed the deathless soul;
By heavenly skill for purer joys refined,
And upward taught to look from earth's control,
And pant to soar beyond where farthest planets roll.

III.

"HOPE's" fond delights one tuneful bard* hath sung,
Whose fame Apollo might have wished to share,
Bright star-eyed Hope, when his wild numbers rung,
Born once again to earth, divinely fair,—
"Enchanted smiled and waved her golden hair,"
But still her promised good is far away,
For when at last brought near, most oft despair
Is found to dwell and rule with iron sway
Where she had promised most and cast her brightest ray.

IV.

The pleasing joys that "MEMORY's" voice recalls
Have oft been sung, and late by one† whose strain
Upon the ear in softened cadence falls,
But memory's song awakes, with each refrain,
Those deep-toned chords that bring up tears again,
We linger o'er the past with sad regret,
Where lie our blighted hopes on time's dark plain,
Each happy interval review, and yet
Would all its bias forego could we its pains forget.

V.

With nobler aim and far sublimer flight,
An elder bard‡ awoke the tuneful shell,
And to "IMAGINATION's" realms of light
Mounted on viewless wing, and caught the swell
Of angel choirs, as gently rose and fell
Their votive praise on high. Though strong its sway, Imagination's but a passing spell—
An Ignis Fatuus, whose delusive ray
Lights up unreal worlds, and glows but to betray.

VI.

Not such the theme which now inspires our Muse,
Its pleasures aye are present, pure and free,
Like April's early blossoms, which diffuse
A fragrance round our path where'er it be.

* Campbell. † Rogers. ‡ Akenside.

Thought spreads for all a deep and boundless sea,
Where billows of delight incessant roll,
Each glowing with the light of DEITY,
While wrapt in thought's sweet reverie, the soul
Enjoys a meed of bliss that earth can ne'er control.

VII.

The power of thought alone gives man the sway
And right to rule as lord o'er earth's domain,
It makes the forest-king his will obey,
And lightning's vengeful bolt admit his reign.
The noble river, coursing to the main,
Diverted from its bed, his mastery feels,
E'en Ocean's self is made to wear his chain,
And on his surge to bear a thousand keels, Till 'neath their ponderous weight old Neptune groans and reels.

VIII.

It is the ruling power of every age,
The monarch crowns or tears him from the throne,—
Writes its own characters on history's page,
And makes the wonders of its Mission known—
With stately march it moves from zone to zone,
The star of hope to man; the beacon blaze
Which erst along his darkened pathway shone,
When he a serf was held in ancient days,
And on the future poured the light of Freedom's rays!

IX.

Each age has felt its power—each bears its seal:
On that bright morn when Adam first awoke,
And heard the vocal stars chant their loud peal
Of rapturous joy, as full the chorus broke
From their wide spheres, it felt its first life-stroke
Begin. Man held at first a sinless reign,
And wore with willing zeal his Lord's mild yoke:
Well pleased to dress the flower-enamelled plain,
And join the sons of God in their seraphic strain.

X.

But soon by show of good, deceived, he fell,
And by that rueful act obscured the light
He first received from Heaven; then came a spell
Which o'er his pathway threw the pall of night.
Yet Mercy left one star to glad his sight,
And bade him trust and hope, though crushed and riven.
Thus cheered, he rose, and sought in toil delight,
And when to wisdom's ways his thoughts are given,
He tastes of Pleasure's stream meandering pure from Heaven!

XI.

'Tis not from books alone Thought's pleasures flow—
They are but aqueducts which serve to bring
The stream direct, (meandering else and slow,)
As fresh it wells from the Pierian spring;
But who would taste it pure, at times must fling
His books aside, and turn to Nature's page,
Open alike to peasant, prince and king,
To men untaught as well as learned sage,
And mid its lessons deep his ardent thoughts engage.

XII.

How pure the thoughts which Nature's truths inspire!
How swells the raptured soul beneath their power!
'Till upward borne, it plucks celestial fire,
And pours o'er earth a scintillating shower;

They guide the erring soul through darkest hour,
In wisdom's way, where heavenly fountains well;
Oft yield to poverty the richest dower,
Disperse the gloom which fills the dungeon cell,
And earth as Eden glows beneath their magic spell.

XIII.

Now let us range abroad and take our fill
From this rich source of thought, where pleasure gleams
As morning sunlight on the slanting hill,
Or, as upon the wave it laughing seems
To sport and play and watch its wrinkling beams.
The joys we gather here will never tire,
Nor fit like empty forms of idle dreams,
But fill the soul's enlarged and chaste desire,
Its heavenly powers expand and noblest thoughts inspire!

XIV.

How wide the range where'er the thoughts may turn!
At every point a world before us lies—
From grains of sand to far off orbs which burn,
And roll in blazing splendor through the skies;
From wandering comet, which erratic flies,
And trails a cloudy light along its way,
To smallest insect, which at morning's rise
Is born, but faints when falls the sun's full ray,
And dies, its being's end fulfilled e'er noon of day.

XV.

How vast are Nature's stores! and various too,
And rich as vast, to all who prize their worth;
Though thousands oft have ranged her fields, yet new
They ever seem as at creation's birth.
Oh beautiful and bright is the fair earth!
Its hills and dales, its skies and crystal streams,
Its blooming groves, and birds of sportive mirth,
Its flowery meads, where Beauty smiling seems Reclined on Nature's breast in most delicious dreams!

XVI.

And when the circling year from winter's chill
The spring awakes again with wonted fire;
With vernal beams makes bare the snow-capped hill,
And earth responsive to the warm desire,
Arrays her leafless form in rich attire;
When sun and shower revive the dormant land,
And fresh the meadow grass shoots up its spire;
When Flora, borne on zephyrs soft and bland,
Strews all her blooming wealth around with lavish hand:

XVII.

Oh! then 'tis sweet to seek the scented grove,
Alone to muse, reclined beneath the shade;
Or through its festooned walks delighted rove,
And pluck the flowers which gem the emerald glade;
Or 'neath the waving boughs, anew arrayed
In brightest green, inhale the fragrant air,
Delighting soul and sense. Thus oft I've strayed
In meditation deep, till earth and care
Were both alike forgot, for God himself was there!

XVIII.

But oft is seen the groveling son of earth,
Whose sluggish soul no theme can e'er inspire;
The stately oak to him is thus much worth—
'Twill serve to build his fence or light his fire!
That aught was e'er designed for purpose higher,

Ne'er once appears to him—he sees no good
 In searching Nature only to admire
 Her wondrous art, and thus in thoughtful mood
 To roam her mazes through and muse in solitude.

XIX.

O, gross insensate one! thus to degrade
 The peerless semblance of the Deity,
 And that abuse for holiest purpose made!
 The flowing stream, meandering to the sea,
 The whispering breeze which floats along the lea,
 The humblest flower that parts the yielding sod,
 The Ocean's rolling wave, unchained and free,
 The waving trees which bend with graceful nod,
 And every glittering star—all point the thoughts to God!

XX.

To God—the soul's high source and final rest!
 The highest theme to men or angels known;
 Who know of Him the most are highest blest,
 Who know Him not, though on the world's high throne,
 In darkness still are left to sigh and groan.
 THOUGHT to the soul must be the loosened dove,
 Out o'er the deluged world to go alone,
 And back return with the sweet pledge of love,
 That when the floods subside our Ark shall rest above.

XXI.

The mouldering heaps which curious eyes explore,
 Of fluted shaft or broken architrave,
 From Egypt's quarries wrought in days of yore,
 When kings in servile chains did all enslave,
 And thousands died to build each sovereign's grave;
 The rock-hewn cities long from traveller's eye
 Concealed, where owlets shriek and satyrs rave;
 The Sphinx, and Pyramids which prop the sky,
 Are waymarks left by Thought in ages long gone by.

XXII.

And there were those in time's most early day,
 Who saw in marble Beauty's glowing trace,
 The magic chisel seized and struck away
 The rock, and forth she stood instinct with grace;
 While others sought by Helicon a place,
 And with the choral Nine awoke the strain;
 And foremost he, who won immortal bays,
 And sang of conquering Greece and Iliad's pain,
 Of fierce Achilles' wrath and noble Hector slain.

XXIII.

Each varying mind a theme congenial finds,
 In Nature's boundless range of wondrous things.
 Some note the laws which sphere in sphere confines,
 And number every star, as science flings
 Light on their path revealing all their springs;
 While others read portrayed upon the rock,
 Each phase of earth, e'er Time with new-fledged wings,
 Had soared in its first flight: the earthquake's shock
 To them, is Nature's door, at which for truth they knock.

XXIV.

The Swedish sage oft sought the dewy mead;
 And plucked the opening flowers with wrapt delight;
 Their petals told, their leaves and shining seed,
 Their blooms of iris hues and spotless white,
 Limned by a skill divine to charm the sight.
 To him each bird, each leaf or blooming flower,
 Which smiles by day or drinks the dew by night,

Was a wide universe, in life's brief hour
 His mind could never grasp though stretched to utmost power!

XXV.

The blood-stained hero, fresh from conquered fields,
 In triumph borne along, to be admired,
 Amid the dazzling pageantry ne'er feels
 A tithe of that rich joy, which once inspired
 The sage of olden time, who sought untired
 For latent truths, and oft his problem tried.
 When thought at last had grasped the prize, it fixed
 His inmost soul, and swift as bursting tide
 He rushed the streets along and loud "EUREKA!" cried.

XXVI.

No tongue can tell the joy COLUMBUS felt,
 When first the thought sublime flashed o'er his soul
 Of undiscovered worlds; for as he dwelt
 Upon the rapturous theme, thought spurned control,
 And leaped the rolling surge and reached the goal,
 Long e'er the winds had filled his loosened sail.
 Though unexplored the waves expansive roll
 Across his way, where bides no lingering trail,
 His bark is on the deep and drives before the gale.

XXVII.

Kings had refused when he for aid did sue,
 And courtly fools would taunt with laugh and jeer;
 But still unmoved, he kept the prize in view;
 And oft in vision rapt, like holy seer,
 He saw Hesperia's land approaching near,
 Proud to receive his name. He paused no more,
 But ventured on when others shrunk with fear,
 And bliss enjoyed as none enjoyed before,
 When morning's early light revealed the welcome shore!

XXVIII.

The lightning's flash the admiring FRANKLIN saw,
 As through the azure vault with undimmed eye,
 He soared on Thought's strong wing, and traced the law
 Which rolled its thundering wheels along the sky;
 Anon he raised his daring hand on high,
 And grasped the quivering bolt and quenched its ire;
 Then bade it pause, or harmless onward fly,
 And thus gave wings to thought of heavenly fire,
 And won a brilliant fame whose rays shall ne'er expire!

XXIX.

The man who thus could brave the lightning's shock,
 Was never born to wear a tyrant's chain,
 Or stoop with servile bow, but like the rock
 Which laughs at wind and storm and raging main,
 To stand unmoved, with heaven-exalted mein,
 And thus he stood and vowed his country free
 From haughty lordling's rule and kingly reign,
 And bade her sons no more with suppliant knee,
 Bow down to fellow dust and beg for liberty!

XXX.

Hail Liberty! thou boon which all men crave,
 More precious far than life or crowns of gold;
 Thou ne'er on earth hadst found an early grave,
 If Thought's free range had not been first controlled.
 But thou art free again! and who can hold
 Thee now, or stay thy march? No sceptred foe,
 Nor mitred priest, with heart to Satan sold,
 For man has caught anew the kindling glow,
 And on his march shall be till Earth shall Freedom know!

XXXI.

Let Gallia's traitor kings a warning be
 To thrones and powers—ay, let them henceforth know
 That man has power to act, and dare be free;
 That he was born to think, and thought shall flow
 Free as the air we breathe, the winds that blow.
 Who dares again oppress with traitorous scheme,
 Shall by a freeman's arm be stricken low;
 The age of Kings has passed—a vanished dream—FREEDOM ascends the throne, and THOUGHT shall reign supreme!

XXXII.

The PRESS, which strives Thought's power to extend,
 Gives "local habitation and a name"
 To what the mind conceives. Its force shall end
 Grim Error's reign, and blast to endless shame
 The foes of human kind, but spread the fame
 The good man seeks to earth's remotest bound.
 Against its freedom only those exclaim,
 Who dread the dazzling light it sheds around,
 Exposing deeds they seek to shroud in gloom profound.

XXXIII.

What! seek the Press omnipotent to stay?
 First in thy grasp the viewless winds enchain,
 And hurl the comet from its chosen way;
 Go bind the waves, dark-heaving o'er the main,
 And bid the sun stand still o'er yonder plain;
 Make darkness come—turn noon-day into night,
 Arrest the shafts of Death, and end his reign—
 Then hope the Press to bind, and quench its light
 By force of human law and arm of human might!

XXXIV.

A few wise men have lived in every age,
 Who ne'er by vice obscured their mental sight,
 As SOCRATES, or PAUL the Christian sage,
 Whose words went forth as beams of heavenly light,
 And rolled from earth the seven-fold pall of night;
 As WASHINGTON, for god-like actions sent,
 Or Quiney's sage whose "life was in the right,"
 Who, falling when his powers at last were spent,
 Exclaimed, "this is the last of earth, I am content."

XXXV.

The mind aroused as ne'er in former years,
 Majestic, like the sun, moves on its way
 Of light from clime to clime, and earth appears
 To glow e'en now with bright immortal ray!
 Old things with olden times have passed away,
 And man no more with plodding step is found
 In search of joys which ne'er his toil repay,
 But like the winged light, with one rebound,
 Leaps to the goal of thought, and circles earth around!

XXXVI.

The forest melts at his advancing stride,
 And up, like magic, towns and cities spring;
 The subtle elements his will abide,
 And serve his wish as subjects serve their king.
 Each day reveals some new, unheard-of thing,
 Till Wonder long has ceased to feel surprise—
 THOUGHT now goes forth upon the lightning's wing,
 Which, round the circling earth obedient flies
 At man's command, as swift it speeds along the skies!

XXXVII.

Thus THOUGHT goes forth and holds the world in awe,
 Subservient makes each seen and latent power,
 (Led to their springs by truth's unerring law.)
 Bedecks the desert wild with fruit and flower,
 And gleans from barren fields a princely dower;
 Amid confusion, perfect order finds,
 A radiant sun, where clouds of darkness lower;
 Culls rarest gems from long neglected mines,
 And purest bliss enjoys where ignorance repines!

XXXVIII.

O'er Earth ere long a fearful change shall pass,
 Hurl'd back to chaos whence at first it came,
 Its beauty changed to one unshapen mass,
 As round it spreads the fierce devouring flame,
 Which leaves no lingering trace of place or fame;
 Then o'er the scene shall THOUGHT arise and shine,
 With radiant beams the noonday sun shall shame,
 And from the smouldering wrecks of Earth and Time,
 In triumph mount to God Immortal and DIVINE!

Shakspeare, the Earl of Southampton and "The Tempest."

Shakspeare after, and probably on account of the deer-stealing affair, went from Stratford to London about the year 1587. Here finding Richard Burbidge, who was from the immediate neighborhood of Stratford, engaged in the calling of a stage-player, he likewise betook himself to the stage, and acted at the Globe theatre, (the Earl of Leicester's or the Queen's,) and afterwards at the Blackfriars. Two years later he appears to have become a stockholder in the latter establishment, and from this source he afterwards derived a very considerable income. After taking up his abode in London, he won the friendship of young Henry Wriothesley, the generous, the romantic Earl of Southampton, who was destined to enjoy the double honor of being the patron of Shakspeare, and of the Colony of Virginia. In 1593 the poet, aged 29, dedicated "Venus and Adonis," his first production, to the Earl, who was then only 19, and in the following year, "The Rape of Lucrece," his second poem. The Earl of Southampton was a great favorite of the Earl of Essex, who appointed him General of the horse in Ireland, contrary to the known wishes of the Queen; by whose repeated orders he was displaced. In 1597 he accompanied Essex as a volunteer in an unfortunate expedition against the Spanish in the West Indies. And during a temporary loss of the Queen's favor, owing to the circumstances of his marriage, he spent some time in a sort of exile in France, accompanying Secretary Cecil at the time of the negotiation of the treaty of Vervins. In 1601 the Earl of Southampton was implicated with Essex in a conspiracy to seize the person of Queen Elizabeth. While Essex, for the treasonable temerity of this hair-brained attempt, lost his life on the scaffold, Southampton suffered the penalties of attainder during the Queen's life. However, upon the accession of James, he was released from confinement, his attainder was reversed, and his title and estates restored to him. There appears to have been a very close intimacy and devoted friendship between this nobleman and Shakspeare. It is said that the Earl at one time made the poet the magnificent present of £1,000. Some, however, have refused to credit that so large a sum was given, and have supposed that it was probably no more than a loan. On the other hand, however, it is alleged that the Earl was liberal to an extravagant degree, in so much as eventually to prove the ruin of his private fortune, and it is suggested that the sum of £10,000 has been given by an English nobleman in modern times to a celebrated actor. Whatever may have been the real character of the pecuniary favor shown by Southampton to Shakspeare, whether a donation or a loan, it probably took place not long after the latter came to reside at London, for it is certain that he was then poor, and yet we find that in two years he became a share-holder in theatrical stock, and it is quite improbable that he could in so short a period have acquired money for this purpose from the profits of his acting.

Shakspeare, according to some, retired from the stage before 1605; according to others, and more probably, it was not till 1607 or 1608. However, it is certain that he was after 1608, a candidate for the place of "master of the revels"—but he did not receive the appointment. The following letter, written by the Earl of Southampton, about 1608, to Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, has been discovered of late years among the MSS. of that nobleman, preserved at Bridgewater House, and is taken from a work entitled "New Facts relating to the life of Shakspeare," prefixed to the Boston edition, 1847, of his dramatic works. The interest of this letter is enhanced to Virginians, by the consideration, that the writer was not only the patron of Shakspeare, but also afterwards of Virginia. "My verie honored Lord, the manie good offices I have received at your Lordship's hands, which ought to make me backward in asking farther favors, only imbouldens me to require more in the same kinde. Your Lordship will be warned howe hereafter you graunt me anie sute, seeing it draweth on more and greater demaunds. This which now prosseth is to request your Lordship in all you can to be good to the poore players of the Black Fryers, who call themselves by authoritie the Servants of his Majestie, and aske for the protection of their most graceous Maister and Sovereigne in this the tyme of their trouble. They are threatened by the Lord Maior and Aldermen of London, never friendly to their calling, with the destruction of their meanes of livelihood, by the putting downe of their plaie-house, which is a private theatre, and hath never given occasion of anger by anie disorders. These bearers are two of the chiefe of the companie; one of them by name Richard Burbidge, who humble sueth for your Lordship's kinde helpe, for that he is a man famous as our English Roscius, one who fitteth the action to the word and the word to the action most admirably. By the exercise of his qualite, industry and good behaviour, he hath become possessed of the Black Fryers playhouse which hath bene employed for players sithence it was builded by his Father now nere 50 yeres agone.* The other is a man no whitt lesse deserving favor and my especiall friende, till of late an actor of good account in the Companie, now a sharer in the same and writer of some of our best English playes, which, as your Lordship knoweth, were most singularly liked of Queen Elizabeth, when the Companie was called upon to performe before her Ma'tie at Court, at Christmas and Shrovetide. His most gracious Ma'tie King James alsoe, since his coming to the Crowne, hath extended his royall favour to the Companie in divers waies and at sundrie tymes. This other hath to name William Shakspeare, and they are both of one countie and indeed almost of one towne; both are right famous in their qualities, though it longeth not to your Lo. gravitie and wisdom to resort unto the places where they are wont to delight the publique care. Their trust and sute nowe is, not to be molested in their waye of life whereby they maintaine themselves and their wives and families, (being both married and of good reputations,) as well as the widowes and orphans of some of their dead fellowes.

Your. Lo. most bounden at com.

Should we in our fancy accompany this couple of "poore players of the Black Fryers," the one "a man famous as our English Roscius," the other who "hath to name William Shakspeare," the "writer of some of our best English playes," as they repair to the presence of the Lord Chancellor and present the letter of the generous Earl, we cannot doubt but that the two petitioners made a strong appeal to his lordship, "fitting the action to the word and the word to the action most admirably." How short-lived the fame of the actor compared with that of the writer? To how very few people in the world comparatively is even the name of Richard Burbidge known, and what a small fraction of those few would have ever heard of him, had not his name been connected with that of the world-renowned Shakspeare. Yet Burbidge was in his own day at the least as distinguished as an actor, as Shakspeare was as a dramatic writer—Burbidge was the Garrick of his age.

The Earl of Southampton, so long the friend and patron of Shakspeare, survived him about eight years. In 1618 this nobleman became a member of the Privy Council. Brave and generous, but haughty and impetuous, he was by no means adapted for the court and cabinet of James, where servility and base intrigue were the ordinary stepping-stones of political advancement. About the year 1619 the Earl was imprisoned through the influence of Buckingham, "whom he rebuked with some passion, for speaking often to the same thing in the house, and out of order." In 1620 the Earl was chosen, contrary to the wishes of the King, Treasurer (equivalent to Governor) of the Virginia company, which office he held till the charter was vacated in 1624. He and Sir Edwin Sandys, the leaders, together with the bulk of the members of the Company, shared largely in the spirit of civil and religious freedom which was then manifesting itself so strongly in England. The Earl exhibited himself a firm opponent of the measures of the court, both in his place in parliament, and in his station of Treasurer of the Virginia Company. Having gone over and taken command of an English regiment in the Dutch service, he died in the Netherlands, in 1624—the year of the dissolution of the Virginia Company. He was grandson of Wriothesley, Chancellor of Edward VI., father to the excellent Treasurer Southampton, and grandfather to Rachel, Lady Russel.

Shakspeare after abandoning the stage in 1607 or 1608, about the time of the first landing at Jamestown, remained in London for some four or five years. Smith and the early colonists of Virginia had, many of them, probably witnessed the theatrical performances at the Globe or Black Fryars,* and Shakspeare was no doubt familiar with the more remarkable incidents of the first settlement of the colony—the early voyages, the first discovery, the landing, Smith's rencontres with the Indians,—his rescue by Pocahontas, the starving time, &c. Smith indeed complains of his exploits and adventures having been misrepresented on the stage in London. That Shakspeare makes few or no allusions to these incidents, is because they occurred after nearly all of his plays had been composed. "The Tempest," however, was written several years after the landing at Jamestown, and it derives its name, and a good many of its incidents, from a striking episode in the history of the Virginia Colony, the wreck of the Sea-Adventure on the coast of Bermuda island. It is an instance of the mighty witchery of genius, that a Virginian should feel a sort of pride in knowing that Shakspeare had selected some events connected with the early history of his country, as "good stuff to make poetry out of," and that he has done this in his master-piece, "The Tempest," one of his latest productions—a creation of his maturest intellect,—composed after the lapse of upwards of twenty years from the time of the production of what is supposed to have been his first play—"The Two Gentlemen of Verona," in 1591.

When the new charter of Virginia was obtained, the council and company equipped a fleet to carry with the new commission, supplies of men and women, with provisions and other stores for the colony. The following is a list of the vessels and their commanders: the Sea-Adventure or Sea-Venture, admiral Sir George Somers with Sir Thomas Gates, and Captain Christopher Newport; the Diamond, Captain Ratcliffe and Captain King; the Falcon, Captain Martin and Master Nelson; the Blessing, Gabriel Archer and Captain Adams; the Unity, Captain Wood and Master Pett; the Lion, Captain Webb; the Swallow, Captain Moon and Master Somers. There were also in company two smaller craft, a ketch and a pinnace. The fleet sailed from Plymouth in May, 1609, and going contrary to instructions by the old circuitous route, via the Canaries and the West Indies, on the 24th of July, when in latitude 30 degrees north, and as was supposed within eight days' sail of Virginia, they were caught "in the tayle of a Hericano" blowing from the North East, accompanied by a horrid darkness that continued for forty-four hours. Some of the vessels lost their masts, some their sails blown from the yards, "the seas over-raking our ships."

"When rattling thunder ran along the clouds,
Did not the Sayers poore and Masters proud
A terror feele, as struck with feare of God?"

The admiral's ship, the Sea-Adventure, separated from the rest of the fleet, and racked by the fury of the sea, sprang a leak, and the water soon rose in the hold above two tiers of hogsheads that stood over the ballast, and the crew had to stand up to their middles in the water and bail out with buckets, baricos and kettles. Thus they continued bailing and pumping for three days and nights without intermission, yet the water appeared rather to gain upon them than decrease, so that all hands being at length utterly exhausted, came to the desperate resolution to shut down the hatches and resign themselves to their fate, and some having "some good and comfortable waters, fetched them and drank one to another as taking their last leaves." During all this time the aged Sir George Somers, sitting upon the quarter-deck, scarce taking time to eat or to sleep, "couing* the ship to keep her as upright as he could," but for which she must long ere that have foundered—at last descried land. At this time many of the unhappy crew were asleep, and when the voice of Sir George was heard announcing land, it seemed as if it was a voice from heaven and they hurried up above the hatches to look for what they scarcely could credit. And on finding the intelligence true, and that they were indeed within sight of land, although it was a coast that all men tried to avoid,—yet they now spread all sail to reach it. Soon the vessel struck upon a rock, till a surge of the sea dashed her from thence, and so from one to another, till at length fortunately she lodged upright between two rocks as if she was in the stocks. Till this, at every lurch, they had expected death. But now, all at once, the storm gives place to a calm, and the billows which, at each successive dash, had threatened instant destruction, now were stilled, and quickly taking to their boats they reached the shore, distant upwards of a league, without the loss of a man out of one hundred and fifty. Their joy at an escape so unexpected and almost miraculous, arose to the pitch of amazement. Yet their escape was not more wonderful in their eyes than their preservation after they had landed on the island. For the Spaniards had always looked upon it as more frightful than purgatory itself, and all seamen had counted it as no better than an enchanted den of Furies and Devils, the most dangerous, desolate and forlorn place in the world; instead of which it turned out to be healthful, fertile and charming. The wreck of the Sea-Adventure suggested to Shakspeare several incidents in the plot of "The Tempest," and several passages of this play were evidently taken from the contemporary accounts of that disaster, as published by Jordan and by the council of the Virginia Company.

* "Beggars Bush," (now Jordan's Point,) an early plantation on the James river, derived its name from a comedy of Fletcher's.

"Boatswain down with the top-most, yare lower, lower, bring her to try with the main course."

Captain Smith in his Sea Grammar 1627, 4to,

* Couing, qu. conning.

under the article how to handle a ship in a storm, says:—"let us lie as trie with our main course, that is to hold the tacke aboard, the sheet close aft, the boling set up, and the helm tied close aboard." Again the Boatswain says:—"Lay her a-hold a-hold; Set her two courses." The two courses are the main sail and foresail. To lay a ship a-hold is to bring her to lie as near the wind as she can. These and other nautical orders are such as the brave old Somers, "the lamb on shore, the lion at sea," might have given when "couing the ship to keep her as upright as he could."

"We are merely cheated of our lives by drunkards."

This was probably suggested to the poet by the recorded incident of part of the crew of the Sea Venture having undertaken to drown their despair in drunkenness.

"Farewell my wife and children!
Farewell brother."

Ant. "Let's all sink with the king."

Leb. "Let's take leave of him."

These answer to the leave-taking of the crew of the Sea-Venture. Jordan, in his pamphlet, says, "it is reported that this land of Bermudas, with the islands about it, are enchanted and kept by evil and wicked spirits," &c. Shakspeare employs Prospero and Ariel to personate this fabled enchantment of the island. Her task is at the bidding of Prospero —————"To fly,

To swim, to dive into the fire, to ride
On the curled clouds."

The tempest in which the ship was wrecked is thus described by Ariel:

"I boarded the king's ship; now on the beak,
Now in the waist, the deck, in every cabin
I flamed amazement; sometimes I'd divide
And burn in many places; on the top-mast,
The yards and bowsprit would I flame distinctly;
Then meet and join; Jove's lightning the precursors
Of the dreadful thunder-claps—more momentary
And sight-outrunning were not; the fire and cracks
Of sulphurous roaring, the most mighty Neptune
Seemed to besiege, and make his bold waves tremble—
Yea his dread trident shake."

Again:

"Not a soul
But felt a fever of the mad and played
Some tricks of desperation."

The almost miraculous escape of all from the very jaws of impending death, is thus alluded to by Ariel in her report to Prospero:

"Not a hair perished,
On their sustaining garments not a blemish,

But fresher than before and as thou bad'st me,
In troops I have dispersed them 'bout the isle."

The particular circumstances of the wreck are given quite exactly in the familiar verses :

" Safely in harbor
Is the king's ship ; in the deep nook where once
Thou call'dst me up at midnight to fetch dew
From the still-vezed Bermoothes—there she's hid."

Bermoothes, the Spanish pronunciation of Bermudas, or Bermudez, the original name. Another real incident is referred to in the following line, the time only being transposed :

" The mariners all under hatches stowed ;
Whom with a charm joined to their suffered labor
I have left asleep."

The return of the other seven vessels of the fleet, the ketch being lost, is described with a change, however, of the sea, in which they sailed, and in their place of destination.

" And for the rest of the fleet
Which I dispersed—they all have met again ;
And are upon the Mediterranean flote,
Bound sadly home for Naples ;
Supposing that they saw the king's ship wrecked
And his great person perish."

For nearly a year after the wreck and the Sea-Venture's separation from the fleet, it was believed in Virginia and in England that she and her company were lost. Other coincidences might be pointed out, but enough have been given to show how much reference the poet had to the circumstances of the Sea-Adventure's wreck, in the composition of "The Tempest."

THE COMPLAINT OF LAIS.

BY MRS. M. E. HEWITT.

" Je ne saurais me voir dans ce miroir fidele Ni telle que j'étais, ni telle que je suis."
Ausonius. Traduction de Voltaire.

The song had hushed its murmurs,
And the lyre its chords restrained,
Where the proudest nymph in Corinth
To her mirror thus complained :

" Oh! ruthless, ruthless mirror!
How can I look on thee,
Nor mourn the fatal ruin
That time hath wrought in me!
Like the sculptured stone of Paros,
Soft-tinged with morning's rose,
Was my cheek, where 'mid the dimples
The Loves no more repose—

And a glowing charm encircled
The graces that were mine,
Like the passion-kindling cestus
Of Venus all divine.
The victor left his olive crown
For my entrancing wile,
And the sage forsook his wisdom cold
To linger in my smile—
But alas! alas! my mirror!
The hearts that owned my sway,
With my false and fleeting beauty
Have passed from me away.
Oh! dark and fearful River!
Would I had crossed thy shore,
Ere I lived to mourn the beauty
Mine, mine alas! no more!
Ere the envious nymphs of Corinth
Exultingly could say,
The conquering charms of Lais,
Had passed from her away.
Oh! evermore beside me
The dread Alecto stands—
The Fury with the brazen feet,
And the viper in her hands—
With her serpent-scourge awakening
The memories of yore ;
Of beauty all departed,
And triumphs, mine no more!"
And thus the nymph's complaining
Through the gorgeous chamber stole—
But ah! the wreck of beauty
Reflected in her soul!

Time has its different measurements, just as the propensities of men incline them to note its flight either by the periodical succession of stated intervals or the more impressive occurrence of important events. He that passes from "youth to hoary age," pursuing the even tenor of his way, fulfilling the duties of his station unvaried, perhaps, from year to year, will look back upon the past as the traveller who, having nearly accomplished a long journey, is unable to recall any incident connected therewith other than such as attended each day's routine. And he whose fate seems to have cast him under an "inauspicious star," is no sooner launched upon the sea of life than fortune marks him as her sportive child. Such, however, is the spirit of the age, the craving for adventure and novelty, that the mass of men prefer the tumult and excitement of eventful life to the tranquillity of sober existence.

Is it the "manifest destiny" of the Anglo-Saxon race to "ride the whirlwind and direct the storm?" or is it an acquired taste for feverish excitement that pervades our youth and impels them to seek adventure by flood and field?

Whatever the cause, the fact is positive, that education very rarely, in our country, determines the bent of the man. Relieved from schools and paternal restraint, our young men now-a-days disdain the plodding pursuits of their ancestors and are eager to plunge into the turmoils of political, military, or naval life; or if debarred access to these professions, they wander about the world in search of something as unattainable as the philosopher's stone, or perhaps as irrational.

We are the "universal Yankee nation"—at home or abroad the variety is infinite. We have furnished and we can furnish philosophers, artists, engineers, mechanics, &c., &c., to Europe and South America. We send missionaries and merchants to the East Indies, and have planted a colony upon the coast of Africa.

We supply the natives of the South Seas with "notions," and our whalers are found in every sea upon the globe.

With us, science, the fine arts, commerce, manufactures, all save agriculture, have their votaries. The cultivation of the earth is too dull for our "go-ahead people." Nevertheless, there are in many portions of our country what are termed "retired gentlemen," who not only write articles for the "renovation of exhausted lands," but devote their energies and means to the dull pursuits of agriculture.

But the enthusiasm of our people has recently taken a military bias, and whether an obliquity, or the natural result of circumstances, remains to be seen. Our next Congress will have a field-officer upon each committee, and "generals" will supersede "honorable."

II.

A proper history of the recent military operations against Mexico would be the best eulogium upon the army. Without the usual reference to battles, wherein prodigies of valor and skill were so conspicuous, it will suffice for the present to remark upon the extraordinary facility with which masses of undisciplined militia were suddenly converted into steady and effective forces. The matter is explained to the minds of some in the excellence of the materiel used, as if the standard of soldiership, so far as the physical man is concerned, is more easily attainable in this country than elsewhere; others, who care not for the "tews and sinews," think the "spirit of the man" more generally infused into our population than any other of the universe. A third class, with more discrimination, ascribe our success to the admirable qualifications of our officers, believing that in military affairs, as well as most others, science and art must vindicate their utility, not to say necessity.

Certainly no institution in our country, and few, if any, in Europe, has done so much to disseminate useful knowledge in so brief a period as the academy at West Point. Its élèves are ushered into the world with an education, to say the least, which is a most substantial foundation for the prosecution of any of the scientific pursuits. Of late years it has become more practical and perhaps more strictly military, but it has lost none of that thorough character instituted by its illustrious author.*

The graduates of that institution are scattered over the length and breadth of the country, and wherever found, in professional or civil pursuits, they are known as "reliable men."

Indeed, the universities of every State and the great works of Internal Improvement throughout the land, attest the value of the graduates of West Point. Nor are these gentlemen less distinguished by their decorum in private life. But we are about to show, without disparagement to others, that the conduct and result of the war in Mexico, is mainly to be ascribed to the system of organization and discipline introduced and carried out by the staff of the army.

We think the fate of Mexico was sealed by the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma. Perhaps no general ever commanded a more effective force of the same numbers than the twenty-one hundred men under General Taylor, in the opening of the campaign.

The officers of this column were the very men for the emergency, and the long camp at Corpus Christi had furnished ample time to perfect the drill and discipline. Hence it was that they were enabled to endure the severest trial that troops can experience, inactivity under a cannonade, and that too in the commencement of a campaign. This had its influence upon the enemy, and the prestige inspired by the two first battles was potential in every subsequent combat.

The results of this war may furnish the subject of another chapter—this much we may add, it has revealed to the nation a class of men of whom previously it was comparatively ignorant.

III.

Engineers have confirmed the reports of travellers as to the practicability of oceanic communication through Central America. They agree that a ship canal can be constructed through three different sections of the great Isthmus.

The first from Panama to the Chagres river,

* Lt. Col. Thayer, corps of Engineers.

requiring only thirty miles of excavation, with locks at the termini, and artificial harbors to admit vessels of large size.

The second through the river Sanjuan and the Lake Nicaragua, and thence by a cut of sixteen miles to the Gulf of Papagayo.

The third through the river Coatzacoalecos, with an excavation of thirty-one miles to the Gulf of Tehuantepec.

Geographically, the distance from one ocean to the other by the first route is only forty miles. By the second ninety-four, and by the third one hundred and forty.

Strange to say, however, the practicability of such a work is in the inverse ratio of the shortness of the distances. The estimates of the Spanish and English engineers, though not accurate, are sufficiently exact to warrant the belief that works of far greater magnitude and cost have been constructed in various regions of Europe and America. But the obstacles to this enterprise are not so much the cost of material and labor as the circumstances of the country and the insalubrity of the climate.

Suppose this oceanic communication established, and that vessels for the Pacific and the East Indies took this instead of the perilous passages of the Capes, would the tolls through such a highway pay for the capital expended in its construction? We think not—but this is conjectural.

When it is remembered that not more than one in three hundred vessels that double Cape Horn experience disaster, and that the navigation through the tropics and especially in the bays of Panama and Tehuantepec are attended with calms, and occasionally tempests of the most terrific character, it seems hardly probable that merchants will pay high for the privilege of shortening a voyage only a few weeks.

This subject, however, has recently received additional importance by the immense territorial acquisitions of the United States in the Pacific, not to mention the enormous American capital embarked in the whale-fisheries of that ocean.

But we are inclined to think that a railroad will be constructed across the Continent, and in a much higher latitude, long before a canal will be cut through any part of the Isthmus.

IV.

The "Royal Mail Steam Packet Company" owns eleven steamers, of eighteen hundred tons burthen, and five hundred horse power each, to say nothing of such small affairs as the "Great Western" and four others' of 300 horse power each, besides packet schooners and sail vessels. These ships are available for armed service whenever the British government may require such a formidable flotilla for warlike purposes.

They are named principally after the rivers of Scotland and run regularly between Southampton and the West India, and thence to North, Central and South America.

The Company receives a million and three hundred thousand dollars annually for the transportation of her Majesty's mails, and the immense revenue derived from passengers and freights renders it perhaps, (with the exception of the East India Company,) the most opulent establishment in the world.

These vessels are perhaps as thoroughly equipped and as admirably managed as any not entirely under the "rules and regulations" for the Navy. Each ship of the larger class carries, besides the captain and crew (amounting to nearly ninety men,) a surgeon, purser, four engineers, four watch officers, acting midshipmen and petty officers, and an admiralty agent, generally an officer of the royal navy, whose sole duty consists in superintending the transportation of the mails.

The Company's agents are handsomely paid, and of course selected with an eye to their special qualifications. On board ship a degree of etiquette, both professional and personal, is observed, which closely approximates the naval service. Regulations are prescribed for all concerned, and the author of the "Guide Book" has very judiciously given them a conspicuous place in his volume. We subjoin a few as specimens of the whole: "All personal preference or partiality in the assignment of accommodations is forbidden, priority of claim being given according to the dates on which passengers are originally booked."

"The captain will frequently make enquiry of every passenger on board, whether they have been made as comfortable as circumstances will admit, and should there be any cause for complaint, he will at once endeavor to remedy it."

"All passengers who are not unwell, are expected to take their meals at the public table and to appear respectably dressed."

"On Sundays divine service will be performed by the captain when the weather permits."

"The captain is instructed on commencing the voyage, to intimate to the passengers, that they are at liberty, if they wish, to select from among their number three gentlemen as a committee for the purpose of inspecting daily or weekly and approving the bill of fare."

Every body knows that John Bull has a great penchant for the good things of this world, and that whether at home or abroad, on shore or afloat, he is not apt to neglect the "obedientia ventri." Accordingly the steward's department on board these steamers is replete with the most recherché wines, liquors, &c., &c. Passengers who appreciate such luxuries are supplied at prices which, compared to those usual in our best hotels, are exceedingly low; and that no deception may be practised in the article furnished, the corks are drawn, if required, in the presence of the purchaser.

But in no respect is the good management more apparent than in the care and control of the mails. As remarked, they are under the charge of the admiralty agent, who is responsible that the laws appertaining to his trust are duly observed. On reaching port, he is furnished with a cutter and men for the exclusive purpose of landing the mail bags, and whilst in the course of transfer and transportation, he is bound to give them his personal attention.

These steamers have apparatus for the conversion of salt water into fresh, and for all purposes except drinking, it is found to be satisfactory.

V.

The exploits of highwaymen have latterly lost the romantic interest which they formerly possessed, and indeed the theatres of such performances have been changed from Europe to Mexico and South America.

Englishmen who were thought expert in such matters, were content with emptying the pockets of travellers without knocking out their brains, whilst "across the channel" the "argumentum ad hominem" was generally in the shape of a blunderbuss or a stiletto. But in these matters, as in all others, fashion is capricious. The profession has dwindled into knavery. Chevaliers d'Industrie have superseded "Knights of the road." Secret villainy and sanguinary murder have succeeded open robbery and daring enterprise.

In former times clever things were said and even gallant deeds performed by gentlemen of the highway—they "reduced the superfluities of the rich in order to alleviate the necessities of the poor"—now-a-days, philanthropy is disavowed and every graceless villain pleads unblushingly the lack of moral principle, or the malign influence of the devil in the shape of alcohol.

It is not then to be wondered at that the system of robbery has become more diabolical as it has become more summary.

But of all countries Mexico seems to have most suffered by the atrocities of highwaymen. There it is impossible to pass many consecutive miles of a public road, without seeing the carcasses of victims, and it is even doubtful whether that country has lost, in the late war, as many citizens as have fallen on the highways, by the hands of their own countrymen since the government of the Viceroys.

They "order those matters" better, however, in Peru. That beautiful country, the last to relinquish allegiance to the Spanish crown, is still the land of the ancient highwayman. Achievements worthy the narrative of Le Sage are yet performed even within sight of the capital, the city of Kings. The Peruvian strives to accomplish his purpose by practising upon the terror, without violating the person of his victim. Indeed, it is now generally understood in that country, that robbers will be very courteous if their demands are cheerfully granted.

Many anecdotes are told of adventures on the road from Callao to Lima, which, though only six miles long, is to this day haunted by robbers. Some years ago, it is said that two Englishmen travelled it after dark, and were, of course, way-laid and stripped of every thing, even to their clothing. Whilst parleying, however, with the robbers upon their unreasonable demands, sounds of approaching footsteps attracted the party in a different direction. Leaving a guard with the prisoners and booty, they hurried to meet the new comers, but were scarcely out of sight when the guard was seized and gagged, and the two gentlemen not only recovered their own property, but the entire plunder which was left in the custody of the robber.

An American gentleman, many years a resident of that country, and latterly connected with the Consulate, was tempted last autumn by his fondness for field sports, to an excursion on horseback in quest of game. After a ride of several hours, he returned to the vicinity of this road and dismounted for the purpose of breaking his fast. Whilst in the act of unfolding his haversack, a rustling of the adjacent bushes attracted his notice, and looking in the direction of the noise, his eye met the muzzle of his own double-barrelled gun pointed directly at his heart. With admirable presence of mind and a bonhomie for which our countryman is remarkable, he instantly shouted "Señor mio, muy buenos dias." Much pleasantry followed, and the conversation closed by the robber regretting that his business required a despatch which would not allow him the pleasure of a prolonged interview. Our countryman was divested of his purse, watch, gun, and clothing, and even breakfast. But his misfortunes were not ended for the day—they bound him hand and foot to prevent information to the police and left him, wishing him "better luck next time."

VI.

Few persons are aware of the vast superiority of the climate of Florida. Ill-fated since the very discovery of the continent, that beautiful peninsula has been slow to develop its inherent and peculiar advantages. In reputation at the north, it stands, perhaps, in every respect, below any portion of the southern country; and in no particular has it been more unjustly denounced, than in regard to climate—and yet, there are living in every state north of Maryland, individuals who are indebted to the climate of Florida for the prolonged existence which they now enjoy. These persons either undervalue the “blessings of health,” or are criminally remiss in withholding from their fellow creatures the information which they may have acquired by a winter in Florida. It is true that newspapers in every section of the Union have published statements in relation to the climate, productions, &c., of Florida, and this was especially the case during the late Seminole war, but so contradictory were these statements, that they have lost all credence with the intelligent community. It is for this reason, independent of others, that the votaries of science, no less than the friends of humanity, should deplore the untimely fate of Leitner and Perrine; either of whom had he lived, might have given to the world information as valuable as any derived from the researches of botanists.

It is somewhat remarkable that both of these gentlemen, (the only really scientific individuals who explored that region of country after its annexation to the United States,) should have perished in the sanguinary retribution inflicted by the Seminoles upon their perfidious invaders. The former whilst prosecuting his researches, under the protection of an exploring party of the U. S. Navy, was severely wounded and fell into the hands of the Indians, who ascertaining the nature of his vocation, were disposed to spare his life, and for several days actually bestowed every attention upon his case. But this good fortune was speedily terminated by the ferocity of a savage, who in strict compliance with Indian law, revenged upon Leitner the death of one of his tribe.

Dr. Perrine, after travelling through every portion of the United States and Mexico, passed the last few years of his life on the coast of Florida. The liberality of Congress had granted him a thousand acres of land in the vicinity of the seaboard, for the purpose of cultivating tropical plants and fruits. With this view he had cleared one or two of those luxuriant little islands denominated keys, and had formed extensive nurseries of rare and valuable plants, many of which were known only to himself. Thus retired from the world and devoted to the quiet pursuits of botanical science, he accumulated a fund of interesting facts, and but waited an opportunity to give them to the world, when one of those tragic events characteristic of the Indian war, terminated his existence—and with it the labors of years. It was, we believe, in the summer of 1840, that the Seminoles, after scattering desolation and distress throughout the length and breadth of Florida, actually left their fastnesses in the Everglades, and trying their fortune upon a new and hitherto forbidden element, with canoes for their transports, paddled fifteen miles from the main land, and at the dead hour of night sacked and burnt Indian Key. This island had been unmolested during the whole war, and being the rendezvous of vessels along the coast and within cannon shot of a detachment of seamen on an adjacent key, was the residence of Dr. Perrine and many of the enterprising navigators of these waters. Alas! for human calculations—this little island reposing in fancied security upon the bosom of the ocean and decorated with beautiful cottages and gardens, became a smouldering heap of ruins and the funeral pile of the devoted Perrine. As usual, the savages showed no mercy, and every human being, save some few who escaped in boats, perished either in sanguinary conflict, or by the flames of his own house.

Since that period few, if any persons qualified for the purpose have undertaken the botanical examination of Florida, and it is now generally regarded as the spot of all others best adapted to the haunts of Indians and runaway negroes.

So far, however, as the health of the human race may be influenced by the character of climate, there are abundant proofs in support of the salubrity of the sea-board of Florida. Meteorological tables carefully compiled by the medical staff of the army, show that the temperature of the southern seaboard is more uniform and less subject to violent changes than any portion of the Atlantic coast within the latitudes of the “variables.” During the summer months, the collateral zephyrs of the “trades” make their diurnal visits, and they may be expected with as much regularity as the ebb and flow of the tides. Nor is the winter season accompanied by the piercing blasts and chilling rains which characterize a more northern region. Tempered by the warmth of the Gulf Stream, the easterly winds are divested of their harshness, and as the configuration of the land presents no formidable barrier to the direction of different currents of air, the rigors of the weather are readily interpreted by those familiar with such observations.

One peculiarity of the climate is the short duration of cloudy or misty weather. Not as on the Pacific coast where uniformity seems interminable, and where fogs and clouds envelop the earth for weeks and months; nor yet resembling “those northern climes obscurely bright,” whose gloomy skies are seldom lighted by the smiles of "living light"—nor yet resembling those favored regions which poets speak of, "where the flowers ever blossom, the beams ever shine."

Differing from all these, the climate of Florida is ever attended with an agreeable succession of sunshine and shade. We say nothing of spicy breezes, aromatic odors, and balmy zephyrs, which regale the traveller through the inland country, nor dilate upon the vegetation and gorgeous foliage of the prairies and groves which are scattered in wild and magnificent profusion through the length and breadth of the peninsula—all these are unsuited to our practical race and this matter-of-fact age.

THE WANDERING JEW.

Paraphrased from the French of Béranger.

Christian! the weary wanderer give,
Some slight refreshment at your door,
And bid the fainting spirit live,
Whose hours of Hope and Peace are o'er.
I am a wretch, no arm may save,
But His—whose kingdom is on high,—
Mountain, and valley, waste, and wave,
The rushing whirlwind bears me by,
Years in their ceaseless circles roll,
I am not whelmed by Time's dark sea,
For me life's journey hath no goal,—
My one last hope—Eternity.

When day's departing glories fade,
And faintly glows th' empurpled West,
One glimmering spark from hopes decay'd,
Springs up to gladness in my breast.
Yet ah! that dazzling orb of light,
Again bids Night's dark shades depart,
But ne'er dispels the darker blight,
That rests, like mildew, on my heart.

Time o'er the Nation's power, and pride,
Hath sadly spread his shadowing wings,
And down the stream of ages glide,
Earth's greatest and most glorious things,
But still, the proud, imperial grave,
Where pomp and glory buried lie,
Mountain, and valley, waste and wave,
The rushing whirlwind bears me by:
I've mark'd the good man's bright hopes fade,
I've seen the wreck of youth and worth,
And Sorrow cast her brooding shade,
Like sackcloth, o'er a mourning earth,—
This giant frame the storm defies,
That Empire's power hath laid to rest,
Till now, still mightier empires rise,
Beyond the waters of the West.

A mighty change has o'er me past,
A sad, sad change, for former crime—
With Death, and Misery, am I class'd
A blasted monument through time.
When some sweet voice a kindly word,
Would whisper with a pitying sigh,

Scarce may those soothing tones be heard,
The rushing whirlwind bears me by—
And when the child of pale distress,
Feebly implores some trifling boon,
His withered hand I may not press,
The parting moment comes too soon.

While 'neath the shade of blooming bowers,
With green herbs spread on every side—
Where waters lave the drooping flowers,
That graceful bend above the tide—
If 'mid a scene so calm and fair,
My heart one moment cease to sigh,
The next the avenger finds me there,
The rushing whirlwind bears me by.

Why may not Grief restrain her tears—
These cruel pangs an instant cease—
Where Nature's fairest face appears,
Made radiant by the smile of peace!
Oh! can it be I still must weep,
And water freely earth's dark breast.
Oh! shall the Wanderer never sleep,
Till entering on eternal rest!

When sweet young faces lit with glee,
Like sunbeams cross my lonely way—
And Memory brings once more to me,
My own loved ones, as bright as they—
If I but pause to mark them well,
And gaze into each hopeful eye—
The whirlwind, like a funeral knell,
Sullen and mournful bears me by.

Dare ye I old men, at every cost,
To envy me my long career—
When all earth's hopes and pleasures lost,
My soul is dark with deep despair?
Those fair young ones, on whom I smile,
So full of life, and love, and trust,
Will tread the world's brief path awhile—
My foot shall trample on their dust!

LONGFELLOW AND EVANGELINE.

I have lately been reading this poem, and have been thus led into some reflections upon its author, his other works, and his general merits. If you think them likely to interest or amuse your readers, they are at your service.

Mr. Longfellow has realized the usual fortune of every writer, who belongs to a "school," in literature. He has been over-praised by his co-workers and his disciples. He has been as much underrated by unfriendly criticism. The mannerisms, (if that word be legitimate,) which, in the eyes of the former, are peculiar beauties, offend the sight of those, who have not the acquired taste for their appreciation. Both classes of critics fix upon these salient points: the one party to attack, the other to defend, with equal obstinacy. Both, as it seems to me, overlook, or notice less than they deserve, his true excellencies.

I shall not attempt to assign to Mr. Longfellow his exact place among poets—even among American poets. Our Western Parnassus has not escaped the democratic tendencies of the clime. The right of every "native" to aspire to the highest honors in poesy, as in politics, is asserted and proven by the countless "originals" which are met with in all our papers and periodicals, from the "Slab-town Genius of Liberty," up to the imposing pages of the established Reviews. Far be it from me, to plot any treason against "the spirit of our free institutions." I desire not to elevate any man to throne or principality—still less to degrade any unfettered son of the Muses below his brethren. I will only suggest some arrangement, analogous to that of our Federal Government—a temporary organization, to be renewed and altered every two or three years. And in that view, I do not hesitate to say, I would vote for William Cullen Bryant to be the first President of our Literary Republic, and Henry W. Longfellow should certainly have a seat in the Senate.

The latter gentleman, however, would receive my support, much more on account of his former efforts, than his recent ones. He seems, like Carlyle, to have perverted a good natural taste, into one that is artificial and morbid. The language of his earlier productions is easy and expressive, the measure well chosen and familiar. In the later poems, he has been led away by that ignis fatuus, which pedants call rhythm, and goes halting and stumbling, over outlandish ground, with constant inversions and transpositions, among dactyls and spondees, trochees and iambuses, anapaests and what not—whose intricate feet will trip and overthrow any plain English biped, at every step of his progress.

Nor is this his only deterioration. He has gone sadly astray in his search after simplicity. He has adopted the Wordsworthian dogma, that one object in nature or art is as poetical as another: and, in illustrating this theory, he has, like his great contemporary, fallen into some very puerile and absurd platitudes. It is true that a sword, and the coulter of a plough, are both pieces of iron; and that the interest of a combat depends on the tragic issue, that may await one or both of the parties. But is the reader of Scott's romances conscious of the same feelings—when he watches, with 'bated breath, the encounter of Richard and Saladin, by the Diamond of the Desert—and when he bursts into a hearty "guffaw," as he beholds Bailie Nicol Jarvie, singing the plaid of the dismayed Highlander? The true office of the poet is to select the materials fit for his purpose, and to combine them in a fitting manner. Not that he is to seek them only in high places—but that, in the low, he is to choose what is natural, not vulgar merely. I feel, however, that I am fast getting beyond my depth in this direction, and, with your leave, I will make for shallow water.

In the best poems of our author, we are often delighted with beautiful thoughts, pure sentiments, and warm emotions, poured out with an eloquence and pathos, which make their way to our inmost heart. His "Autumn," and his "Spirit of Poetry," are worthy of Bryant, and indeed of any body else. His "Flowers" almost, or perhaps quite, equal that exquisite "Hymn to the Flowers" of Horace Smith. In the "Footsteps of Angels," there is so perfect an example of that which I am trying to describe, that I cannot do better than quote a few stanzas of it—

"Then the forms of the departed
Enter at the open door;
The beloved, the true hearted,
Come to visit me once more;

* * * *

"And, with them, the Being Beauteous,
Who unto my youth was given,
More than all things else to love me,
And is now a saint in Heaven.

"With a slow and noiseless footstep,
Comes the messenger divine,
Takes the vacant chair beside me,
Lays her gentle hand in mine,

"And she sits and gazes at me
With those deep and tender eyes,
Like the stars, so still and saint like,
Looking downward from the skies."

But it would be impossible—and I rejoice that it is impossible—in the limits of a desultory sketch like this, even to name all of his productions, which deserve to live. From the Spanish Student, in which occur many such, I quote one beautiful passage, which shall be the last—

— "She lies asleep,
And, from her parted lips, her gentle breath
Comes, like the fragrance from the lips of flowers.
Her tender limbs are still, and, on her breast,
The cross she prayed to, ere she fell asleep,
Rises and falls with the soft tide of dreams,
Like a light barge safe moored."

Reader! if you ever saw a picture like that, you must recognize its fidelity in verse. If you never did—rely upon the word of those who have seen it.

It is time now to adduce some proofs of the faults which I have laid to our poet's charge. I almost regret that they are so easily to be procured: for I shall go no further than this late poem, Evangeline.

The story itself is well enough, though perhaps the "sentimental journeys" of the damsel-errant, who is the heroine, might as well have been circumscribed within narrower limits, both as to geography and moral probability. From Nova Scotia to Bayou Plaquemine, thence to "the Walloway and the Owyhee"—the Ozark Mountains—the wilds of Michigan—and wherever else the foot of man or woman might tread—poor Evangeline wanders, year after year, in search of a lover, from whom she has been parted, by cruel fate—and the British. At last, after narrowly missing him several times, (and his escapes almost lead one to suspect him of some design to elude,) the baffled pursuer gives up the chase, and becomes a Sister of Charity in Philadelphia—

"And her ear was pleased with the Thee and Thou of the Quakers."

There she devotes herself to the care of the sick in the Hospitals, and in the abodes of poverty, until the advent of a certain pestilence, which came—

"Pregaged by wondrous signs; and mostly by flocks of wild pigeons,* Darkening the sun in their flight, with naught in their craws,
but an acorn."

This pestilence, whether Cholera or Yellow Fever does not appear, made fearful ravages among the population of the Quaker City, and Evangeline, with untiring patience and fortitude, gave herself up to the service of the afflicted. At last, in one of the wards, she encounters the long lost Gabriel, in the last stage of the disease. He recognizes her, dies in her arms, and she soon after follows him to the silent repose of the tomb.

The poem abounds with passages of beautiful poetry and sentiment, but travestied in such a grotesque costume of hexameter verse, as to disguise all their natural loveliness. And, moreover, the inflections and inversions, necessary to fit our vernacular tongue to the unaccustomed metres of heroic verse, often result in most deplorable combinations. These blemishes, added to many of the homespun images, for which we are indebted to the "simplicity" theory, make the whole work distasteful to an ear even tolerably fastidious, and must consign it to a very humble place among Mr. Longfellow's productions.

But I proceed to the examples. The benign

* These pigeons can hardly fail to remind the reader of Mother Goose's Melodies of another great prodigy—

"There was an old woman, and, what do you think,
She lived upon nothing—but victuals and drink."

influence of Evangeline, upon crops and population, is thus (erroneously) foreshadowed:

"'Sunshine of Saint Eulalie' was she called; for that was the sunshine
Which, as the farmers believed, would load their orchards with apples;
She, too, would bring to her husband's house delight and abundance,
Filling it full of love and the ruddy faces of children."

The sympathy between mankind and the brute creation receives a new illustration—

"Foremost, bearing the bell, Evangeline's beautiful heifer, Proud of her snow-white hide, and the ribbon that waved from her collar,
Quietly paced and slow, as if conscious of human affection!"

We submit, that if a "slow coach" be significant of "consciousness of human affection," a land terrapin should be henceforth the very type of sensibility.

"Patiently stood the cows meanwhile, and yielded their udders
Unto the milkmaid's hand; whilst loud, and in regular cadence
Into the sounding pail the foaming streamlets descended!"

A perfect cataract of milk! Buttermilk Falls are nothing to it! "How do the waters come down at Lodore?"

Mr. Longfellow evidently respects the rule, that "the sound should be an echo to the sense," thus he says,

"So in each pause of the song, with measured motion the clock clicked!"

It is with reluctance we accuse Mr. Longfellow of plagiarism: but the last of the three following lines is plainly borrowed from Moore's—
"I knew by the smoke that so gracefully curled," &c.

"Thus as they sat, there were footsteps heard, and, suddenly lifted,
Sounded the wooden latch, and the door swung back on its hinges.
Benedict knew by the hob-nailed shoes it was Basil the blacksmith!"

There is also another instance—

"Not far withdrawn from these, by the cider-press and the bee-hives,
Michael the fiddler was placed, with the gayest of hearts and of waistcoats!"

Which of us can forget old Grimes, who "Had no malice in his mind,

Nor ruffles on his shirt!"

In relation to one statement, I sincerely desire an explanation—

"Then, all forgetful of self, she wandered into the village, Cheering with looks and words the disconsolate hearts of the women,
As, o'er the darkening fields with lingering steps they departed,
Urged by their household cares, and the weary feet of their children!"

Does the poet really mean that these primitive children of Grand Pré urged their mothers home with their weary feet—kicking them along the road? If so, we must conclude that old "Father Felician" was remiss in teaching them the fifth commandment. It was certainly very un- dutiful behavior.

After selecting so many unfavorable specimens of the poem, it would not be fair to omit some of an opposite character. Those which follow, will recommend themselves, I think, without a word of praise.

"In doors, warm by the wide-mouthed fireplace, idly the farmer
Sat in his elbow chair, and watched how the flames and the smoke-wreaths Struggled together like foes in a burning city. Behind him Nodding and mocking along the wall, with gestures fantast-tastic,
Darted his own huge shadow, and vanished away into darkness.

* * *

Fragments of song the old man sang, and carols of Christmas,
Such as at home in the olden time, his fathers before him Sang in their Norman orchards and bright Burgundian vineyards."

A venerable old man is thus described—

"Bent like a laboring oar, that toils in the surf of the ocean, Bent, but not broken, by age"—

Here are two very pretty, though somewhat quaint fancies—

"Silently, one by one, in the infinite meadows of heaven, Blossomed the lovely stars, the forget-me-nots of the Angels."

* * *

"And as she gazed from the window, she saw serenely the moon pass Forth from the folds of a cloud, and one star follow her footsteps,
As, out of Abraham's tent, young Ishmael wandered with Hagar!"

Evangeline's desolation, and fortitude, are touchingly expressed in these lines, with which our quotations shall conclude—

"Lowly and meek in spirit, and patiently suffering all things—
Fair was she and young; but alas! before her extended, Dreary and vast and silent, the desert of life, with its pathway,
Marked by the graves of those who had sorrowed and suffered before her.

* * *

Something there was in her life, incomplete, imperfect, unfinished,

As if a morning of June, with all its music and sunshine,
Suddenly paused in the sky, and fading, slowly descended
Into the East again, from whence it late had arisen."

And now, patient reader, for patient you have proved yourself, if you have read so far as this,
I propose to sum up all that I have been writing, in some hexameters of my own: in respect of which, I have only to say, with "rare Ben Jonson," that, if they be not poetry, they at least are truth!

—'Way down east, there lives one Long-fellow, odd and fantastic,

Who writes poetry, which many people are fond of perusing.
I like much of it—nevertheless, in my critical judgment,
Wordsworth following, his simplicity borders on flatness.
But my quarrel is, for the most part, with his metrical notions,

Which do appear to me sometimes fanciful, quaint and pedantic.

There is "Evangeline," who is a lovely one, if she was drest well;

But she masquerades in an old suit of hexameter verses,
Which seem stolen from some theatrical, classical, pawnshop.

Longfellow might as well strut about, in an old toga virilis,
Or put a helmet on his little head, take a spear in his right hand,

And play the part of a Cicero, Pompey, or Coriolanus.

'Tis not a new thing to see poets fail in an effort of this kind—

Southey attempted it, till Anti Jacobins tore him to fragments—

And Henry W. would act judiciously, if he would turn back,

And trot his Pegasus, in the same gait that "the masters" have taught him.

THE CRIME OF ANDREW BLAIR.

BY P. F. COOKE.

CHAPTER I.

On a small lot of ground, fenced off from a corner of a large and valuable estate, stood many years ago, a mean log cabin. It fronted upon a highway, which, like many others in Virginia, was a river of mud in winter, and a strip transplanted from Zahara, in summer. In this cabin lived Molly Herries, an old witch of a woman, and Jack Herries her son. The mother was hideously ugly, ill-natured and querulous. The son was a heavy, round-shouldered fellow, with high cheek bones, cunning black eyes, a dark oily skin, and damp looking black hair. One day—at that ripe season when the haze of the Indian summer obscures our landscapes—Molly Herries and Jack conversed:

"Mother," said Jack, "I see the rich men go by on their snorting horses: are they any better than I am? I see the rich ladies go by in their grand carriages: when you go out it is on foot, with a stick in your hand. God made all of us. There is a great injustice in some being up so high, and others just as good being down so low."

"Work you rascal—work," answered the old woman. This good advice seemed to fall like a fag upon the embers of Jack's meditations.

"Work!" he retorted—"its very easy to say work. Words come glib. But when I am straining my back, which is weakly because I have been growing too fast; and when I lose my wind, which has never been good since I was down with the measles, it's little comfort I get from thinking of what's to be made by my working. I might work for thirty years, and the best would be a coat of plaster, and a new stone chimney to the old rat-trap of a cabin. Mother, I am a rascal—am I? Well, I'm going out to seek my fortune."

"You are—are you?" said Molly Herries. "And what's to be done with me?"

"That's your look out," answered the affectionate son. "When birds get their wings, mother, they fly away. The old hen shifts for herself."

"But Jack," said the mother, softening under the first growth of alarm, "we can may-be fix things without your going away. It's not the bird that flies furthest that finds the greenest tree, or the fattest stubble to light in."

"Mr. Blair promised to inquire for an overseer's place for me," replied Jack. "I am going to see him. But if he can't do anything for me, I'm off. I'm very fond of you—I am positively. But every tub on its own bottom. Of course, in this country, which is so enlightened, nobody's going to burn you for a witch."

Molly Herries made a blow at the head of her son. He avoided it with a leap which put him outside of the cabin.

"Throw my coat out, mother," he said coaxingly. "You don't suppose I was in earnest. You don't suppose I would leave my respected parent." Jack, at this effective stroke, put a knuckle into first one eye then the other. "Throw my coat out. I'll be back from the great man's in a little while. Throw my coat out, mother."

The old woman slammed the door in his face; then, grimacing angrily, threw a shabby coat out at a little loop-hole of a window. Jack Herries put the garment on, smoothed down the cuffs, reached his hair with several applications of his beefy fingers and set off at a lazy gait. His destination was the house of Andrew Blair—the master of the estate, on a corner of which stood his mother's cabin. We must go before him to this house.

Andrew Blair, a man of wealth, talent, political training, and a fair degree of distinction, had built a palace on his patrimonial estate. It stood on the broad top of a towering hill—some founding of mountain origin, put down far away among the lowlands. He called this residence, which his pride had established in place of the old rambling homestead of his father, by a fine name—Lindores.

Andrew Blair sat in a superb room, at dinner, with his neighbor, Colonel Arthur Pellew. As the wine does its work of development, you may perhaps read the two gentlemen. The host is a man of singularly quick senses. His eyes watch and discover every thing. He hears a faint whisper at a remarkable distance. His mind is subtle and winds to its object. He is not dishonest, or even crafty, in the evil sense of the word. It is but the mind's constitution to do by graceful indirection, and with an intense enjoyment of its own dexterity, what a bold mind does better at a direct bound. His passions are swift and dangerous, but rather those of a woman than masculine. When he seems to be controlling them, he is only directing them: the calmness which looks like forbearance is only the cool search for the weak point of attack.

His guest is blunt, frank, and choleric.

As Jack Herries trudged up from the cabin to the palace, these gentlemen conversed over their dessert.

"You wronged me in that business," said Pellew, "and the more I think of it the less I am satisfied with it."

"Pellew," Blair answered, "I have more than once assured you that you misunderstood my agency in the affair. I explained to you in great detail, not a week ago—I thought at the time, quite to your satisfaction."

"So you did. You explained until devil the bit could I understand a simple matter. A dirty wall requires a great deal of white-washing."

Blair looked quickly to his guest, but answered with a smile:

"Pardon me; but the clearest truth, where facts are minute and crowded, is unintelligible if one has a very single impatient mind to bring to judge of it."

"I understand you," answered the choleric colonel. "You talk about my impatient mind. You mean my stupid mind. May be I am a jack ass. But by — you wronged me in the business, in spite of your fine excuses."

Blair answered with a paling cheek, and a low, clear tone:

"Excuses? excuses did you say?" But he checked himself, and added coldly—"Finish your wine, and let us go into the open air."

The gentlemen left the table and walked out. Pellew lived at no great distance, over some fields, beyond a skirt of woodland, at an old barracks of a place, which his bachelor life and bad temper made desolate enough. He had walked to Lindores, and now expressed his determination to go home. Andrew Blair quietly insisted upon walking a part of the way with him. One of the servants heard his master mutter—"a cut-throat evening it is, to be sure." Guest and host—the ox and the panther—walked away together.

The comment which Blair had made on the weather was well enough merited. It was abominable. The air was dry and hot. The sky was dull with a haze exaggerated, from a delicate veil to an oppressive blanket of smoke—or of something like smoke. The wind made melancholy sounds. No deciduous tree, except the white oak, retained its leaves; and these were as dead as the beauty and youth of the world of a thousand years ago. The sun looked as it does when seen through smoked glass—orbled, rayless, and blood-red. The Indian summer, when it just a little touches our country scenes, is good and welcome; but when it shrouds us, and melancholy winds rise, I know nothing in the ill looks of honest winter half so dismal.

Andrew Blair and Colonel Pellew had been sometime gone, when Jack Herries reached the house. The negro is generally an affectionate creature, but he possesses very little generosity of sentiment, and deals hardly with his inferiors. Freeborn Jack Herries in such a coat, with black oily face, and vulgar manners, excited the positive indignation of a composed-looking old negro gentleman, in breeches and long hose, whose bushy grey hair spread to his shoulders like an ample and well-powdered wig. But Jack was not to be driven off until his questions were fully answered. When they were, he cocked his (substitute for a) beaver, clenched his fists in his pockets, and renewed his lazy gait in pursuit of the gentlemen, whom he could see drawing toward the skirt of woodland.

The next hour of that dismal day saw a fatal deed done.

Andrew Blair came home after night-fall. He was disordered in dress, and as wan as the messenger who pulled Priam's curtain.

Jack Herries about the same time got back to his cabin. He seemed, beneath his weight of thought, to forget the foolish quarrel with his mother. He entered, sat down without a word, and with elbows on his knees, and face between his hands, meditated under a volley of questions. At last, as if thought had done its work, and the inexorable will was armed—on foot—and ready to advance—he looked up firmly and said boldly :

"Mother, we must make a bon-fire of the old rat-trap. I have the great man in my power. The old witch shall have a coach for her crab stick yet. Money—money—makes all the difference between people, mother."

CHAPTER II.

The chapter just ended is but the prologue to my story. We must pass, at a bound, over a space of time greater than the interval which brought gentle Perdita from the wreck to the dance of the shepherds.

Five and twenty years have passed away. The rough bachelor's establishment, which once belonged to Colonel Arthur Pellew, has undergone great changes. A cupola surmounts the roof—so burnished a cupola that, in sunlight or moonlight, it blazes like a bale-fire. Pigeon-houses, imitated from the pagodas which we see on blue India china, pierce the foliage of willows, and shine with glossy birds that chase each other on the steep roofs, making war or love. The portico of an Athenian temple towers in front of the renovated edifice. Close, cramped avenues, walks edged with box, little gods and goddesses with cracked legs and weather-stained shoulders, tulip beds under forest trees, and numerous other evidences of the introduction of a very refined taste, confound, if they do not delight, the visitor. The interior of the house, whose surroundings are so elaborate, is quite splendid. I can, however, be only particular enough to say that one apartment, the dining-room, is adorned with paintings, and prints of a singular character. Amongst the paintings, a series illustrates Hood's "Dream of Eugene Aram." The execution of these is, in general, bad enough, but the painter has seized a ghastly conception ably and the face of Aram, repeated in the different pictures, is something to haunt one. There are again some wild scenes, highly colored, and with a fantastic horror in their details, of man-killing on the Spanish main. Two Shakspeare prints—"The death of Desdemona," and "The murder of the Princes"—are amongst these proofs of a strange singleness of idea in the pictorial adornment of the room.

It was a sunny evening of late autumn. Along a cramped avenue—up to the Athenian portico—rolled a carriage. Out of it got a well-dressed man, of middle age, with black hair, dark skin, and shrewd eyes. He looked about him, and gave directions, with the manner of a master. Such, indeed, he was. Jack Herries had become John Herries, Esq., a man of influence and large possessions, and rode in the coach which even his old mother—now some years dead—had lived to be trundled grandly about in, in fulfilment of his bold promise. After him a lady, very small, very meek-looking, with a prim cap border visible under her bonnet, and a rich dress remarkable for a sort of tidy simplicity in its fashion, also descended from the carriage. It was clear, from the fact that Herries merely stood to one side, and turned his tobacco in his cheek, leaving her to get out or tumble out as might happen, that the lady was his wife. And she did bear to him this relation which seems to justify every sort of affectionate negligence. The poor boy, very soon after his escape from poverty to brighter hopes, had married this lady, then a comely and well-educated country girl, as much above him as her honest and simple tastes reduced her, in his false opinion, below his present grand position.

Man and wife were presently talking earnestly in the long dining-room hung with the pictures of murder. The conversation would seem to have been a continuation of one begun in the carriage.

"These schemes," said Herries, with a slow emphatic utterance, "whether honest or wicked, must at least now be perfected for our security. Our son must marry the niece of Andrew Blair. I have broached the subject to Blair."

"And how did he meet it?" the wife asked.

"That matters very little," Herries answered evasively. "Pride must bend in this world. You groan, and say that I have borne hard on this man. Now I tell you that those who come after him, if he should die without a safe conclusion of matters between us, would bear harder upon us—yes—ruin us utterly—even to the second generation. One day I found my hands on a round of the ladder of life. I have climbed well since that day, but always with a danger pulling at my hands and feet, and threatening to drag me suddenly from the extreme height if I should win it."

Herries strode to and fro, his face inclining toward his breast, his brow darker than the swart hues which anger produces could have rendered it; dependency had, for the moment, seized upon him.

"Husband," said the wife, "if we keep our truth and purity, the rest is but dreams."

"From the day—the day—which brought me up from the poverty which I may be dragged back to, I have used Andrew Blair," Herries continued as if talking to himself. "I began by borrowing a sum of money from him, which, coming so freshly out of poverty, I thought quite a fortune. The use of this money enlarged my ideas. I borrowed again—and again—and again—year after year. I bought lands, I speculated in many ways, losing and winning, and now what is the result? Against the property which I have got together is a monstrous debt. The man who has built up my fortunes holds my bonds to so great an amount, that the carpet I tread on would not be left to me if I were compelled to pay them. It was a weakness to borrow from him, when I might have compelled him to give. I wanted boldness to say give."

"Not so—I hope—not so: it was honor, and the sense of right that prevented you from saying give"—stole in the fine clear voice of the prim little wife.

Herries turned with a sudden step. His face assumed a resolute expression; but it was not because the good fairy of his household had strung his nature with better thoughts, for he said bluntly:

"The safe ending must now be this. Our son must marry this girl, who, besides my bonds, will bring him the fine Lindores property. Blair of course will give every thing to the girl. He must. This will be a safe and honest conclusion to my dealings with him: every way better than my original scheme, which was—keeping a keen watch on his health—to strike in at the earliest failing symptom, and extort a surrender of my bonds. Tom must marry the girl, or I must at once adopt this original plan. Do you know that Blair has lately had a very singular attack? He may die suddenly any day."

"When we begin to scheme," answered Mrs. Herries—clear-minded and unyielding—"we begin to make cares and troubles for ourselves."

"You must admit," said Herries impatiently, that I have schemed into all that we possess—property, influence, and good position. Indeed you never would have been my wife but for those first steps of my scheming which brought me up to an equality with your family."

Mrs. Herries, being anything but one of those caustic wives who avail themselves of opportunities such as this to suggest the possibility that wedlock has proved a one-sided blessing, only said with honest energy:

"Our property is not really ours—your influence is but caused by the weakness of human nature which pays court to the appearance of wealth—and our position, not being natural to us, is not truly so comfortable as the middle station. An industrious perseverance would have brought you to the middle station. These things being true, in seeming to gain, what after all have you gained?"

"Nothing," says Herries, "unless I get rid of my bonds."

"Ah! even accomplish that end, and apart from the remorse which may afflict you for the use of bad means, you will inevitably find the emptiness of the human baubles which your schemings have secured to you."

"My dear Mrs. Herries," replied the husband, "you have very profound reflections. You have read your Bible until you are sessionally impressed with the idea that the possession which follows human desire is vain and unsufficing. But if Solomon, my dear, declared this for an inexorable truth, you must remember that he nevertheless held on to his throne and power. I have played the game of life with some effect. I shall not, from any motive of that despairing wisdom, give up the game quite yet, and consent to be blown away like a dead leaf from a tree. However, we are wasting words. We must act, not preach. Some first steps must be taken. It was with this idea that I invited my friend Blair and his charming niece to dine with us to-morrow. There will be a mixed company to meet them—but we can do no better. We must have Tom polish himself a little."

I am afraid that a feature in the character of good Mrs. Herries was obstinacy. Instead of dropping the conversation here, she fastened a pair of very gentle grey eyes upon John Herries, and said:

"Husband, it is not often that you honor me by talking to me about your important concerns. I must say a few words now, because I may not have another opportunity until too late. If Minny Blair will marry our son from love, or liking, let them marry, and end your troubles. But if you have some secret knowledge of some dark deed of that unhappy man, her uncle—and I long ago suspected as much—and mean to use what you know to drive these great people to the match, why, in the name of God, do not continue in the project."

Herries looked to his wife with an expression of gloomy apathy. She continued:

"You borrowed sums of money. Well, honest men borrow sums of money. Let these debts remain debts, either to be paid or to be left unpaid as your means may or may not enable you to pay them. Let your concealment, of what you may know to the harm of poor Mr. Blair, be a friend's concealment of a friend's misdoings. I have not a heart to wish justice brought down where it brings misery. We can be happy if, losing our property, we keep our honesty. We must have a wretched old age; no cheerfulness, no self-respect, no peace in this world or hope of happiness hereafter, if we are dishonest, false, extortionate, and cruel, in order to keep together our riches."

The comeliness of Mrs. Herries became decided beauty, so warmly did her countenance express truth and honesty.

"The marriage will end all safely and well," said John Herries, with a nervous, but persuasive accent. "We need not take trouble on interest. Tom will make himself agreeable. Blair will aid us. We must use a little innocent adroitness—that is all. Minny will no doubt consent. We will all be happy—Tom will be supremely so. Wife, we will go down the hill of life, you and I, loving each other, hand in hand, without a care."

"It will be a proud, grand match for our boy," said the good mother, impressed, in spite of her cool reason, by the hopeful picture which her husband drew. Presently the maternal heart made her add:

"But Tom is kind-natured, and an honest lad, and, when he comes rid of his young nonsense, will make a good husband."

Shortly after this conversation between man and wife had come to such an end, Tom Herries, the son, came home from a visit to a neighbor. As he rode into the grounds near the house, the smooth broad road of a circle invited him to feats of horsemanship. He put his horse, a strong sorrel, with long flapping ears, and a heavy tail lying close to his quarters, into a quick gallop. Flap-ear, in making the round, shied from a statue of Mercury. The God held his caduceus, with its twining snakes, horizontally at arm's length. "When we come around again," thought Tom, "we'll try a jump at the little fellow's walking-stick."

At the next round, Tom rode his horse at Mercury, drove in the spurs, and succeeded quite badly: he carried away the God's wand, his winged cap, and the head under this latter, with Flap-ear's heels.

"What in the world are you doing, my son?" said Mrs. Herries from the portico.

Tom dismounted without answering; and gave his horse to a groom. As he came upon the portico, his gait was somewhat unsteady, and the expression of his eyes peculiar.

"Ah!" muttered the mother, "you are tipsy, my poor son. Come to your room. Your father is in one of his black humors."

Tom, a short, straight fellow, with aquiline nose, a receding forehead, and prominent eyes, pinched as close together as the muzzles of a double-barrel, took his mother's arm, and entered the house, saying with a groan:

"I have a severe rheumatism in my heel, mother, which accounts for my manner of walking."

CHAPTER III.

John Herries gave a great dinner, and invited many persons to it. The principal of these were Andrew Blair and his niece. Five and twenty years had made Andrew Blair a ruin. A poor, sad, old man he looked now, with an expression of desolate distress in his eyes, and the pinch of pain in his sharp features. Mary Blair, his niece, called by every one Minny, was a girl of twenty—tall, well developed in person, and generally considered a commanding and superb beauty in spite of extremely light hair, and eyes of much too pale a blue. Her demeanor was reserved, her expression cold but observant. What wealth of thought and feeling lay, like a mine, under the unbetraying surface, even her friends could but guess. She was physically agile, and an accomplished horsewoman. Her uncle, left a widower, without children early in life, had never married again; and she, taken very young under his roof, was the heiress presumptive to his large fortune.

In addition to these two guests, a jolly old foxhunter, one Major Wright, came to the table of John Herries. There were many others, but they must make a mere cloud of heads in the background of our picture.

It was with the coming on of the dessert, that Major Wright, avoiding wine, and drinking brandy and water out of a silver cup, became very genial and amusing.

"I hear, my young lady," said the Major to Miss Blair, "that you can carry your horse over a rough country, like an angel."

"I ride very well," said Minny.

"There are no such horses, or men, now as we had in old times," sighed Major Wright.

Tom Herries had an extraordinary reverence for the jolly foxhunter: he was awed beyond putting in a defence of himself, or his sorrel Flap-ear. Minny Blair had no vanity, and said nothing of her noble mare Flight. One of the cloud of heads, however, opened its indefinite mouth, and contradicted the Major. The Major, the copper of whose face gleamed ferociously, put in a killing retort; the head disappeared again in the cloud. The Major, quickened by this daring opposition, entertained the company with a riding adventure which he had witnessed in his youth. His narrative, episodical as it may seem, must make a part of my history. The reader, in the end, will discover why.

"I never told you the story of Rattlesnake Bob Wormley's ride," said Major Wright, after applying to his silver cup. "That was a performance to talk about. Rattlesnake Bob—the country called him so because Rattlesnake was the name of his place, and there were several other Bob Wormleys—was a tiptop housekeeper, a fine specimen of a country-gentleman, never went abroad without a half dozen body servants at his back, and died at last with his debts twisted up in such a manner that he ruined his heirs, executors, and assigns—every mother's son of them—and every body that came within forty miles of Rattlesnake. I believe the Yankee that bought the estate gave out in the long run, and went by the universal board also. If so, it shows the liberalizing and humanizing effects of our climate, institutions, and society upon northern character. But I am growing philosophical. Rattlesnake Bob was one day full of wine—other drink, of course, must be taken into the count—when Jack Brooke, a very fine fellow, bragged a little of a recent performance of his. 'I rode as the crow flies,' said Jack, 'from Hallowell's to the old Fort, taking the river as I went.' 'That was nothing,' said Rattlesnake Bob. 'You are not the man to do more,' said Jack. 'I'll ruin myself or do twice as much,' said Bob. 'You can get a chance at a bet,' said Jack. 'From Hallowell's to the Fort,' said Bob, 'is five miles. From here to the Fort is ten. The ground is pretty much the same for roughness. I can start from my door here, and ride, as the crow flies, to the sign-post at the old Fort. I'll go my estate on it.' 'I take that bet, and count acre against acre of better land,' said Jack Brooke. So the gentlemen bet their estates on the ride. One of the company, a little lawyer from the old Fort, a bit of a towa, remonstrated; but we made him drunk in a few minutes, and had him as uproarious as the rest for the business. Well the day was fixed for the ride, terms were settled on, judges were appointed, the county surveyor was employed to run a bee-line from Bob's front door to the coming out post. It was to be marked off with blazed posts a couple of hundred yards apart. Bob had ten feet on each side of the row of posts. If he went further out he lost. He was to have three horses. The surveyor went to work. Now what should happen? The line brought him plump up against old Toney Smith's new brick house. Here was a poser. A gentleman, of course, would have blown his house to the devil with a keg or two of gunpowder, under the exciting circumstances. But Toney was not a gentleman. The blackguard talked about appraisers, and all that. I gave him a bit of my mind. It had no effect on him whatever. At last it was agreed. For about the price of his house out and out, Toney consented to let a hole be cut through it, nine feet high and four feet wide. The young attorney from the Fort got particular on this head, as an infraction of an article in the bet which forbade the removal of 'fences, natural obstructions, &c.' I just inquired if he took a house to be a fence, or a natural obstruction; he refined a little, but was pretty strong on the '&c.' I told him that if he put his law books between gentlemen and their amusements, he and I should be obliged to call in a friend apiece to aid in clarifying the argument. He understood the suggestion, and found an authority to show that he had been altogether wrong about the '5c.' So the hole was cut in Toney's house."

Tom Herries, at this stage of Major Wright's narrative, gave symptoms of being both delighted and drunk. The Major, gratified by Tom's evident admiration, went on :

"The day fixed for the ride came. If any member of the grown male population, for thirty miles round, was absent on the exhilarating occasion, I am ignorant of the fact. A great many ladies, my dear Miss Minny, also, were present. The garden was a wild—till woman smiled. I give the tails of some lines which I forget, but which are as elegant as true. But you doubtless recal them, my dear young lady—I think they occur in Pope's Iliad. Rattlesnake Bob, inflamed by woman's eyes, and big with the magnitude of the job before him, looked red and heroic. His horses were wonderful creatures, perfect sons of thunder—except one which was an Alderman mare. Syphax was the name of the best of the horses. He was a tremendous red bay. He was steady and still always before starting—still as a cannon loaded to the muzzle, and just the beast to go off like one at the touch of the match. On this occasion his tail and mane were tied with ribands, and his coat looked like the most beautiful mahogany with the mottles and curls of the wood all brought out and polished. 'I'll make a side-bet,' said Bob, 'that I go the whole distance on Syphax.' A bet was made on that to a large amount. Bob mounted, and with a very gentlemanly waving of his cap to the spectators, moved away at a pretty gallop. I forgot to say that time was not an item in the bet; it was against the doing of the thing at all that Jack Brooke felt himself safe in betting; he didn't limit Bob as to time. As Syphax moved away, 'He's a horse in ten thousand,' said one—'and it's a man that rides him,' put in another; and then, Bob, having got a little clear of the crowd, there was a hurrah that made Syphax strike forward as if a whip had cracked at his haunches. We went on just promiscuously, some pulling down fences, some going over them, some already on foot screeching after their horses that ran away with stirrups striking, and heads and tails up. It was a great sight. Bob rode just through seven fences, for Syphax took the bit in his teeth and couldn't be gathered. Jack Brooke's judge, myself, and the umpire, went close after and had a clear way of it. At fence No. 8, Bob got a telling hold, and lifted the beast over. We took it behind him. Next we came to a gully eighteen feet across and as many deep. Syphax took it with three feet to spare. We economised inches, and also got over, when, after some as bad ground as I ever saw, we got to Toney Smith's, his wife—who was a well-bred woman to be married to a blackguard like Toney—had herself and her daughters dressed out and ready to do the honours. Bob stopped Syphax in the tunnel, which had been cut through the house, and which had been hung with cedar and lilac and hollyhocks; he took a cup to refresh him, kissed right and left, and complimented the ladies for ten minutes. 'I feel certain I shall get through,' said he to Mrs. Smith. 'I'll be proud to hear it,' said Mrs. Smith back again; 'and if, you do, the hole in the house shall stay as it is just to keep such a grand performance in memory.' My dear Miss Minny, that heroic woman was an honour to her sex. It was not her fault that Toney afterwards built up the hole to keep out the nor-wester, and to save the walls. The family were down with rheumatism, and the roof was coming in, before she capitulated. From Toney's to the old Fort was a gullied country. Bob got over a dozen of the gullies, some of which invited us to go a little about. He came to number 13. 'If you clear that,' said I, 'Syphax beats the world. It's thirty feet if it's ten.' Bob drew up, and looked in and over. 'Give me a drink,' said he. Of course we had the conveniences. He took a strong pull, and then plashed a little into his horse's mouth. He rode back about a hundred yards, and then putting his teeth together, raised a gallop. He made it faster as he came on. His eyes looked wicked. It was beautiful to see how Syphax planted his feet from the strokes of the gallop, just on the edge, and let himself be lifted. Bob drove in the spurs. 'Go it,' we screeched. Go it he did, but the bank gave way under the hoofs. There was a struggle as if the beast had wings; but he went down to the bottom of the gully like a locomotive. We scrambled down on foot. Bob had a shoulder out of place. Syphax got up, holding out a foreleg, and puffing like a brewer groggy with the steam from his vats. You could see by the beast's countenance that the courage was knocked out of him. 'Pull my arm in,' said Bob, 'and then go back for the Alderman mare. Ride her in at the lower end of the gully, and get her here. I can ride her up that bank by taking a slant. We have twenty feet wide to do it in.' We pulled the arm in. The Alderman mare was brought. Bob mounted and tried the slant. It would have been no go, but we shouldered the mare up, and got her out. Jack Brooke's judge, a tiptop fellow, helped; his blood was up, and he had no idea of such a ride being stopped. Bob looked like Julius Cæsar when he got out, except that he was a dirty image of that elegant Roman. Away he went with a yell, and by the time we came near him again, he was in a gentleman's garden, and trying to get out. It was a six-foot brick wall that was before him, but he had jumped it to get in, and why shouldn't he jump it to get out? We were obliged to leave our horses and climb over to see about matters. 'Brandy and fire will do it,' said the umpire. Bob took the brandy, and I tied a bundle of straw to a pea-stick. 'Back to the centre walk,' said I. Bob backed. The mare was already furious, and the blood spirting from one of her flanks. 'Put her head well to it—we'll spoil her looks, but we'll get her over.' I lit the straw with a match, and clapped the blaze to her tail. She went at the wall like a charge of shot. She made her leap too quick, and lit on the top, but she rolled to the other side instead of falling back. Bob never gave us a shout to show that his neck was safe, but we presently saw him get away with his mare strong under him. We went on after. A mile further we saw the old Fort on a hill over the river. Bob took to water, scrambling down a muddy bank; he got over with a straight swim, climbed the bank with his mare looking sleek in the legs, and whip-tailed, and rode straight to the sign-post. Most of the company, by fast riding and driving on the high roads, had already got there. Wasn't there a roar when Bob came out! The breaking of a mill-dam in a freshet is nothing to it. We got to the place as soon as possible. Bob was saying nothing. I found something was the matter, and got close to him. 'The roll out of the garden flattened me,' he said, in a weakly way, 'the mare rolled over me twice. I'm hurt inside.' This, my friends, is the story of a remarkable ride. I defy the present times to produce a Rattlesnake Bob or a Syphax. My opinion is that the breed has run out—I mean both as to men and horses."

Major Wright sighed, and drank brandy and water. As he did so several of the indefinites of the party said to each other:

"The Major bores us confoundedly. Not a soul has said a word for thirty minutes except himself."

Tom Herries, with a good deal of fervour, begged to know "if the whole-souled gentleman, who rode so well, got over the inside hurt?"

"Yes," answered the Major.

"And won the bet?"

"Certainly. But, upon my word, he won a loss. Jack Brooke's estate, it naturally turned out, was covered with mortgages. Bob came near calling Jack out when he made the discovery; but reflecting that Rattlesnake had been in the same condition, and that he had acquired a great deal of glory by his performance, he forgave Jack, and left him to mortgages, lawyers, &c. They made a clean sweep of it. As for positive losses, Bob had to pay the bet that he made on riding no horse but Syphax; then he had to owe Toney Smith for damage to his house. I assure you the winner lost in the business."

"It was a great ride," said Tom; "what became of Rattlesnake Bob?"

"Tom, my boy, you seem to be interested," said the gracious Major. "Bob went out of the world shabbily for a fine gentleman. At a convivial party, some bets passed as to the time one could stand on his head. Rattlesnake Bob, in the midst of the best society in Virginia, made a bet, and undertook to win it. He was to stand on his head twenty minutes. He was so unfortunate as to smother at the end of three."

Andrew Blair had listened to the narrative of the ride, with an inattention, which his host construed into a rebuke of the Major's coarseness. Minny had listened with a good deal of interest. Perfectly refined people are not so fastidious as those who are climbing into "society" are apt to imagine; and this fair girl, moreover, had a weakness on the subject of horses and bold horsemanship. Whilst Minny said a kindly word to the Major, Tom Herries, ignorant of the rebuke of his father's looks, drank a brimmer to the memory of Rattlesnake Bob. Then Tom mused. Presently he said in a loud voice, from a distance of several seats:

"Miss Minny, could you stand on your head twenty minutes?"

There was a dead silence. Minny slowly lifted hereyes, and, like Lady Clara Vere de Vere, would have killed him with a stare, if Tom had been capable of being killed. Andrew Blair, quickened out of some absorbing meditations, looked surprised and shocked. John Herries bit his lips and was about to speak, when his wife left her seat, and inviting Minny to accompany her, withdrew. Major Wright laughed enjoyingly. Tom, as soon as the ladies were gone, became quite boisterous. The Major humored him. Black looks are nothing, where full cups have done their work; those of John Herries were impotent. Tom got from his chair, and coming to a wall, attempted to stand on his head.

"I'll bet fifty I can do it—for twenty minutes—if the wall's allowed," said Tom Herries.

"Come—come—my fine lad," said the Major. "Do you think that nobody's drunk but yourself?"

"Take Tom to his room," said the host controlling his rage, which yet gave a hissing sound to his voice. The servants, going about this task quietly, succeeded. Tom lost his bet: but no one had taken it.

John Herries saw that a great shock had been given to his project of a marriage between his son and the niece of his guest. Andrew Blair's countenance displayed this clearly enough. It was time to resort to a remedy. He called a servant.

"Give me that middle picture," he said quietly.

The servant brought it. It was one of the series illustrative of the Dream of Eugene Aram. Aram, with the ghastly face, which I have spoken of already in noticing these paintings, bore on his back a dead man. A few drops of blood on the hair of the corpse, were so naturally painted that they seemed to be in reality drops of blood.

"The obscure artist who imagined that face," said Herries, holding the picture before Andrew Blair, "must indeed have been full of genius, and yet he died without the least fame."

"Terrible—terrible"—muttered Blair with a growing pallour.

"And this," said Herries, with words as clearly toned as they were deadly in their purpose, "this must positively be blood. Let us see."

Slowly he drew from a pocket a long knife, of an old fashion. He opened with deliberation the single blade—rubbed at some spots which seemed to have been rusted into it near the haft—and began scraping at the blood drops on the picture. The eyes of Andrew Blair protruded. They were no longer fixed on Eugene Aram and the dead man. They saw nothing but the knife. Presently their lids quivered, some faint streaks ran in zig-zags between them and the blanched cheeks, and the old man sank in his chair.

"I have gone too far," muttered Herries, springing from his seat.

THE SKYLARKS.

AIR—"The Two Birds."

A maiden sat at her cottage door,
And watched the skylark upward soar,
And "ah!" she sighed, "were I but free,
To rise to heaven sweet bird like thee!

"For o'er my heart a sadness comes,
And all my swelling soul benumbs,
It brings the tear-drop to mine eye,
And from my bosom wrings a sigh!

"Bright bird of morn! on airy wings,
And filled with sweet imaginings,
He cleaves the cloudland to return,
Where low his nest lies in the fern.

"Ah, happy bird! could I like thee,
But have one heart to beat for me,
I'd chase my sadness and be gay,
With joyous songs the livelong day!"

THE EPIGRAM.

We assure our readers that we are not particularly covetous of the jus trium liberorum; but as they have been pleased to receive very graciously our former contributions, and as we have "a few more left of the same sort," we shall make another draft upon our stock of epigrams, promising, most religiously, not to trouble them any further, during the current month.

We begin with our illustrious countryman, Benjamin Franklin, and the Powder Magazine at Purfleet; whence originated the famous controversy as to pointed and blunt conductors, in which His Royal Highness, George III. personally engaged, and in respect to which—to use Franklin's own words—the disputants became "as much heated about this one point, as the Jansenists and Molinists were about the five." The circumstance gave origin to the witty epigram which has been ascribed to Chatham:

While great George does knowledge hunt,
And sharp conductors change for blunt,
His empire's out of joint;
But Franklin a wiser course pursues,
And George's thunder fearless views,
By sticking to the point.

This jeu d'esprit reminds us of the line which was written by Turgot, comptroller-general of finance to Louis XVI, for the portrait of Franklin.

Eripuit caelo fulmen sceptrumque tyrannis.
He stripped the lightning of its fiery wings,
And wrung the sceptre from unrighteous kings.

That is a fine conception—it ought to be—for it was borrowed from Milton's epigram "in inventorem Bombardæ":

Japetionidem laudavit caeca vetustas,
Qui tulit aetheream solis ab axe facem;
At mihi major erit, qui lurida creditur arma,
Et trifidum fulmen surripuisse Jovi.

Prometheus' art, the ancients praised,
Who filched from Jove a coal of fire,
The wight who hooked his thunderbolts,
Deserves to rank some notches higher.

Our next citation leads us into the domain of theology, where we encounter the venerable name of Paracelsus, who is said to have been "the Alpha of the Calvinists," as Hutterus was "the Beta of the Lutherans." We find the following description of him, under his portrait.

Augustinus eras calamo, Chrysostomus ore,
Verbi aperire potens mystica sensa Dei.
Fulmen eras Latiae turbae, quae Numen adorat
Romanum, et lapides, lignaque muta colit.

A Chrysostom in eloquence, an Austin with his pen,
He pierced the most mysterious truths with superhuman ken.

A flaming thunderbolt he was, empowered with all to cope
Who worshipped virgins, stocks, or stones, the devil, or the pope.

We commend the following to the musical fraternity—an epigram by Coleridge “on a volunteer singer:”

Swans sing before they die : 'twere no bad thing,
Should certain persons die before they sing.

The sixteenth century gloried in the fame of three poets named Amaltheo, who were brothers. They published a joint collection of poems. The following was written on seeing two children of rare beauty, each of whom had lost an eye.

Lumine Acon dextro, capta est Leonilla sinistro :
Et poterat forma vincere uterque deos.

Parve puer, lumen quod habes concede sorori ;
Sic ta caecus Amor, sic erit illa Venus.

Acon n'a pas l'œil droit, ni Léonille l'autre :
Leur beauté sur les Dieux, las ! eût gagné le prix.
En faveur d'une sœur, beau gars, cédez le vôtre ;
Pres de l'aveugle Amour nous reverrons Cypris.

Fair Acon and Leonille, blind of one eye,
With gods in the charms of their beauty may vie ;
Could Acon but give his bright eye to the other,
He Cupid would be, and she Venus his mother.

Barreux, who spent most of his life as a voluptuary, reformed towards its close. A wag, who doubted the sincerity of his conversion, offered congratulations in an epigram.

Des Barreux, ce vieux debauché
Affecte une réforme austère ;
Il ne s'est pourtant retranché
Que ce qu'il ne saurait plus faire.

Des Barreux, that old debauchee,
Affects to be converted,
Pretends that he deserts his sins,
When they have him deserted.

Dr. Barrow was a zealous loyalist, and labored most strenuously to effect the restoration of the Stuarts. When Charles II. ascended the throne it was confidently expected that Barrow would be made a bishop ; but he was disappointed—as the following lines from his own pen will show :

Te magis optavit rediturum, Carole, nemo ;
Et nemo sensit te rediisse minus.

None more than I thy call from exile sought,
Nor shared so little in the bliss it brought.

An incident is related of this divine, which may interest the reader. He preached, on a certain occasion, in Westminster Abbey. “Here I must inform the reader,” says Dr. Pope, “that it is a custom for the servants of the church upon all holydays, Sunday excepted, betwixt the sermon and evening prayers, to show the tombs and effigies of the kings and queens in wax to the meaner sort of people, who then flock thither from all quarters of the town. These perceiving Dr. Barrow in the pulpit after the hour was past, and fearing to lose that time in hearing, which they thought they could more profitably employ in receiving ; these, I say, became impatient, and caused the organ to be struck up against him, and would not give over playing till they had blowed him down.” It ought to be mentioned in palliation of this emete on the part of the servants, that the doctor, on one occasion, preached three hours and a half ; and when asked whether he was not tired, replied, “Yes indeed, I began to be weary with standing so long.”

Bellay, better known as Langey, who lived during the reign of Francis I., was equally distinguished as a writer and a warrior. Here is his epitaph :

Ci gît Langey, qui de plume et d'épée,
A surmonté Cicéron et Pompée.

Here Langey lies, whose martial skill
Great Pompey's fame surpassed,—
An author, too, whose writings will
All Cicero's outlast.

A better one has been attributed to Joachim du Bellay.

Hic situs est Langaese ! nil ultra quaere, viator ;
Nil melius dici, nil potuit brevis.

Stop, traveller, and drop a tear
O'er Langey's bones that moulder here.
He needs no verse to tell his fame,
His best eulogium is—his name.

Charles Lamb, among his other facetiae, attempted to identify the Chinese with the Celtes, (Soll-Teas,) on etymological principles, and to prove that the Manehou, (Man-chew,) Tartars were cannibals. This reminds us of the school of etymologists, whose fanciful derivations provoked the satire of Cailly.

Alfana vient d'équus sans doute ;
Mais il avouer aussi,
Qu'en venant de-là jusq'ici,
Il a bien changé sur la route.

Alfana—Mare—from equus came,
The fact you seem to doubt.
But hold, good sir, her former name
Was changed upon the route.

Campistron, to whose misfortunes we have already referred, united with Colasse, musician to the King of France, in the preparation of an opera—the Achille—of which the former composed the words, and the latter the music. The opera proved a failure, for which, of course, the authors blamed each other.

Entre Campistron et Colasse
Grand débat s'émut au Parnasse,
Sur ce que l'Opera n'eut pas un sort heurté ;
De son mauvais succès nul ne se crut coupable.
L'un dit que la musique est plate et misérable,
L'autre que la conduite et les vers sont affreux ;
Et le grand Apollon, toujours juge équitable,
Trouve qu'ils ont raison tous deux.

'TwiXt Campistron and old Colasse
Affairs had come to such a pass,
They roused Apollo with their clatter,
And brought him down to try the matter.
"This Campistron, the fool," cries one,
Has all my precious work undone,
Apollo's lyre could not exempt
His wretched nonsense from contempt."
"Hold there, Colasse!" cries Campistron,
"I'm not to blame—the fault's your own,
Your horrid music (woe's the day!)
Jarred with my lines and spoilt the play."

"Enough, good friends," the God replied,
"The facts are proved on either side ;
Such music and such lines, alone or joined together,
Your opera would damn, in spite of wind or weather."

Bossuet, in an address to his clergy, happened to quote a passage from Balaam ; upon which Faydit, who was no friend to the bishop, penned a squib, as follows :

Un auditeur un peu Cynique
Dit tout haut, en bâillant d'ennui,
Le Prophete Balaam est obscur aujourd' hui ;
Qu'il fasse parler sa bourrique,
Elle s'expliquera plus clairement que lui.

A cynic hearer goes, one day,
To listen to the great Bossuet.
For proof he cites the prophet Balaam.
"The prophet's words' obscure you say,
(The hearer cries) then cease your bray,
And let the prophet's ass explain 'em."

Henri III. of France, had, for his device, a head with three crowns, and the motto, Manet ultima cælo. The first two were the crowns of Poland and France—and thereby hangs an epigram.

Qui dederat binas, unam abstulit ; altera nutat ;
Tertia tonsoris nunc facienda manu.

Who gave you two, has taken one,
The second nods to fall ;
Up quick, and for the barber run,
Or soon you'll lose them all.

The cardinal, De Guise, repeated this distich to Henri, and added that he would be happy to see that last crown placed upon his head by the Capuchins—a joke for which the king never forgave him.

Cambden's Britannia furnished the first complete description of the British Islands ; yet, if we may credit a contemporary epigrammatist, he did not do ample justice to the Scots and Hibernians.

Perlustras Anglos oculis, Cambden, duobus,
Uno oculo Scotos, caecus Hibernigenas.

Cambden, avec deux yeux observe des Anglois,
Le caractère et le genie ;
Quand il décrit l'Ecosse, il ressemble à Cocles,
Enfin il est aveugle, en peignant l'Ibérien.

O'er England's plains and fairy nooks
With both his eyes great Cambden looks,
Bleak Scotia's hills he sees with one,
For Erin's beauties he has none.

Campistron shared the same fate as Corneille. His last pieces, among which was Le Triomphe d'Hercule, were his worst. Hence the following epigram :

A force de forger, on devient forgeron ;
Il n'en est pas ainsi du pauvre Campistron ;
Au lieu d'avancer, il recule
Voyez Hercule !

The brawny blacksmith—forced to work for hire—
By dint of practice at his blazing fire,
Acquires the art his customers to please,
But Campistron, poor soul, his works confess
"Small by degrees and beautifully less,"
Vide his last poor job—the Hercules.

The following epitaph on René Chopin, a distinguished civilian of the sixteenth century, is interesting for its attempt at Latin rhyme.

Chopinus hic cubat
Memoriae thesaurus et penus legum,
Tota Gallia nunc gemit Chopinum,
Andi municipes gemunt alumnum,
Cives Parisii gemunt patronum,
Quem nunc Elisii tenent colonum.

The story of the Roman daughter has often been prettily told—never more so than in the quatrain which was affixed by a Flemish engraver to a copy of Rubens' celebrated painting.

Discite quid sit amor ! Lactat pia gnata parentem,
Quem miseranda fames et fera vincla premunt.
Tantus amor fertur vitam meruisse Cimoni,
Sicque fuit patri filia facta parens.

We are almost disposed to ask pardon for introducing into this farrago an epitaph on the illustrious father of Hebrew philology.

Inclita magnum oculum amisit Germania ; quando
Reuchlinus superos (morte ferente) petit.

When Reuchlin soared to heaven's eternal throne,
Fair Germany's great eye of light was gone.

We have before us another, of which we can give only the translation.

By skill in Hebrew, Greek and Latin lore,
Our Reuchlin lived as saint and sage of yore.
Pleased, yet surprised, great Jove beheld on high

A frail man solve learning's last mystery ;
And sent him his diploma straight from heaven,
Such praise to triple scholarship is given, etc.

The Abbé Maury, coadjutor arch-bishop of Paris, was a man of bad private character. He died in Rome, 1817, and was carried off by a scorbutic affection, which so disfigured his features, that in laying him out, as is the custom with the bodies of dignitaries of the church, on a lit de parade, they were obliged to mask his face. Pasquin seized on the circumstance to write his epitaph:—

“ Qui giace Maury, Gallo porporato, Qui vivo e morto fu sempre mascherato.”

“ To write the truth of him who lieth here were an uncommon task, Alike in life and death he wore and wears a mask.”

But we must stop lest our readers should think that, like Dogberry, we are growing tedious, although, “ for our own part, if we were as tedious as a king, we could find in our heart to bestow all our tediousness upon your worships.”

FROM OUR PARIS CORRESPONDENT.

Before the following letter can be laid before our readers, they will, doubtless, have learned the result of the election in France. If Louis Napoleon be elected, as our correspondent demonstrates, it will be interesting to see the causes which led to his success; if, however, some other candidate should be the fortunate man, it will be curious to observe how the most reasonable predictions may be falsified. In either event, our correspondent's political reflections will be read with avidity.—[Ed. Mess.

PARIS, NOVEMBER 16, 1848.

“ A master! a master! Give us a master!” is now the thought and the aim, if not the open cry of all sensible Frenchmen who take a patriotic part in the political affairs of their country.

A sad and humiliating condition this, for a leading nation of Christendom in the middle of the nineteenth century. France is a second time reduced to it, for having a second time mistaken her wants and her aptitudes: for having again committed the error of supposing that discontent with one order of things implied fitness for another, and that it must needs be a less difficult thing to maintain freedom than to win it. She willed the Republic,—she tried it, and behold, the wisest and best men are already invoking despotism to rescue France from the fangs of anarchy.

Yes, Reaction has made large strides within a few weeks. Already it well nigh scorps disguise. It almost declares itself aloud in the street, at the tribune, from the press; proclaiming its anti-republican feelings, hopes and ends. If discretion yet counsels some reserve in the announcement of these ends, they are not the less definite, nor the means to attain them less promptly seized. The republic is despaired of. It is no longer looked to as able to revive confidence, maintain order, protect society, restore prosperity and realize the wishes of the patriot. What has been the consequence? It is that, via despotism, Constitutional Monarchy is now the end of all who supported and despair of the moderate and honest republic. The Republic of '93 reached Constitutional Monarchy after traversing in an agony which lasted forty-seven years,

The Terror,
The Consulat,
The Empire,
The Restoration.

The hope is now that the Republic of 1848 will reach the same end through the Presidency and the Empire.

This, I have no doubt, is the reasoning of the men, who, moderate, intelligent and patriotic, have, in Paris and in all the departments of France, since the date of my last, declared themselves in favor of Louis Napoleon Bonaparte as Presidential candidate. I spoke of him then, I think, as almost certain to be elected. The position of candidates has changed somewhat: but his has become much stronger. His election may now be deemed certain. To the category of his supporters, formerly mentioned, may be added nearly all the moderate republicans who it was supposed, a few weeks ago, would vote for General Cavaignac. This personage has lost even more ground than his rival has gained. The hopes that were at one time entertained of him have vanished. I partook of them, trusting that he would prove to be the man who would conduct his country through this trying crisis, and, if such result were possible, finally establish intelligent republicanism in France. My first suspicions were expressed some three or four weeks ago. They are confirmed. A man of mere vulgar ambition, he failed as did Lamartine, to seize the glorious opportunity which events presented of placing himself in history beside our still unique Washington! The world will produce ten Napoleons ere another Washington will brighten the pages of its history. Soon after the late hopeful nominations which called Dufaure and Vivien to his councils, nominations which tended to centre upon him the hopes of the moderates, and which, had they been honestly vindicative of his own political tendencies, would have justified those hopes, Cavaignac completely falsified all expectations and alienated his friends among the moderates by a series of alarming nominations of an opposite character. He appointed to a most important post, upon which the tranquility of the capital mainly depended, Recurt, a confederate of Fieschi, the royal assassin. The inveteracy of his advanced republicanism, the insincerity and interested motive of his temporary separation from the dangerous men with whom he has ever held political communion were no longer to be doubted. It is asserted and denied in a manner that almost proves the assertion to be true, that on the eve of the political combination which placed Dufaure and Vivien in office, their places were offered to Ledru Rollin and Flocon. It is certain that the eliminated functionaries received their congés with remarkable equanimity of temper. They almost thanked their estimable friend, the chief the executive council, for relieving them from the burden of office, and they and their friends continue to exhibit toward him an affectionate reserve which argues a belief that, in acting as he did, their chief reluctantly obeyed a political necessity, whose empire would be thrown off as soon as circumstances should permit. To be sure, the prefect of the police, an advanced republican, resigned with an amusing eclat of red republicanism. The worthy prefect was either not in the secret of the Dufaure and Vivien nominations, or his conduct was a well devised ruse meant to persuade the moderates of the sincerity of the breach between Cavaignac and his old friends. It has failed of its effect. Cavaignac is still the only serious and formidable competitor with Louis Napoleon for the presidency. But his supporters will be few beyond the sphere of his official influence. If he would descend from office and base his claims upon his sole personal pretensions his chances would be null. Pas si bete! In spite of the puritanism which he professed he is using with as much unscrupulousness and more selfishness than Ledru Rollin all the means and appliances of power to secure his election. Telegraphs are in constant play. His agents scour the provinces. His friends, members of the National Assembly, public indignation having compelled him to abandon his project of sending them as official commissaries through the country, are voting themselves leave of absence and leaving Paris almost en masse, to electioneer in his favor. Promises are squandered with corrupt profusion. Prefects and other provincial functionaries are revoked and appointed with sole reference to their greater or less subserviency in favor of his candidacy. A pocket biography has been prepared under the especial supervision, it is said (not in the title page) of the General himself. This biography is franked in enormous numbers all over the republic. At whose expense? it is asked—Cavaignac is a poor man: and abuse of the secret funds is more than vaguely hinted at. Great, but it is believed, unavailing efforts are made to secure for him the votes of the army. Two copies of the biography are distributed to each officer, and two to the privates of each company. It is said to be publicly read in each company from eleven to one o'clock, and the soldier who fails to attend the reading incurs a penalty. But it all will not do. An unintelligent enthusiasm, daily more and more developing itself, is sweeping France to the support of Louis Napoleon Bonaparte! With the army and the unintelligent, unreflecting, ardent mass of the population, Bonaparte and the empire is the end. A vague future of grandeur and military glory captivates their imagination and urges them on. French temperament cannot resist an attraction of this sort. The present is neither grand and imposing without, or tranquil and prosperous within. Change! Change! But beside this ardent and growing mass whose aspect is so threatening to the peace of the world, and marching with them, is a large portion of the country, and a powerful fraction of the national assembly, comprising perhaps the greatest part of the wealth, intelligence and honesty of the country, with whom Louis Napoleon is but the means, the Empire (if it needs must be accepted) but a temporary provisional state of transition to terminate as soon as events will permit in the re-establishment of Constitutional monarchy. In the club of the Rue Poitiers composed of the moderate members of the National Assembly, comprising all the members who are deemed reactionist, Thiers, Molé, Duvergier d'Hauranne, Fould, Barrot, Berryer, Larochejacquelein, Remusat, &c., to the amount of more than two hundred, a warm friend of Cavaignac proposed that the club should declare itself and formally recommend to the county its favorite candidate. Thirty-seven only declared in favor of the project. Thiers took the floor and, in an able speech, dissuaded the members from thus committing themselves, and clearly developed the wily policy his friends are pursuing. He opened with declaring his own disinterestedness in the presidential question except as a private French citizen. He was not a candidate for the office, nor for a ministry under any future President. He knew neither Bonaparte or Cavaignac, felt no partiality for one or the other as individuals. But they were the only two competitors who had any chance of success. One of them must be accepted—the adoption of a third would only tend to divide the popular vote and throw the election into the Assembly. This was by all means to be avoided—the Assembly would infallibly elect General Cavaignac—but his candidacy could not possibly be accepted by the "moderate party" unless certain engagements were had with him and guaranties exacted—this it was not proposed to do—the continued dangerous sympathy of the General with the advanced republicans was notorious—in the present state of things it was evident that moderate vote would be given almost unanimously to the prince Louis Napoleon—an irresistible entrainement was concentrating the votes of the country upon him. This entrainement is complained of—it is said we ought to resist it—but the moderates did not create it—they cannot control it. The advanced republicans must thank themselves alone if they see France throwing itself with enthusiasm from their embraces into the arms of Prince Louis. "Therefore," concluded M. Thiers," no candidate in the name of the moderates! A nomination of Cavaignac without guaranty is impossible—a third candidate would prevent many moderate voters from supporting Louis Bonaparte, and make certain the unconditional election of Cavaignac by the Assembly. Let every one get out of the difficulty as best he can, and vote for President as his conscience shall dictate."

In a few days after this speech, the Constitutionnel, which is perhaps the most influential journal in France, known to be published under the inspiration of M. Thiers, declared itself in favor of the Prince Louis. The Presse had some weeks previously taken the lead, and is absolutely rabid in its attacks upon Gen. Cavaignac. But mortified vanity, personal spite, and mortal revenge dictate the articles of the Presse. They are read, laughed at, admired: but, their origin being known, they are utterly destitute of all moral influence. Emile de Girardin, editor of the Presse, enjoys here a reputation about as enviable as that of the editor of a certain leading New York journal. Delegates from a convention of departmental editors, assembled in Paris, have just decided unanimously to adopt the candidacy of Louis Napoleon. Marshal Bugeaud has formally withdrawn from the list, in order not to divide the moderate votes in the approaching election. He earnestly exhorts his friends to concentrate their support upon "a man to whom the general assent can give sufficient strength to control the present and consolidate the future." Doubt existed at first as to whom he alluded. It is now certain that he supports Prince Louis. Gen. Changarnier also declined running in order not to divide the moderate vote. Lamartine says he is not a candidate, but his patriotism will not permit him to refuse to serve if elected. The conscientious man! He has no chance whatever. None will throw away their votes upon him, except his faithful constituents of Macon, who wear his collar with remarkable unanimity and self complacency. To these, perhaps, will be added throughout the provinces, some personal friends and admirers of poetry. But History will tell that he was voted for. This will gratify his amour propre—and he hopes a little note will be added explaining how the worthy man was persecuted, and showing how undeservedly the fickle people dashed him from the giddy height of popularity. Raspail is no longer talked of, but he will doubtless parade at the polls on the 10th of next month, his horde of blood red democrats. Ledru Rollin holds out and is the avowed chief and candidate of the Mountain. He has no chance whatever of success. There is yet no sign of such a thing, but it would not surprise me, considering the skill of their tactics at all past elections, if the socialists, red republicans, and all who hold to the Republic, were to withdraw Raspail and Ledru Rollin, who cannot possibly succeed, and adopt Cavaignac, whose republicanism cannot be doubted. The General, I have no doubt, disgusted with his new friends, the "Moderates," would accept the nomination and sign the contract: not that he is ambitious of office—the disinterested man!—but merely to save the Republic from danger. For really I think that no sensible man can be a serious republican and give his vote to Prince Louis. A combination of this sort, resolutely executed, would give Gen. Cavaignac a much better chance of success than he has at present. But even that would, I think, fail.

The agitation of the red republicans, by means of banquets, is most actively prosecuted in the departments as at Paris. I must give you a specimen of their toasts:

"To the Red Republic! The Republic of the laboring man!"

"Vive Barbes! Vive Ledru Rollin! Hurrah for Hell!"

"Vive la Guillotine!"

"Down with chateaux! Down with roads! Down with horses! Down with carriages!"

"To the abolition of Wages!"

"To the democratic and social Republic!"

"To Universal Fraternity!"

"To the strong men! To the men courageous and valiant in the cause of Humanity! Men whose names serve as guides, supports and examples to degenerated beings! To all those whom History calls Heroes! To Brutus! To Cataline! To Jesus Christ! To Julian the Apostate! To Atrila! To all the thinkers of the middle age! To all thinkers in misfortune! To Jean Jacques Rousseau, and his pupil Maximilian Robespierre! To the democratic republicans of the present generation, Louis Blanc! Barbes! Raspail! Ledru Rollin! Proudhon! Thors! To all the Brutuses of Royalty! To all the Gracchi of Property! To General Association! To the Universal confederation of peoples!"

"To the Union of European Democrats!"

"To the Union of the Democrats and Socialists of all countries!"

On Friday last, I strolled out upon the Place de la Concorde. Planks and heaps of timber were scattered all over the square. Several hundred workmen were busy erecting the masts, altar, and scaffolding necessary for the Fete to be given on Sunday, in honor of the promulgation of the New Constitution. Thousands of idle workmen and spectators occupied the space without the lines, including the space in which the preparations were going on. But I observed numerous detachments of soldiers posted near, and the gardens of the Tuileries were occupied by several battalions. "Why this accumulation of troops?" I demanded.

"It is to protect the workmen," was the reply. "The workmen who are unemployed, have come up in large numbers and insist upon the retirement of those at work and the cessation of the work! Now they demand to be employed too: and that the other be dismissed. This has been refused, but to pacify them it has been promised that they shall have the clearing away of the arrangements of the fete on Monday."

Elle est belle ta Republique!

Were I a Frenchman, I should join in the cry,
A Master! A Master! Give us a Master!

W. W. M.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

A New-Year's Tete-a-Tete with our Patrons.

Most pensive public,—readers and patrons,—we claim the prerogative of the season to obtrude ourselves upon you in editorial plurality, for a little social converse, prefaced by the greeting of "a Happy New-Year!" To you, discerning and inexorable critic, whose reluctant commendations we have won during the past twelvemonth, we would say a word, in the comfortable atmosphere of your study, touching the present condition of periodical literature. To you, tried and fast friend of our magazine for many lustrums, whose kind encouragement has inspired our efforts and whose name is enrolled not upon the dark list of our delinquent subscribers, we have thanks to express, ab imo pectore, from the bottom of our heart. And into thy ear, fair feminine patron, whose fingers have turned over our pages each month (sometimes approvingly) with mother-of-pearl, we would whisper such pleasant things as should most commend us to thy favorable regard. To win the guerdon of thy smiles, we would invoke the gift of eloquence, which fell upon our prototype of old,—the Messenger of the ancient mythology,—who, with flying hands and feet, bore around the missives of Jupiter. We move not, perhaps, with the celerity of the god, for the talaria were more rapid than the U. S. Mail. We are fain to hope, however, that our caduceus,—which is a steel-pen of Gillott's manufacture,—is not without its potent influences, though it wants, we trust, one property of the twisted snakes—that of putting you quietly to sleep.

The New-Year is upon us. It awakens in all thinking persons feelings similar to those occasioned by the advent of its predecessor, only deepening them into a more impressive solemnity. A review of the intervening months will show us how little we have profited by the lessons we then drew from it, while the old man with the glass and the scythe is still as relentless as when his iron reign was lamented in the lyrics of the Roman poet, eighteen centuries ago. If we would take the trouble, such of us as have cast a half-hour's retrospect upon the year just gone by, to set down our individual reflections with even tolerable fidelity, we should write out a homily, worth our while to look over and ponder in coming time. Such, however, is not now our own design. It will be more to our taste (and we doubt not to your own) to look upon the season in its mirthful point of view, as Churchill has described it in a single distich,

Minced-pies in van and calves-head in the rear,"

and to consider it in its connection with Christmas, blest season of innocent enjoyment. Let us hope then that you have all spent the holidays with temperate hilarity,—the critic forgetting his vocation to be severe, the indulgent reader with keen zest for the jokes, that "come in with the candles" on Christmas Eve, and our fair friend, in the very exuberance of her joyous nature, diffusing around her the enchantment of mirth, and filling the old house with the incalculable music of laughter, whose echoes will long linger in the parental halls! Let us hope that you have, one and all, been prodigiously happy, after the manner of your forefathers, in honorable observance of one of their wisest and most ancient customs. For we regard with especial favor all the ceremonies of the time, which they have transmitted to us,—the interchange of presents among the members of the household, the Christmas Tree, the bowl of egg-nogg and the kindly superstition of old Santa Claus, riding in his chariot above the tops of the houses and descending the chimney at midnight to dispense bon-bons to all good boys and girls, who hang up their stockings to receive them. We trust these rites will never fall into desuetude, for they find their origin in the affections and serve to brighten the rugged pathway of duty. By their agency, the feelings are rendered perennially fresh, and though we are but too painfully sensible of the flight of time, as each year is consigned to the irrevocable past, yet in the sports of Christmas, we find a rejuvenizing influence and we become young again for a season. Casting the mind's eye back through the shadowy vistas of memory, we see ourselves in the dim twilight of distance, as we were in the Christmas frolics of our youth, before the cares of the world had environed us or one stain had fallen upon the tablets of our hearts, and we enter unreservedly into the amusements of the little children around our firesides, and speak and think and act even as before we had put away childish things!

But we are interrupted here by the exclamations of our patrons, who desire to take part in our tete-a-tete.

"Sir," says our critic, "your rhetoric is atrocious, and if you persist in mixing your figures, as in the last sentence, I'll have no more of it."

"Go on," says our indulgent reader, "go on!"

"Good Mr. Editor," interposes the silvery voice of our fair friend, "you are talking of Christmas, without reflecting that it has gone by and there's an end of it. Consider too that the subject has been treated fully by Wilson and Irving."

To the querulous objection to our rhetoric, we shall not reply. Its author is the very Iago of literature, and is "nothing if not critical."

For the encouraging plaudit of our indulgent reader, we are truly grateful.

And to you, sweet lady, we would say that your remark is not without reason, for Christmas had been most extensively "done" in the magazine line, before we assumed the calling of an editor. Yet in view of this and of the indisputable fact that the happy day, with all its delightful concomitants (gastronomical and otherwise) has gone to return no more, we must be pardoned for dwelling upon it a little longer. For we have no hesitation in saying that if we could adequately depict the delights of a certain Christmas we spent a few years since, if we did but lay down the outlines, as Retzsch in his delineations of the old ballads, we should produce a domestic piece that Christopher North might look upon with satisfaction and Geoffrey Crayon with envy.

— It was a country Christmas, in cismontane Virginia, where the houses are all remarkable for fine names and large hospitality. There were great roaring fires in the chimney-places, and arm-chairs with damask cushions in the parlors, which might have stood in a Pictorial Dictionary as the symbolical definition of luxury, and the cookery was so effectively managed as to recall the apostrophe made by Sidney Smith, the Apicius of the Edinburgh Review, to a dinner of the nineteenth century. The dishes were the poetry of the kitchen and they were flanked by decanters of "wine, as rich in years as Horace sings." All these were but the accessories to the enjoyment of the charming society of the family. But hold! we shall not commit such a profanation of the Lares as to "print" our most kind and generous entertainers. If their eyes should wander over these pages and they should read what we do here relate, perchance they may remember how we passed the joyous moments of that happy time. The ladies will recollect how merry we were in making the egg-nogg, and how we arranged the Christmas Tree with all manner and variety of impossible fruit and hung the festal lights in its branches, and how we danced all the week long and wrote charades and sonnets on the departing year! And when at last the year left us, amid snow and wind, we were loth to lose him, and caught at his skirts, in the spirit of Mr. Tennyson's song,

"He frothed his bumpers to the brim;
A jollier year we shall not see,
But tho' his eyes are waxing dim,
And tho' his foes speak ill of him,
He was a friend to me!
Old year, you must not go.
So long as you have been with us,
Such joy as you have seen with us,
Old year, you shall not go!"

Alas! several years have glided by into the shadowy land, since that holiday! May all future holidays prove to us and to you, gracious readers, as pleasing and delightful!

But we must put an end to our Christmas phantasmagoria, or the light will go out in our magic-lantern before we have exhibited all our apparitions,—or, to be less figurative and more intelligible, we must hasten to speak of other matters, to which we have already casually alluded.

There could be no more interesting and instructive volume, in the range of literary desiderata, than a history of English periodical literature, from its origin to the present time, and we are surprised that the subject has never suggested itself to the consideration of authors. In connection with this, it would surely not be an idle task to inquire into the extent of its influence at this day, to show what offices it subserves and to set forth the duties and responsibilities that attach to its conductors. The influence of the periodical press is undoubtedly great, commensurate, perhaps, with that of the newspaper press or the hustings. It is true that the magazine does not immediately affect the action of men, in the practical working of political institutions, as the newspaper or the popular orator. But in the political wisdom which it embodies (we speak of the periodical press in its largest sense) and in the inculcation of broad views of society and of the race, it operates on minds that "move the world." It is thus, in shaping the intellect, and, to some extent, in forming the character, that its influence though unperceived, is most powerful. It is at once the conservator of public morals, and the exponent of a new and recognized philosophy, and may be said to sustain the same relation to the hustings, that the Porch and the Academy in the age of Pericles, bore to the rostrum, that "fulminated over Greece."

It is a curious fact, and one not very generally considered, that the periodical press of our day, in its manifold publications, unites in itself many offices that in former days have been kept apart. The great modern Essayist tells us that it was the crowning glory of Addison to have "reconciled wit and virtue after a long and painful separation, during which wit had been led astray by profligacy and virtue by fanaticism." This reconciliation was effected in those remarkable sheets,—the origin of our reviews and magazines,—which served up the follies of the age of Queen Anne, to be discussed with the rolls upon the breakfast-tables of the metropolitans. Since that day, the magazine has been both the teacher and the toy, the prophet and the plaything, the guide and the jester of the reading public. To us it is what the Coffee-House was to the literary man of an earlier period,—a medium through which he may commune with the best thinkers and choicest wits of his time. Instead of the Grecian and Will's, the Englishman has now Blackwood and the Edinburgh, and he receives the wisdom and pleasantry of his distinguished literary countrymen through their pages, as of yore the chosen few caught the remarks of Dryden at his accustomed evening resort.

But perhaps the most interesting purpose of the periodical press is discharged in developing the literary taste and eliciting the latent talent of the country. It may with safety be said that by far the most valuable and permanent portion of the literature of Europe and America, for many years past, has been transmitted to the public through the reviews and magazines. To sustain this position, we might refer to Hazlitt, Campbell, Jeffrey, Macaulay, Legaré, Everett, and a host of others. And we might take a step further and assert that to a certain extent the review was not only the vehicle but the cause of the intellectual effort. If this be granted, it follows that periodicals are most useful, in the highest walk of usefulness, awakening the powers of the mind to an energy, which might not otherwise be kindled, rendering more delicate the perception of intellectual beauty, inducing "an innocent homage to the sweet idols of art," and causing to be spread around us those tranquil delights that find their source only in a refined and flourishing literature.

It is in this view of the case, as connected with the growth and establishment of a wide intellectual domain among us, that we regard with so much interest the success of periodicals in the Southern States. We do profess to be zealous in behalf of Southern proficiency in all that tends to enoble and dignify mankind. Fourteen years has the Messenger toiled with unremitting assiduity in this cause—fourteen years has it contended with circumstances the most adverse and discouraging, that through its humble instrumentality the South might produce something of enduring value in the world of letters, something worthy of its great mental resources. In looking over the field of the Messenger's labors, the present Editor is glad to think that its mission has not been altogether unregarded, and that he can discern, here and there, unerring signs of increasing attention to the cause of literature. The SOUTHERN QUARTERLY REVIEW, since its resuscitation a few years since, has put forth papers of a most meritorious character, as in the palmy days, when Charleston had grown almost Athenian in literary acumen,—our friend and contemporary, DE BOW, contrives to cultivate the exotics of poesy among the cotton plants of Louisiana and to mingle polite learning with the dry statistics of a mercantile magazine,—and within the past year, a most deserving weekly Journal, the SOUTHERN LITERARY GAZETTE, has been started in Georgia, and bids fair to attain the highest rank of excellence. Brethren of the Southern periodical press, we are co-workers in a great design,—let us put away from us all envyings and evil-speakings, let us bear each other's burdens, and work patiently after our purpose, and when at last the South shall take her position in the rolls of literary distinction, as one by one the stars of her galaxy appear, let us hail them,

"like some watcher of the skies
When a new planet swims into his ken."

By unity of action, we shall thus effect a splendid result, elevating the aims of the Southern intellect, allaying the agitations of party strife, and working out a high social agency by banishing from among us that bane of all improvement,—“cheap literature,” “if that can be called cheap in any sense of the term, (as President Everett has so well remarked) which begins by costing a man his eyesight, and, if it have any influence, must, much of it, end in depraving his taste and subverting his morals.”

People of the South! We appeal to you in behalf of your literary magazines, give them not a meagre and reluctant support,—they are your representatives in the great colleges of civilization,—by them ye are judged, and as they are entitled to critical regard, so your taste is rated. You are supporting by your patronage much the greater portion of Northern periodical literature; will you not yield to your own the same favorable notice? We ask not that your subscriptions should be withdrawn from Northern magazines to be bestowed upon us. Not at all. Many of our Northern contemporaries are most worthy of your favor, but while you are keeping them alive, do not refuse us the vital aura of your Five Dollars per annum!

Most pensive public, a word about the Messenger. It is now entering its Fifteenth Volume. Thanks to you, it is firmly established upon an enduring basis. The new and costly dress in which the present number appears is the surest evidence of the editor's confidence that he can maintain its reputation. He would most earnestly beg of the Messenger's friends, however, their best efforts to increase its circulation, by which means alone he can hope to make it what it should be—a magazine worthy, in all respects, of the great section of the union whose name it bears,—a mirror in which Southern taste and learning shall be faithfully and accurately reflected. This substantial assistance is the more urgently solicited from the consideration that the Editor has not deemed it proper to resort to the ordinary expedients of wholesale puffing and tawdry decorations to catch the popular eye, but has placed the work before the public solely upon its own merits, believing that simple excellence would sooner or later be sought after for its intrinsic value. Is it asking too much, then, of those who wish well to the Messenger, to invite them to make an effort to enlarge its list of subscribers? With proper exertions on their part, the Editor would be enabled to publish such a magazine as the South might well point to with feelings of honest pride. In the pursuance of this purpose, he entreats public favor and patronage, only promising that his best energies shall be called forth for its ultimate accomplishment.

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS.

BRIEF APPEAL TO PUBLIC OPINION, in a series of Exceptions to the course and action of the Methodist Episcopal Church, from 1844 to 1848, affecting the rights and interests of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. By H. B. Bascom, A. L. P. Greene, and C. B. Parsons, Southern Commissioners for the settlement of the Property Question between the two Churches. Louisville, Ky. Published by John Early, Agent of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. Morton and Griswold, Printers. 1848.

Such is the cumbrous title of a pamphlet of about 200 pages, which has been on our table for sometime past. It was written, we presume, by Doctor Bascom. Who else could have written such a book? It seems to have grown out of a very spirited, not to say acrimonious controversy, which has raged with but little abatement, ever since the General Conference of 1844, held in the City of New York; at which time, there was, by consent of parties, a division of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, into two separate and independent church organizations. This division grew out of the great Slavery Question. A Plan of Separation, as it is called, was adopted by the Conference, securing equal rights and privileges to each branch of the Church, and providing for an equitable division of all the property and funds of the Church. Commissioners were also appointed under the Plan, for both branches of the Church, who were authorized as agents of the Conference to divide the property, according to the provisions of the deed of separation. The Southern Commissioners, it seems, held themselves in readiness to proceed with the work assigned to them, but the Commissioners of the Northern branch of the church refused to act in the premises. The result was, four years elapsed without any thing having been done for the adjustment of the question at issue between the contracting parties. At the late General Conference of the Methodist E. Church, held in the city of Pittsburgh, in May last, the whole Plan of Separation adopted in 1844, was, by a formal act of the Conference declared a “nullity,” because of the alleged failure of the Annual Conferences to recommend, by a three-fourths majority, the division of the funds vested in the New York Book Concern, amounting to six hundred thousand dollars. The Northern Commissioners were disbanded by this act of abrogation, and the great property question seems to have been given a sort of diplomatic go-by, so far as any action of the Conference was concerned. The course of the General Conference touching the matter, seems to have been regarded by the Southern portion of the church, as a reckless violation of good faith, and moral principle, in the infringement of a compact which could not in honor and justice be dissolved but by the mutual consent of the original contracting parties. The action of the Conference was wholly ex parte, there being no delegation from the South in the General Conference. In this view of the subject the Southern Commissioners feel aggrieved; and abandoning all hope of justice at the hands of their Northern brethren, they raise a series of Exceptions to their course, and appeal to public opinion in support of the equity of their claims; and in the pamphlet before us, these Exceptions are sustained by the fullest and clearest documentary evidence, and the appeal made in a language that stirs one's blood, and excites the strongest indignation. We have indeed but rarely, if ever read such a publication. And if the Northern branch of the Methodist Episcopal Church, does really occupy the ground, in this controversy, that is charged upon it here, then there is indeed something to justify such language as the following, in application to it, which we find scattered pretty freely through this pamphlet—"The firmness, consistency, moderation and dignity of strong moral conviction—of fixed religious principle—are no where to be found among them; all is agitation, caprice, passion and resentment." Again,—“We rejoice that we sustain to the Methodist Episcopal Church (North) the relation we do, that of perfect independence; because we regard the entire conduct of the Northern towards the Southern Church as essentially faithless and dishonorable; and we are most happy not to be found in such company.” And again—“We show by their own witness that they (the Northern Church) have added deception and duplicity to the denial of right; that they have denied their own language, statements, pledges and acts; that it has been done where misconception appears impossible, and will, we are inclined to think, be generally so regarded.”

All this moral dereliction of duty on the part of the Northern Church, is ascribed to the influence of abolitionism. Speaking of Northern interference with the subject of slavery, the writer holds this language in relation to the Northern Methodist Church. “It has become a pander to political agitation. It is an Abolition Church. It is arrayed against the laws and rights of twelve or thirteen sovereign states, which their creed, as well as civil obligation, binds them to respect, and defer to. It avows the purpose of seeking to destroy institutions and interests over which they have no control, human or divine. They denounce as utterly devilish—of purely infernal origin—what God himself approved in the patriarchal, expressly authorized in the Jewish, and has seen proper to regulate, without any intimation of moral obliquity, in the Christian Church. They have no fixed principles or settled views. They are the victims of a mania, constantly involving them in contradiction and inconsistency.” Once more, upon this subject, the writer says, “The light and darkness of heaven and hell are scarcely in more unyielding contrast than the conduct of the Northern Methodist Church and that of Christ and his apostles, in their action on the subject of slavery.” These are but specimens from the work before us. The language may be too strong. And yet the conduct of the Northern branch of the Church towards the Southern, seems to have been so illiberal and unprincipled that we can scarcely censure the severity of the language employed in this pamphlet.

A suit at law has been instituted by the Southern Commissioners for the recovery of the portion of property equitably belonging to the Southern portion of the Church.

Doctor Bascom wrote a pamphlet just after the adjournment of the General Conference of 1844, on the subject of Slavery, in defence of the South, which was spoken of by the Hon. Henry Clay, and the Hon. John C. Calhoun as one of the ablest works that this country had produced on that subject. The fact that these publications are connected with a Church controversy, which gives them a sort of denominational cast, may limit their circulation to some extent; but any one who wishes to see a full defence of the course pursued by the Southern Methodist Church in their separation from the North, and a most triumphant vindication of the institution of slavery as it exists among us, would do well to read these productions. Both may be had at the new Methodist Book Concern in this city.

THE MORAL, SOCIAL, AND PROFESSIONAL DUTIES OF ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS. By Samuel Warren, Esq., F. R. S., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. New York: Harper & Brothers, Publishers. 1849.

Mr. Warren is a charming and deservedly popular writer, and, what is remarkable, his law-books are among the most agreeable of his compositions. His “Practical Introduction to Law Studies,” published some years since, we regard as the very best volume of the kind that has ever fallen under our observation, and we have an excellent London edition of it upon our shelves, with which we are accustomed to fill up the intervals of our legal reading. The present work is an appropriate companion for it, and is marked by all the felicities of manner and gems of illustration, with which Mr. Warren knows so well how to brighten the abstruse study of the law. We trust that a copy of it may find its way into the library of every practitioner in the United States. The basis of the volume is a series of lectures delivered before the “Incorporated Law Society of the United Kingdom,” during Trinity Term, 1848, and Mr. Warren was induced to undertake their publication by a highly complimentary resolution of the Council of this Society. We quite agree in the opinion, therein expressed that “the Lectures are well calculated to maintain the station and character of the profession, and especially to stimulate and benefit its younger members, by aiding and directing their study of the Law, and promoting honorable practice.”

The price of the work is without a precedent for cheapness in the history of legal book-making and such as to place it within the reach of all students and attorneys.

It may be obtained of Drinker & Morris.

ESSAYS AND REVIEWS. By Edwin P. Whipple. In two Volumes. New-York. D. Appleton & Co. 1848.

This is a fair and handsome publication in a collected form, of some of the best articles of the North American Review, for several years past. We remember to have read the greater part of them, at the time of their original appearance, with a keen curiosity excited as to their paternity. We are glad to meet with them again, in their present worthy style, and to recognize in the author Mr. Whipple, one of the raciest and most brilliant essayists of the day. The first thing that suggests itself to the reader, as he progresses with these reviews, is that Mr. Whipple's literary appetite is almost insatiable; he seems to have been an omnivorous reader, and to have masticated every thing in the whole larder of letters, from the palatable morceaux of the classics to the last crudities of the American press. Nor does he seem merely to have swallowed them, “with greediness and gluttony,” but to have digested all his reading, to the clearer understanding of every subject that he sits down to discuss.

In Mr. Whipple's sentences, there is a certain Bostonian gait, that has called forth from some ingenious writer in the Literary World, an excellent article on the structure of period and paragraph.

BRACEBRIDGE HALL, or the Humorists. A Medley. By Geoffrey Crayon, Gent. Author's Revised Edition. Complete in one volume. New York. George P. Putnam. 155 Broadway. 1849.

Mr. Putnam has now reached Vol. 6 of his new edition of Irving's Complete Works. We are sure we need say nothing in praise of “Bracebridge Hall,” the book which made Geoffrey Crayon a household word at the firesides of two nations. It is sufficient to remind the old admirers of our great countryman, that it contains “The Student of Salamanca” and to say that its typography is quite equal to the sumptuous text of the foregoing volumes of the series.

BRITISH PERIODICAL LITERATURE.

REPUBLICATION OF

The London Quarterly Review, The Edinburgh Review, The North British Review, The Westminster Review, and Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine.

The wide spread fame of these splendid Periodicals, renders it needless to say much in their praise. As literary organs, they stand far in advance of any works of a similar stamp now published, while the political complexion of each is marked by a dignity, candor, and forbearance, not often found in works of a party character.

They embrace the views of the three great parties in England—Tory, Whig, and Radical—"Blackwood" and the "London Quarterly" are Tory; the "Edinburgh Review" Whig; and the "Westminster Review" Radical. The "North British Review" is more of a religious character, having been originally edited by Dr. Chalmers, and now, since his death, being conducted by his son-in-law, Dr. Hanna, associated with Sir David Brewster. Its literary character is of the very highest order. The "Westminster," though reprinted under that title only, is published in England under the title of the "Foreign Quarterly and Westminster," it being in fact a union of the two Reviews formerly published and reprinted under separate titles. It has, therefore, the advantage by this combination, of uniting in one work the best features of both as heretofore issued.

The above Periodicals are reprinted in New York, immediately on their arrival by the British steamers, in a beautiful clear type, on fine white paper, and are faithful copies of the originals, Blackwood's Magazine being an exact fac-simile of the Edinburgh edition.

EDUCATION OF IDIOTS.

Within three quarters of a century past, Humanity has achieved three very great triumphs over physical and mental misfortune. The teaching of the deaf and dumb to read and write, in 1773, at Edinburg, made Dr. Johnson conclude that such a conquest, over an infirmity seemingly irremediable, left nothing hopeless to human resolution. "After having seen the deaf taught arithmetic," says he, "who would be afraid to cultivate the Hebrides?"—Yet in our own time, the lengths that had been gone in his day, are far transcended: so that to be deaf and dumb now forms, comparatively, a trivial obstacle to social enjoyments, and social usefulness. More recently, by the help of raised letters, the blind have had the inestimable pleasures of reading opened to them: and, by feeling along the page, are enabled to gather its meaning almost as rapidly as he who reads by sight. Thirdly comes the improved method of treating lunatics, invented by Pinel, and practised now in most or all of our American Lunatic Asylums; which substitutes kindness, fresh air, proper exercise, healthful diet, and a patient culture of the reason and of the moral feelings, for the chain, the dungeon, the ducking-stool, and the lash. An improvement by which the number of cures is quadrupled, and the sufferings of the incurable are unspeakably alleviated.

We have now to herald a yet greater wonder, to the Virginia public: a more striking, if not a more beneficent achievement of enlightened Humanity. It is the education of Idiots. The animation of clay seems hardly more incredible, than the extent to which MIND has been infused into such masses of stolidity. So hopeless has been the cure of idiots, so hopeless even any appreciable improvement of their condition by any process used in our Insane-Hospitals, that the Legislature of Virginia, eight years ago,* forbade any idiot to be received into either hospital. And such, we believe, has been the course in other States and countries.

But by the efforts of gifted men in France, new lights have lately been thrown upon the capabilities of those unfortunates. There is a school and hospital for them in Paris, where transformations are wrought, that appear almost miraculous. The expressionless face, the open mouth, the lolling and speechless tongue, all so eloquent of the vacant mind, the uncleanly habits, the tottering and powerless limbs and frame,—have been changed into looks of comparative intelligence, neatness of person and dress, a perfect command of the limbs, a capacity to talk, to read and write, to do works of usefulness, and even to earn a livelihood by labor!

No mysteries attend this great work. There are no nostrums of secret composition—no undivulged sleights of hand,—nor any of the other artifices, by which humbug and quackery commonly operate. The whole magic of those marvellous cures consists in patient care, with judicious, long and oft repeated efforts, in training the hands, the feet, the eyes, the ears, the touch, and the mind of the idiot subject. Ever since 1830, these efforts have been going on; indeed the system of observation which led to them began in 1828, or earlier. Messieurs VOISIN, LEURET, and SEGUIN, French physicians, appear to be the men to whose benevolence, ingenuity, and patience, mankind are mainly indebted for this inestimable alleviation of one among human nature's greatest calamities. Doctor John Conolly, of London, seems to have been foremost in making the improvement known in England: and Mr. George Sumner, of Boston, is the first American, so far as we know, who has brought it to the notice of his countrymen. The Westminster Review, for April, 1848, from which we derive all our knowledge of the subject, has an article on "The Bicêtre Asylum," made up chiefly of extracts from a book of Dr. Conolly, and a letter of Mr. S. to a friend in Boston. The letter is filled with particulars of the deepest interest. It was elicited by inquiries from Dr. Howe, of Boston—member of a commission appointed in 1846, to inquire into the condition of idiots in Massachusetts, "to ascertain their number, and whether any thing could be done for their relief."

The Bicêtre is the seat of the school for idiots, near Paris; and contains also a lunatic asylum. Dr. Conolly says,

"In the first part of the Bicêtre to which I was conducted was a school exclusively established for the improvement of the idiotic and of the epileptic, and nothing more extraordinary can well be imagined. No fewer than forty of these patients were assembled in a moderate-sized school-room, receiving various lessons and performing various evolutions under the direction of a very able schoolmaster, M. Seguin, himself a pupil of the celebrated Itard, and endowed with that enthusiasm respecting his occupation before which difficulties vanish. His pupils had been all taught to sing to music, and the little band of violins and other instruments by which they were accompanied, was formed of the old almsmen of the hospital. But all the idiotic part of this remarkable class also sang without any musical accompaniment, and kept excellent time and tune. Both the epileptic and idiotic were taught to write, and their copy-books would have done credit to any writing school for young persons. Numerous exercises were gone through, of a kind of military character, with perfect correctness and precision. The youngest of the class was a little idiot boy of five years old, and it was interesting to see him following the rest, and imitating their actions holding out his right arm, left arm, both arms, marching to the right and left at the word of command, and to the sound of a drum beaten with all the lively skill of a French drummer by another idiot, who was gratified by wearing a demi-military uniform. All these exercises were gone through by a collection of beings offering the smallest degree of intellectual promise, and usually left, in all asylums, in total indolence and apathy."

Mr. Sumner thus groups together some of the wonderful results of the new system :

"During the past six months I have watched, with eager interest, the progress which many young idiots have made, in Paris, under the direction of M. Seguin, and at Bicêtre under that of Messrs. Voisin and Vallée, and have seen, with no less gratification than astonishment, nearly one hundred fellow-beings who, but a short time since, were shut out from all communion with mankind, who were objects of loathing and disgust,—many of whom rejected every article of clothing,—others of whom, unable to stand erect, crouched themselves in corners and gave signs of life only by piteous howls,—others, in whom the faculty of speech had never been developed,—and many, whose voracious and indiscriminating gluttony satisfied itself with whatever they could lay hands upon, with the garbage thrown to swine, or with their own excrements;—these unfortunate beings—the rejected of humanity, I have seen properly clad, standing erect, walking, speaking, eating in an orderly manner at a common table, working quietly as carpenters and farmers; gaining, by their own labor, the means of existence; storing their awakened intelligence by reading one to another: exercising towards their teachers and among themselves the generous feelings of man's nature, and singing in unison songs of thanksgiving."

Our readers must not fail to read the following long extract from Mr. Sumner's letter; containing, in fact, its main substance. All that we have said was meant but to introduce and recommend this extract :

"Let us take a young idiot, in whom scarce any of the senses appear developed; who is abandoned to the lowest passions, and who is unable to walk or to execute voluntary movements. He is brought to Bicêtre, and placed at once in the class of those boys who are executing the moving power. Here, with about twenty others, who have already learned to act somewhat in unison, he is made, at first by holding and guiding his arms and feet, and afterwards by the excitement of imitation, to follow the movements of his companions. These, at the order of the teacher, go through with various steps and movements of the head, arms and feet, which at the same time that they give wholesome exercise to the animal part of the system, develop the first personal sentiment, that of rest and immobility. After this, the class is made, at the word of command, to designate various parts of the body. On the 20th of January, the number of this class was eighteen; some of whom had been several months under treatment; others of whom had been just attached to it. The teacher, 1st, indicated, with his hand, a part of the body,—as head, arm, hand, face, hair, eyes, and named it aloud; the children repeated the movement and touched the part. 2nd. The teacher designated, with the voice, a part which the idiot touched. 3rd. He designated a part by gesture, and the pupils named it aloud. There are many, of course, who are slow to do this, but the love of imitation, and the care of teachers, produce, in time, the necessary regularity of movement; the organ of speech has yet, however, to be developed in others.

"A complete series of gymnastic exercises, adapted to the various necessities which the physiological examination has established for each case, is now followed up; the result of which is, to create an equilibrium between the muscular and the over-excited nervous system, to fatigue the idiot sufficiently to procure him a sound and refreshing sleep, and to develop his general intelligence. At the same time, the hygienic treatment, adapted to his peculiar case, is applied. He is exposed to the light of the sun, to fresh air—is made to go through frequent ablutions, and is warmly clad. In most cases a tonic diet is adopted, and he is placed at table where the monitors, by dint of industry and example, teach him to eat as do those around him.

"The next step is to educate the senses, beginning with that of feeling; and beginning with this, inasmuch as it is the sense by which the idiot acquires most readily a knowledge of external objects, long before his eye is accustomed to fix their image, or his ear to listen to sounds. Smell and taste are next cultivated; the former by presenting to the pupil various odors, which at first make no impression whatever, rose and assafœtida being received with equal favor. By degrees, and as the harmony of the functions is restored, and the intellectual activity developed, this sense is awakened, and lends again its aid to awaken others. The sense of taste is roused in the same manner, by placing in the mouth various substances, alternately, sapid and acid, bitter and sweet.

"The power of speech, so imperfect in all, is the most difficult to develop; but a method, improving upon that which Pereira practised, in 1760, and which has been since successfully followed up in Germany, has been adopted at Bicêtre, and also in the private practice of Seguin, with great success. This is, however, the part of idiot education that proceeds the slowest, and which, more than any other, except, perhaps, the moral treatment, requires, the greatest attention, patience and intelligence on the part of the teacher.

"The sight is next cultivated; and here, as indeed in every part of this miracle of instruction, great difficulties were at first encountered. The eyes of the idiot are often perfectly formed, but he sees nothing—they fix no object. The organ he possesses—but it is passive and dormant. The senses of smell and taste have been developed by direct action upon them; that of touch, by putting the hand in contact with different bodies; the stagnant eye of the idiot cannot, however, be moved by the hand of another. The method employed is due to the ingenuity of Seguin. He placed the child in a chamber, which was suddenly darkened, so as to excite his attention,—after which, a small opening in a shutter let in a single ray of light, before which various objects, agreeable to the pupil, arranged upon slides, like those of a magic lantern, were successively passed. The light, and its direction, having once attracted his attention, was then, by a change of the opening in the shutter, moved up and down, to the right and left, followed in most cases, by his heretofore motionless eyeballs. This is succeeded by exercises of gymnastics, which require the attention of the eye to avoid, not a dangerous bruise, but a disagreeable thump; games of balls and battledores are also used to excite this sense. Another means employed, is to place yourself before the idiot, fix his eye by a firm look, varying this look according to various sentiments; pursuing, for hours even, his moving but unimpressed orbit; chasing it constantly, until finally it stops, fixes itself and begins to see. After efforts of this kind, which require a patience and a superiority of will that few men possess, the first reward comes to the teacher himself, for his identity is recognised by other means than the touch, and he catches the first beam of intelligence that radiates from the heretofore benighted countenance.

"The number of pupils in the school has varied, for some time past, from eighty to one hundred. At 5 o'clock they rise, and pass half an hour in washing, combing and dressing; the monitors, pupils more advanced, aiding those whose instruction is but recently commenced. They then pass into the hall of classes, and range themselves in a double line—no easy task for the beginners—when they sing a simple morning prayer, repeated to them by the teacher. After this, they make their first breakfast of a simple slice of bread. The class for the education of the senses now begins and fills up the time till 8½, A. M. In the 1st or highest division, several occupy themselves with face and landscape drawing; and others, less advanced, with geometrical drawing upon the black-board. The 3rd division, divided into sections, is of those who are exercising the senses of smell, taste, sight, and observing color and form by the method I have before described. The sense of hearing is exercised, among other means, by the pupil's learning to distinguish and name, while blind-folded, the natural sounds as produced by the cords of a bass-viol. Meanwhile, the youngest class of eighteen or twenty is going through its elementary gymnastics of the moving power.

"From 8½ to 9, A. M., is taken up by the study of numeration and arithmetic. Here the whole school is divided into frequently changing groups, according to the various capacities developed. The lowest of all is ranged in line and taught to count aloud up to thirty; a series of sticks, balls, or other material objects, being given to them at the time. This helps to ameliorate their speech, and to stimulate to imitation those who have not that faculty. Another group is set to climb upon ladders, counting the number of rounds as they go up,—and thus the muscular system and knowledge of numeration are simultaneously developed. A higher group is of those who count up to fifty with counters, and who, by means of them, get an idea of unity, plurality, subtraction, addition and equality. A higher group still has learned to count up to one hundred, and another group is learning, by means of moveable figures taken from a case, the combinations of numbers. Higher still are boys working upon their slates, or going through calculations upon the black board, with a facility and precision that any pupil of Warren Colburn might envy.

"From 9 to 9½. Breakfast of soup and a plate of meat. The pupils are here seated at table, and eat with fork and spoon—the more adroit aiding those less so.

"9½ to 10½. Recreation in open air,—running, playing ball, driving hoop, or cultivating a small plot of ground, the hire of which, for three months, each one may gain by a certain number of tickets of good conduct.

"10½ to 11½. Reading class, in which all take part, divided, however, into various groups, as before.

"11½ to 12. Writing class. Here the lowest group is taught only to trace on the black board, with a ruler, these lines:—

"The next group is taught to make upon the board the rudimental curvilinear characters, making three in each line. After this they write on slates, and, when farther advanced, the monitor being ready to guide their hands, they write in ruled books. The highest class rules its own books, and writes alternately a page of large and fine hand.

"12 to 12½. Gymnastics.

"12½ to 1. Music.

"1 to 4½. Manual labor. In this all take part; some as shoe-makers, some as carpenters, or rather cabinet-makers, and some as tillers of the ground. One of the best exercises for the body, inasmuch as it compels the idiot to walk and balance himself unaided, is that of wheeling a barrow, charged with a weight proportionate to his strength. The most stupid may be soon taught this. Others, more intelligent, wield spade and pickaxe most energetically and profitably; but nowhere does their awakened intelligence appear more satisfactory than in the workshop of a cabinet maker. When one of them has sawed through a plank, or nailed together two pieces of wood, or made a box, his smile of satisfaction,—the consequence of 'something attempted, something done,'—the real result of which he can estimate,—is beautiful to see. Nor is their work, by any means, to be despised. With one cabinet-maker as teacher and monitor, they performed, last year, all the work necessary for their school-room and dormitories, as well as for a good part of the great establishment of Bicêtre. At shoe-making they show intelligence; but this is too sedentary an occupation for them. Some, however, who have quitted the school, work at it; but the greater number of them become farmers and gardeners.

"After this manual labor they dine, and after dinner play till 6½ P. M.

"From 6½ to 7. Grammar class; the lowest group is taught to articulate syllables,—the highest, as much as in any grammar school.

"From 7 to 8½ is passed in reading to one another, or in conversations and explanations with the teacher, upon things which may excite the reflective power; two evenings in the week this hour is devoted to a concert and a dance.

"After this comes the evening prayer, sung by all; and then, fatigued, but happy, they retire to rest.

"Such is a day at the school of Bicêtre. Every Thursday morning the teacher takes them out to walk in the country, and then inculcates elementary notions of botany, designating by their names, and impressing by smell, taste and sight, the qualities of different flowers and useful vegetables which they see. At the same time he explains, by locality, the first elements of geography. On Saturday evening there is a distribution of tickets of good conduct, three of which pay the rent of a garden, and one of which may buy off, for another, with the consent of the teacher, the punishment adjudged for certain slight acts of negligence. You will see at once the effect which this must have upon the generous sentiments of the pupils. The sentiment of possession is developed—the rights of property taught; but its duties and its pleasures are, at the same time, impressed.

"These tickets of good conduct are given also to those who are designated, by the pupils themselves, as having done some kind and generous action,—as having been seen to run to the aid of one who had stumbled at play,—who had divided among his companions the bon-bons he may have received from a visitor, or who had helped, in any way, one weaker than himself. Thus they are constantly on the look-out for good actions in one another; but they are most positively forbidden to repeat the negligences or unkind conduct which they may observe. The surveillance of the monitors is sufficient to detect these; and even were it not, M. Vallée prefers that they should go unpunished, rather than that they should serve to cherish the grovelling sentiments of envy and malice which lurk in the breast of the informer and the scandal-monger."—Letter, p. 11.

The testimonies of other English travellers in France are given; but we have room only for one more short extract from Mr. Sumner, which speaks for itself:

"The fact, I have said, is now clearly established, that idiots may be educated; that the reflective power exists within them, and may be awakened by a proper system of instruction; that they may be raised from the filth in which they grovel to the attitude of men; that they may be taught different arts which will enable them to gain an honest livelihood; and that, although their intelligence may never, perhaps, be developed to such a point as to render them the authors of those generous ideas and great deeds which leave a stamp upon an age, yet, still, they may attain a respectable mediocrity, and surpass, in mental power, the common peasant of many European states."

The Reviewer adds a sensible admonition to those who are establishing similar schools, or hospitals, in England, not to place them in, or adjoining lunatic asylums or other retreats for the insane; because of the hurtful influence exerted by the sights and sounds of such asylums upon the nascent and tender minds of the idiot pupils.

And now, will Virginia do her duty towards the hundreds of her own sons and daughters who are in the helpless and distressing condition of idiocy? We do not know, but we will lay any wager—even "our dukedom to a beggarly denier"—that Massachusetts has done something decided, something generous, on this subject, before now.

HERMANN.

BY THE BARDS WERDOMAR, KERDING AND DARDMOND.

AN ODE.

(From the German of Klopstock. In the style of the ancient German bards.)

BY C. L. LOOS.

Hermann, in Latin called Arminius, was the son of Siegmar, a prince of the Cherusci. He was educated at Rome, and was raised there to the rank of a knight. But even amidst the splendors of the capital of Augustus, the fire of patriotism burned in his soul, and he returned to the forests of Germany, determined to liberate his country from the Roman yoke. By his eloquence and zeal he assembled around him the German hosts, and in a decisive and bloody battle, fought in the Teutoburger forest, whither he had lured the enemy, and which lasted for three days, he defeated and almost annihilated an immense Roman army under the command of Quinctilius Varus. Three Roman legions were almost entirely cut to pieces, and Varus himself, in despair, fell on his sword. Seutonius records that this terrible defeat so overwhelmed Augustus, that for months he let his beard grow, and often striking his head against the wall would exclaim, “Varus, Varus, give me back my legions!”

Hermann is regarded by the Germans as the deliverer of their country, and this defeat of Varus as the great battle of their freedom, which secured to them their future independence and the purity of their language, their customs and their laws. He was victorious in many other engagements with the enemies of his country, and Caecina, a Roman general under Germanicus, son of Drusus, came near meeting the fate of Varus with his whole army. Through the jealousy of some German princes he was assassinated in his thirty-seventh year. He had carried off and married Thusnelda, daughter of Segestes, a chief of his own nation, but an ardent ally of the Romans. Thusnelda was captured by her father and was led to Rome to grace the subsequent triumph of Germanicus.

Werdomar.

On this rock of aged moss
Let us sit, O bards, and sing him!
Let no one step forward and look down o'er the thicket
That covers him—the noblest son of the fatherland!

For there he lies in his blood,
He, the secret terror of Rome,
When with the war-dance and flute-play of triumph
They led off his Thusnelda.

Look not upon him;—you would weep,
Did you see him lie in his blood!
And no tones of weeping shall the Telyn¹ sound forth
She shall sing the immortal one!

Kerding.

Bright is yet my youthful hair,
To-day the first sword was girded on me,
The first time was I armed with lance and Telyn,
And shall I sing Hermann?

Ask not too much of the youth, fathers!
I must dry my hot cheeks
With the golden locks,
Ere I sing the greatest of the sons of Mana².

Darmond.

I weep tears of rage,
And will not dry them!

² Mana and Thuisikon are deified titular heroes of Germany.

Flow, flow down the glowing cheek,
Tears of rage!

They are not mute. Thou understandest what they murmur,

It is a curse. Hear them, O Hela,³
Let none of the traitors of the fatherland
That slew him, die in battle!

Werdomar.

See ye the forest-stream tumble
Down into the rocky cleft?
And hurled down with it the rumbling pines
For Hermann's funeral-pyre?

Soon will he be dust, and rest
In the earth of the grave,
And in the holy dust the sword
On which he swore destruction to the conqueror!

Linger, O thou, spirit of the slain,
On thy way to Siegmur,
And hear how for thee
Burns the heart of thy people!

Kerding.

Tell it not to Thusnelda,—speak it not,—
That here in his blood her Hermann lies!
Speak it not to the noble wife, the unhappy mother
That her Thumeliko's father lies here in blood!

Tell it not to her, that has already in chains
Walked before the terrible car of the proud triumph!—
Thou hast a Roman heart
That couldn't tell this to the desolate one!

Darmond.

And what father begot thee,
Unhappy daughter!—Segestes too
Reddens in the dark late vengeance his sword.⁴
Curse him not! Hela has already cursed him!

Werdomar.

Let the name of Segestes not be heard in song!
Devote it silently to oblivion,
That over his ashes it may rest
With heavy wing!

The chord that trembles
Hermann's name is defiled,
If even with one angry tone
It doom the traitor.

Hermann, Hermann, sing to the echo,
To the secret awe of the woods as the favorite of the noblest,
The bards in full choir,—as the leader of the boldest,—
In full choir,—as the deliverer of the fatherland!

Sister of Cannae, battle of Winfeld!
I saw thee with flowing bloody hair,
With the flaming look of annihilation,
Pass over among the harps of Walhalla!⁵

The son of Drusus wished to conceal
Thy transitory monument,—

And hear at the dance of the spring-time flowers
The triumphal shout of the conquerors!

More sisters he wished to give to Cannae,
Companions to Varus in Elysium;—
But for the envious overruling counsel of the princes
Caecina would have become the companion of Varus.

In Hermann's burning soul had long dwelt
A greater thought.
At midnight, at the sacrifice of Thorr⁷ and the war-song,
It was formed in him and moved onward to the deed!

The conqueror of the storm relates:
In the ocean of the far North is an island—mountain,⁸
That rolls forth like clouds the flame—announcing smoke,
Then sends far into the heavens the lofty fires and hurls for miles the crashing rocks;

Thus announced Hermann through his battle,
Determined to go
Over the protecting ice-mountains—to go
To the plains of Rome,

To die there, or in the proud capitol
Close by the scales of Jupiter,
To ask Tiberius and the shades of his fathers
For the justice of their war!

To do this he wished to bear the leader's sword
Among the princes; then they conspired death against him;
And now he lies in blood, in whose soul
Lived the great thought for the fatherland!

Darmond.

Hast thou heard it,—Hela?
—— My angry tear?
Hast thou heard its call,
Hela, avenger?

SKETCHES OF SOUTHERN LIFE.

NO. IV.

How often do we feel, when placed in scenes for the first time that are peculiarly delightful to us, as if haunted by some dim, delicious reminiscences, that we had once before passed through the same scenes; a sort of spiritual and mysterious pleasure is thus added to our enjoyment, and we love to give ourselves up to the illusion as in a pleasant dream. It is this feeling, too, which gives such wonderful power to the strains of music over the minds of some, in whom it awakens these undefinable, yet inexpressibly delightful emotions, a feeling of the spirit within us, and a longing to penetrate the mystery of its existence. This is not a peculiar sensation indeed to scenes of enjoyment, for in seasons of affliction, how often our present sufferings are enhanced by this awful foreboding, when "coming events cast their shadows before," that we are now fulfilling some irreversible decree of fate, of which we had a former knowledge. Who has not felt in dreams a more vivid sense of reality, than in his waking moments, for then fancy wanders uncontrolled through her airy domain, and images of unearthly brightness arise, without any material perception to dim or weaken their effect. The metaphysician vainly attempts to analyze these mysteries of the spirit, they are standing miracles left in this material and mechanical age to proclaim to all, that there is a spark of Divinity within these earthly vessels.

In this strain ran Henry Livingstone's thoughts, as he sauntered forth on a fine summer morning, in that blissful state, when we give ourselves up to waking dreams, as vivid and as unreal, as those which visit us in sleep, and the only difference between the two states consists in this; that reason is only sufficiently awake in the former to conceal her own unpleasant suggestions from the excited imagination, and the will has power enough to call forth only such ideas as please the fancy. The old grove, the winding river, the surrounding scenery, but above all, the fair and gentle Fanny, seemed to him to have been shadowed forth in some former blessed and spiritual existence, and he felt like a wandering spirit now returning to the home of his soul.

In this mood he wandered along a winding path near the banks of the river, which was shaded with the luxuriant growth of the tulip tree, maple, airy birch and shivering aspen, overhung with wild grape-vines, now forming rich, dark bowers, through which the sun could scarcely penetrate, then throwing graceful festoons of fairy lightness from tree to tree. Here, too, the trumpet flower and clematis, wreathed themselves around the trees, adding variety and beauty to the rich and varied foliage. The brilliant cardinal flower growing in large beds, glowed like precious stones, the rhexia and blue enpatorium mingled their tints together in gay profusion. No sounds were heard but an occasional bird-note, and the ceaseless flowing of the river, a sound which irresistibly disposes to meditation. He went on dreaming sweet dreams, without attempting to check the roivings of fancy, following the path unconscious where it was leading him, until it struck off into another path winding up a gentle knoll, he pursued this, which gradually led him to more elevated ground, and the murmuring of the wind in the pine forest, like a great Æolian harp, whose chords gave forth their low, sweet notes under the soft summer winds, attracted him.

As he emerged from the pine forest, he perceived through a screen of trees and vines, a cabin which presented an unusual air of neatness and comfort, and he was about to approach to view the premises more nearly, when he was arrested by the sound of a voice, the lowest tone of which he thought he could have recognised in Babel. He advanced gently and cautiously behind the screen, until he saw the cabin plainly, and the yard neatly swept before it. A very old looking negro woman, neatly dressed, and venerable in appearance, was seated beneath the shade of her own vine and fig-tree, and Fanny was sitting near her with an open book in her hands, from which she was reading aloud. It was irresistible the temptation to pause and listen, and he perceived that he could do so without danger of discovery, for he was entirely screened from observation. Fanny was reading a chapter from one of the Gospels, and the earnest solemnity of her tones, showed how deeply she realized what she was reading. As she closed the book, she made a few, simple, explanatory remarks upon what she had just read, so plain, that it was impossible not to comprehend them, and so full of genuine religious feeling, that they went directly to the heart of the hearer.

"It does do me good, Miss Fanny," said the old woman, "to hear you read the Scriptures; it sounds sweeter and more solemn-like to me than any preacher's reading I ever heard. But if you've got time, honey, will you sing me one hymn before you go?"

"What hymn do you prefer, mammy?"

"I like that one 'There is a land of pure delight;' that's a mighty good hymn, and it makes me think of that great resting-place I shall soon go to."

Fanny complied with the request, and sang the hymn with so much sweetness, simplicity and expression, that the strain affected Henry deeply, and he could not help comparing the effect produced on his feelings by this simple melody, with its touching words, to that which he had experienced in splendid churches from the brilliant sacred music, instrumental and vocal, of professional singers.

When Fanny had concluded, she arose to depart, after inquiring into all Judy's little wants, and promising to supply them.

"The Lord will reward you, my child, for all your goodness to a poor old cretur like me; but stop a minute, I want to show you the nice present of Guinea fowl eggs I've got to send to you when I can get one of the children to carry them up to the great house." So saying, she took the basket down from the shelf and showed them to Fanny.

"Oh, I'm very much obliged to you, mammy; it is a most acceptable present,—Philip likes Guinea fowl eggs so much. It is such a nice little basket, I can take it home myself without any trouble."

"No, no, Miss Fanny, 'spose any one was to meet you. It don't look proper to see a lady like you toting eggs."

Fanny laughed. "I have often heard you say a lady will be a lady, no matter what sort of work she does."

"Yes, high blood will show, but still there's some things I don't think looks well for ladies to do, it looks too much like poor folks. I can easily make Nelly run up with the eggs when she comes in from the field."

"But suppose a lady should happen to be poor, what must she do then?"

"She could'n't be poor folks then, honey, for 'tis poor blood makes poor folks; and a lady born and bred will be a lady, as I always told you, no matter what sort of work she does, but you've got a plenty of servants to wait on you, and there is no use in your carrying eggs."

Fanny yielded the point and turned again to go away, when the old woman said, looking carefully around her, and lowering her voice:

"There's one thing I wanted to say to you, Miss Fanny, about that Yankee gentleman—you all had better take good notice what he does."

This was said with such an air of solemnity, that Fanny saw it would not do to make a laughing matter of it, so she replied as gravely as she could—"Why should we take notice of what he does, he will not do any harm, mammy."

"Ah, don't be too sure of that now, honey; there was that Mr. Jarvis from the North, you know, that stayed so long at Mr. Smith's, and was after courting Miss Sarah too; well, they had'n't no notion how he went about and talked amongst their servants, putting all sorts of foolishness in their heads, and making 'em discontented. I said to Mr. Smith's Jim, when he was telling me some of them things Mr. Jarvis said, says I, what did Mr. Jarvis give you when he went away? He said, he did'n't give me nothing. Well, says I, there it is—that shows what a mighty friend he is—never even gave you a chaw of tobacco. Now, who took care of you, when you was so sick last winter, Jim; did'n't your missus give you physic with her own hands,—did'n't Miss Sarah make flannel for you—and don't your Mas Tom give you quarters and chaws of tobacco many and many's the time; and besides, who stood your friend at the time of the great to do, when Mr. Smith's barn was broken open. Ah! you've got a mon'sous good master, Jim, but some niggers are so foolish, they don't know when they are well off."

"Yes," said Fanny, "what you say is very true, if Mr. Jarvis had been a real friend to black people, he would not have taken this way of showing it."

"I know'd that, honey, and it made me so mad with Jim, to hear what foolishness he ran on, that I talked right up and down to him, for I've known him ever since he was a child; besides, he married into the estate, so we may say he is one of the family like. But don't say nothing about what I've been telling you, if you please, for I don't want to make no mischief upon Jim; but as soon as I heard that Northern gentleman was staying here, I laid off to tell you all about Mr. Jarvis, that Mas Phil might watch him, and if he goes walking about amongst the cabins, or in the field, Mas Phil can go about with him, in a careless sort of a way, you know, like he was going with him for company."

"But mammy, Mr. Livingstone is a real gentleman—he would not act so meanly."

"Ah, now, don't you trust to that; I don't reckon there's any high blood amongst them Northern folks, like there is in old Virginy. That was the way they talked about Mr. Jarvis, they said he was so high larnt, he talked all sorts of outlandish talk, and played on Miss Sarah's pianey. I has heard of gentlemen's playing on the flute and the fiddle, but I never saw men playing on the pianey, except the old music master, so I said, when I heard about it, I reckoned the man had been a music-master in his own country. Miss Sarah wouldn't hear it, and went on praising him until at last he had the impudence to court her, and I should'n't be surprised if this gentleman had the assurance to be thinking about you, Miss Fanny."

For the first time, Fanny's clear, silvery laugh, fell painfully on Henry's ear, and he shrank more closely behind the screen with mingled feelings of vexation and mortification. He heard Fanny say, "No danger of that, mammy, Mr. Livingstone has seen too many fine ladies to think of me." She went quickly away, as she said these words, and Henry could hear old Judy muttering some disparaging sentence in reply about himself. He was now quite convinced, not only that his passion was unrequited by Fanny, but that she was quite unconscious of its existence, for he was sure that there was not one spark of coquetry or insincerity in her composition. The first step was not taken, and a feeling of dependency came over him—the prize seemed every minute brighter, fairer and more unattainable. Yet it is hard to destroy hope in the hearts of those who have never experienced any severe disappointment, and Henry began again to reconstruct the glittering web, which Fanny's light laugh and careless tones had brushed away. He had heard not the most remote hint of a rival, and if her heart was unoccupied, he would not despair of winning it.

He retraced his path a part of the way, then, filled with agitating and unpleasant thoughts, struck across the fields, and passed a settlement of negro cabins. In another mood, he would have paused and talked with the children he saw playing about in the yards, for the peculiar ways of talking and thinking of this singular race of people awakened his interest and curiosity, but at present, he could not brook the idea of being suspected, even by old Judy, of the meanness of enacting the fable of the viper and the hedgehog. He observed, however, in passing, that the cabins, like the dwellings of a free population, were characterized by the peculiar turn of their possessors. The yards before most of the cabin doors were neatly swept, and large gardens attached to many of them, filled with vegetables and corn-patches, rudely, but substantially inclosed, with that species of inclosure, the existence of which, Michaux mentions in his work on forest trees as peculiar to Virginia, and almost incredible to relate, from its destructiveness of young trees, namely, a watlin, a horror with which the Eastern Virginians are so familiar, as to be unconscious of its enormity. A rose bush or two, some tall sunflowers, and bright bunches of marygolds, were seen in the gardens of the most thrifty and the neatest of this little community, but a few of the other cabins exhibited the negro character in its most genuine form; dirty yards, rags stuffed in the crevices of their houses, gardens overrun with weeds, and scarcely an attempt at an inclosure around them. In a word, they enjoyed the privilege, for such many negroes consider it, of being as uncomfortable and as unthrifty as they pleased.

Taken collectively, however, this little settlement conveyed to the observer the idea of a happy community, and excited many doubts and speculations in Henry's mind, as to whether these negroes, putting aside the name of slavery and all its associations, did not really enjoy in such a situation as this, as great a degree of happiness, and even freedom, so far as they were fitted for it, as in any other situation in which they could be placed in the present state of things. An outcast population they certainly were in the States which boasted of being free States, and here in a slave State he found them existing in communities, enjoying the rude and simple pleasures for which their degree of cultivation fitted them, cared for in sickness and age, never knowing the presence of extreme want, or the care of providing subsistence for their families, and living under a sort of parental as well as an absolute control.

Henry's mind was candid—his love of truth ardent—yet he revolved these new ideas with much diffidence and distrust, fearing lest the engrossing passion of his soul should give a false brilliancy of coloring to all objects associated, in any degree, with one, who embodied the types which had existed in his mind of all that is fair, bright or excellent. He determined to consider the matter deeply and impartially, and as he was walking along the fields, deep in thought, his attention was arrested by the sound of children's voices, and as he approached more nearly, he heard distinctly one of these children repeating to another some verses from the Sermon on the Mount.

"Is that right, Billy?" said the child to his companion.

"Well, t'aint exactly right: now listen to me, I'll learn it to you. Miss Fanny said I could say it all without missing a word."

Henry paused, and having spoken kindly to these children, asked the little boy who had undertaken the office of instructor, and who had indeed repeated correctly a large portion of the Sermon on the Mount, who it was that had taught him to repeat so many verses from the Bible.

"Miss Fanny, sir—she taught me, and this here boy, and all the children on the plantation."

"And what else does she teach you?"

"To say hymns and catechism, sir."

"And do you think you understand the meaning of what you repeat?"

"I reckon I does, of some of 'em. Miss Fanny always makes us tell what they mean, 'cause she says it don't do us a bit of good unless we know the meaning of it, and try to do what is in the Bible and hymns."

Henry asked the child a few leading questions from Scripture, and then questioned him as to the meaning of the portion he had just repeated.

His answers were made in his own homely, but expressive language, yet showed plainly that he had been carefully instructed, and that he was acquainted with the elementary truths of the Gospel, and the true meaning and purport of the passage he had repeated from Scripture.

"What patience, what high, disinterested, religious principle—what philanthropy in the truest sense of the word, must teaching such as this require," thought Henry, "from such a being, too, as Fanny Seyton. What a sacrifice of time, too, does it involve, from one who has so many internal and external sources of enjoyment in her own bright imagination and rare intellect, and in the society of friends to whom she is warmly attached; what self-denial in exchanging pursuits congenial to her taste, and such as most young ladies would think they were doing a duty to themselves to pursue to the utmost their leisure would allow, for the task of enlightening, by the slow and tedious method of oral instruction, minds in gross, mental darkness! And yet, how improving such a mental exercise would be, to those who had the patience to impart such instruction, not only to the spiritual, but the intellectual nature of the instructor! How much might be learned in this way of intellectual prowess, by watching the first rude attempts at generalization, reasoning, deduction, when the ideas are just struggling from the chaos of thick darkness to light!"

Such warm admiration of moral excellence, divested of all the embellishments of fancy and romance, was highly honorable to the heart of a young man, who had been educated like Henry Livingstone, who possessed, too, an exquisite taste for the beautiful in all its forms, and consequently appreciated accomplishments very highly. But love in his case, instead of exerting his usual power of blinding his votaries, had, like Ithuriel's spear, awakened his mind to higher and purer perceptions of truth; and the loveliness of moral and spiritual beauty had never appeared to him so far exalted above all the outward attractions and accomplishments, which the world especially delights to honor.

He thought of Fanny's speech to old Judy, which he had so lately heard; "and is it possible," he exclaimed mentally, "she can be so unconscious of her own rare gifts and attractions, her own exquisite beauty, 'the mind, the music breathing from her soul,' as to suppose, that I could prefer, what is called a fine lady, to a being like herself. I wish," he said, half aloud, "my mother could see her;" and at these words a pang of self-reproach shot through his heart. How seldom had the idea of this kind mother, whose very life hung upon his, recurred to him for many days past, how carelessly he had perused the letters he had received from home, after he had ascertained that his parents were well; how weary, flat, stale and unprofitable all their contents had seemed, how foreign to the new emotions which had arisen in his heart, to the enchanting state of existence, through which he was passing. "And yet," he murmured, "the lightest pang that I could suffer would inflict more pain on my mother, than my death would on Fanny Seyton." This reflection called forth a deep sigh, but again Hope whispered that the time might come when his happiness would be inexpressibly precious to Fanny, and again he pondered on the means of winning her heart.

He was so much absorbed in his own thoughts and feelings, that he was quite unconscious how far, or how long he had rambled, and it was nearly two o'clock when he returned to Oak Grove, where he found Philip looking out for him.

"Ah Hal, I am glad you have returned from your wanderings, you must have made a real exploring expedition. I was just about to set out in search of you, as Fanny suggested the possibility of your having lost yourself in our pine forests, though I quieted her apprehensions somewhat, by surmising that you were botanising, as I know that is a favorite pursuit of yours."

"You gave me more credit than I deserved," said Henry smiling, "I was not engaged in the pursuit of knowledge of any sort, but merely enjoying the sweet influences of earth, air and sky, yet some observations forced themselves upon me, the beauty and variety of your forest trees, for instance, the brilliancy of the wild flowers and the surpassing grace and beauty of the wild grape vines. I do not believe any oriental growth can exceed them in richness and beauty."

"The sweet influences of a noon day in August," said Philip laughing, are "somewhat too sultry for me; moreover, I cannot allow of your exposing yourself to them, for though I can answer for your health, if you are discreet, I cannot be responsible for your safety if you rove about in summer suns, before you are acclimated, and you know I am answerable to Mrs. Livingstone for you."

"Mrs. Maynard's Tom is waiting at the door to see you, Mas Phil," said John, entering with the important air of one who has agreeable news to communicate.

Philip returned in a minute with notes of invitation to Helen Maynard's wedding, which was to take place the next evening, and said, as he handed one of them to Henry,

"You will have now an opportunity, Livingstone, of seeing a Virginia wedding conducted in old style, a real gathering of the clans, a squeeze of aunts, uncles and cousins to the tenth degree, and marvel how one house can contain so many people; altogether you will see an entertainment most unique in its kind, and such as you will probably never witness again. Indeed they are fast passing away even with us, and disappearing before the advance of civilization."

"Altogether then," said Henry, "I consider it a piece of rare good fortune to have such an opportunity."

"You will find much to amuse you," said Fanny, "though you will, doubtless, witness things which will appear semi-barbarous, yet there will be so much ease and cordiality, and such varieties of character, that I think you will be pleased."

"I am sure I shall," replied Henry, "the mere conventionalities and embellishments of a fashionable entertainment possess very few attractions for me, but a party of the sort you describe, would be not only amusing but interesting. Whenever the workings of the heart and varieties of natural character are allowed to appear, we find something to please and improve."

"Then you will like us better and better," said Philip, "for the varieties of individual character are very strongly marked amongst us; and though we abhor display of sentiment, and are not addicted to scenes of any sort, still you find few states of society, where family and local affections are stronger and warmer than in the 'Old Dominion,' or where greater sacrifices of interest are made to the ties of kindred or of friendship."

"It shows we are rather at a low ebb, my dear brother," said Fanny laughing, "when we have to trumpet forth our own praises:—these strongly marked characters often degenerate into oddities, of which we have certainly a rare and large collection, but which do not often excite admiration, in those who have been accustomed to a polished state of society."

"These peculiarities of habit or manner," said Henry, "certainly do not excite admiration, though they often produce amusement, but individualities of character and mind are very interesting to those who love to study human nature, and are always produced, I think, by high and vigorous mental culture. In your state of society, it appears to me that the higher classes are called on at a very early age to think and decide not only for themselves but for others; this early necessity for thought and action must have a great effect in awaking and forming the mind. Here, too, they seem to read not for display, but either for the gratification of literary taste, or to gain information on some specific object intimately connected with their pursuits, such as agriculture, politics, law or medicine. This sort of culture enlarges and invigorates the mind. Yet, on the other hand," added Henry smiling, "I cannot so far abandon my character as a seeker for truth, as not to perceive that this mode of life, must necessarily produce a deficiency in those literary pursuits which require minuteness, accuracy, and polish, and which can only consist with a division of mental labor. This cannot take place but in a more artificial state of society, and among a denser population."

"I concede this to the fullest extent," replied Philip; "nay more, I will add, that these deficiencies can neither be excused, nor entirely explained by our modes of life, but arise, in a great measure, from a mixture of indolence and ambition, which is a natural trait, and lies at the bottom of most of our defects and misfortunes. We are unwilling to bestow the minute and patient labor which is so necessary to literary excellence, and not content with mediocrity even in our first efforts, unless we can fly with the eagle to the sun, would remain with our wings folded to our sides forever. We need some powerful impetus, some strong incentive to arouse us into strong mental action. If an honor is to be won at college, or a prize won in the political arena, we are never laggards in the race, but continued, patient effort, the results of which are to be gradual, we shrink from, and the consequence is, that though no one can deny us at least a fair share of native talent, we have scarcely contributed a mite to national or universal literature."

"And for State literature," said Fanny, "we are like the lion, who complained that there were no painters among the lions to commemorate the victories of their own race, so they were always represented in the pictures of men as inferior in power to themselves."

"This state of things will not long continue, I hope," said Henry; "you have all the necessary materials, a spark only is wanting to kindle the pile, and the light of your natural genius will shine forth to the astonishment and delight of the beholders."

"I trust you may prove a true prophet," replied Fanny."

"I confess I am not so sanguine as Livingstone," said Philip, "I fear there is vis inertie enough in the pile to extinguish a thousand sparks."

"It is strange," said Henry, "that Virginia should have found no champion, amongst the many who have shared her hospitality, and delighted in the intercourse of her high-minded sons and daughters, and formed associations in her fair land, sweet and lasting as life itself."

There was a tone of sadness mingled with this enthusiastic expression of feeling, that arrested Fanny's attention, and excited her surprise. Henry felt his color change, beneath the earnest yet kind glance of that matchless dark eye, which seemed to ask why such thoughts as these should awaken such deep and sad feeling.

"Why who would tilt against Christendom," said Philip, "we furnish too good a subject for the expenditure of philanthropy and moral reprobation to hope that any one who ventures his reputation in the moral, religious or literary world, would undertake our cause. The moral blight is upon us, and wo to the wight whose vision is so obscure as not to perceive it."

"Yet," said Henry, "the candid would at least admit that

Some flowers of Eden ye still inherit,
Though the trail of the Serpent is over them all.

But unfortunately hundreds can see the trail of the serpent, for one who has eyes to discover the flowers of Eden. The celestial touch of truth, which opens the eyes to moral and intellectual, and even to natural beauty, has never rested upon them, and they walk in a different world from that in which those dwell, whose eyes have been opened."

Philip looked at his sister, who seemed thoughtful and serious. "Well, Fanny," said he laughing, "of what are you thinking, of how to restore the 'Old Dominion,' or how you can help Cousin Maynard about the wedding, or whether you will wear pearls or roses to-morrow evening?"

Fanny almost started, and blushed deeply as she met Henry's glance resting upon her, for she was conscious, that her meditations were chiefly of him. This blush was the herald of hope to Henry's heart, and he cast his eyes down to conceal the pleasure that sparkled in them, from the flattering auguries to which it gave rise.

"My thoughts were a tangled web," said Fanny, "which would not be worth unravelling, even if I had time for it."

Just then Mr. Seyton's voice was heard from the library calling aloud for Fanny, who quickly obeyed the summons, and returned almost immediately on her way to her own room, with a somewhat perplexed countenance, and her hands full of papers.

"What have you got there, Fanny, that makes you look so doleful,—drills, plows, harrows, no wonder you are dismayed."

"To tell the truth," said Fanny, "I do not like to acknowledge to papa the labor it will cost me to get these drawings ready for to-morrow's mail, he has such implicit reliance on my powers, that I dislike to undeceive him, and I am afraid I shall hardly be able to finish them, I have so many other things to do."

"I wish I could help you," said Philip, "but if I took a pencil in my hand to draw a plow, it would be quite as apt to turn out a cart."

"Allow me," said Henry, rising and advancing towards Fanny, "to act as your draughtsman on this occasion. I don't like to boast of my own qualifications, but Philip can testify that drawing is my peculiar forte, and it will really be a good deed to employ me about something useful. Besides," added he, smiling, "I should like to redeem my credit somewhat with Mr. Seyton, since he has discovered that I know so little of the uses of agricultural implements, by showing that I can at least make drawings of them."

Henry evinced such an earnest desire to oblige, that Fanny thought it would be ungracious to reject his offered service, indeed his kindness was peculiarly grateful and acceptable, as she had in fact a thousand and one things to do and to think about. She therefore accepted his offer with a graceful simplicity peculiarly her own, and it was so evident that Henry thought himself the obliged party in being allowed to do her bidding, that Fanny could not feel the obligation as onerous, and yet, strange to say, she drew no inference from this circumstance, favorable to her own vanity.

"How kind and clever he is," thought Fanny, as she marked the rapid and skillful touch of Henry's pencil, and how completely he seems to be overcoming his prejudices to Virginia! When we get better acquainted, I must rally him a little on his Virginia tale, of which I dare say he has already repented."

"And now for the order of the day," said Philip, "laces, ribbons, muslins and flowers, what a deplorable case is yours, Fanny, to be left to your own unassisted genius on this important day, without even a female friend to say what is becoming: as to being comme il faut, that is quite out of the question; but then it would be a comfort to look pretty, even if this should be accomplished in the most irregular and unfashionable way."

Fanny laughed good-humoredly and said, "I am, indeed, much to be pitied for being thrown so entirely upon my own resources in all matters, both little and great, and for this reason consider myself entitled to special indulgence. But, I must go and meditate alone, and act too, in many important matters, so I have no time to talk nonsense with you, Philip. Meantime, I charge you to amuse Mr. Livingstone, as I know by experience, that his employment is but an irksome one."

"He has taken so to reverie of late, that he has become perfectly unamusable, but I will do my best; shall I read or talk, Livingstone?"

"Read then," said Henry, "though I really require no amusement, I am quite interested in the progress of my work."

"I understand the meaning of that very well, you prefer reading that you may listen or not, just as you please; if I read, the office of listening shall be no sinecure. Instead of one of James' novels, in which you may catch up the loose threads of the story ever and anon, so as to stand a respectable examination, without having heard more than a fifth of the story, I shall read 'Past and Present' for your edification, and require you as I finish each chapter, to put it into English, and discuss it with me."

"Have mercy, Philip, I should prefer your talking."

"That is the very conclusion to which I wished to bring you, but as soon as I perceive your wits are wool-gathering, I shall have recourse to Carlyle."

And Philip ran on in the careless and exuberant gaiety of his spirits, describing to Henry an old Virginia wedding, and whimsically portraying the leading characters of the company, they should meet on the following evening at Mrs. Maynard's, while Henry bestowed just sufficient attention on his discourse to prevent his discovering that he was carrying on an under current of his own thoughts.

F**.

THE LIGHTNING'S COMPLAINT.

BY SIDNEY DYER.

I

Alas! my ancient glory faden
Like some low earth-born thing,
For man has plucked me from the skies,
And bound my fiery wing.

II.

The nations oft at me have gazed,
And trembled with affright,
When vaulting through the azure dome,
I trailed my livid light.

III.

The angels e'en in wonder stood,
When at the high command
Of Heaven, I hurled old Satan down
Upon the burning strand.

IV.

And when man's sins called vengeance down,
Before my scathing blaze,
The stoutest heart, appalled with fear,
Shrunk back in dire amaze.

V.

When God in wrath o'erspread the earth
By waters from his hand,
I flashed around the lofty hills,
And split the solid land!

VI.

What wonders I o'er Sodom wrought,
And Nineveh of old ;
And louder still on Sinai's top
My deep-mouthed thunder rolled !

VII.

And I have crushed the thick-ribbed bark,
Which braved the Ocean storm ;
And prostrate laid the proudest work
The art of man could form.

VIII.

Great men and wise in olden time,
Whene'er they saw me shine,
A victim on my altar laid,
And paid the rite divine !

IX.

But now, alas ! no sacrifice
Smokes on my altar-fire,
For man has caught me from the skies,
And harnessed me in wire !

X.

O ! is it not a foul disgrace
That I who worlds have rent,
Should now be made a paltry clerk
To number cent, per cent ?

XI.

Nay, this is deemed to high employ,
And I am made a mule,
To pack from town to town the thoughts
Of every prating fool !

XII.

I should not feel dishonored much
To lend my wings of fire,
To trace in burning words the song
Breathed from the Poet's lyre.

XIII.

For this would still be heavenly work,
In which I should unite,
Although the Poet's radiant thoughts
Might half obscure my light.

XIV.

But thus to quote the worth of stocks,
And current market prices ;
And ply the common tattler's trade
To publish human vices ;

XV.

To tell each day how cotton sells,
Each night of balls and revels,
And in the morning copy give
To all the printers' devils—

XVI.

O ! this my soul has humbled quite—
I am no more a wonder,
Since man first caught me by the mane,
And silenced all my thunder !

On the Importance of the Social Sciences in the present day.

EXTRACT FROM AN UNPUBLISHED MS.

* * * All knowledge has been divided into two great classes of Science—Physical and Ethical.* These two great families of human learning have met with very fluctuating and dissimilar fortunes in the various eras of the world's progress. They have seldom been both pursued in the same age with equal assiduity or like success : but the one has ever been comparatively neglected, while the other has been almost exclusively cultivated.† During the more illustrious periods of antiquity, and throughout the Middle Ages, Ethical sciences enjoyed an unchallenged preëminence. In modern times, since Copernicus and Galileo, and, more especially, since the Great Instauration of Bacon, the higher distinction of Physical science is obvious.‡ By this disjunction it has happened that the two mighty provinces of human knowledge have rarely advanced with equal steps. In the present day, Natural Science, in all its forms, and under all its applications, has been so widely expanded, and so illustrated by the glorious array of talent enlisted in its ranks, that it now constitutes the proudest monument of human genius, industry and perseverance. Hence, it has long absorbed the energies of most of those great minds which have devoted themselves to contemplation ; for it is in learning as in our bodies—the vital humors will press towards that point where any local excitement may prevail. Thus the direction, originally impressed upon the intellect of the world by the profound wisdom of Lord Bacon, is perpetuated by the brilliance of the triumphs that have been gained in that career. It is decreed, however, by the wise ordination of

* Even Comte in his Cours de Philosophie Positive, and Ampère in his Essai de Philosophie recognize this grand division of the Sciences into two classes—the former by stating that all our knowledge is relative either to the world or to man, (tome iii. Biologie, chap. i)—the latter by dividing all science into the two kingdoms of sciences Cosmologiques and sciences Néologiques. See also Sir James Mackintosh's Dissertation on the Progress of Ethical Philosophy. In Lord Bacon's Classification of human knowledge, the divisions are rendered confused and unsatisfactory by the neglect of this leading distinction.

† The Age of Aristotle in Greece makes almost the solitary exception,—and this in consequence of his own wonderful genius in both Physics and Ethics :—for Locke and Clarke will not counterbalance Newton, nor will Leibnitz as a Metaphysician rank with Leibnitz as a Mathematician in the history of the progress of the Human Mind.

‡ The Vortices of Des Cartes, and the Integral and Differential Calculus of Leibnitz are more celebrated than the idealism and metaphysical system of the former, or the preëstablished harmony and sufficient reason of the latter.

Providence, that the exclusive or overweening devotion to any particular subject shall invariably be productive in the end of injurious effects, notwithstanding the delusive brightness of the flowers that strew the path around us. The chill and the fever follow each other in alternate succession in order to re-establish the equilibrium of heat in the human frame. This takes place likewise in human learning—one excess is counteracted by another—otherwise every path would lead the dance of death. But the wholesome change rarely supervenes until we are sensibly affected by the perils resulting from an inordinate devotion to one branch of study. The Physical sciences have by their discoveries multiplied incalculably our powers, our resources, our knowledge, our comforts, and our wealth—they have rendered us independent of the elements, and have made us superior to the ordinary restrictions of time and space. But notwithstanding these proud achievements, there are urgent questions of the gravest importance, which no light from Physical science will enable us to solve. Nay, Natural Philosophy has pressed its own conquests so far, that it has come into immediate contact with Metaphysics, and seeks from that source the answer to its own highest difficulties. For proof of this I need only refer to the works of Whewell and Ampère. In addition to this the Sphinx stands in our path, mumbling her dark oracles, propounding the great enigmas of life, the mysteries of social organization, which can only hope a response from the more profound study of Sociological science.*

* The present condition of England is forcibly exhibited by the Westminster Review. "Over millions of the working classes, several of the lamp-post orators that we could name, wield an influence far greater than that of the Throne and the Parliament. Not the parochial churches, but the lowly Ranters' chapels, or those of the unendowed and often letterless sectaries, win the very small church-going portion of the operatives of England. The laws are submitted to rather than approved: the other institutions are tolerated, instead of exciting admiration and gratitude. Capital is regarded as the robber of labour, instead of its patron and brother. Parochial relief is no longer dreaded as a badge. The police are treated as spies, instead of being regarded as defenders. Classes are in hostile array. The religious sects are at the red heat of the feud warfare. The tavern has become the Englishman's half-home: secret orders are on the increase: and meanwhile the great majority of England's workmen can neither read these pages with profitable facility, nor write an ordinary letter of business, with the least regard to the proprieties of expression or the laws of grammar. No wonder that crime has outsped the proportion of population by a fearful ratio; and that we are now expending nine millions a year, ($45,000,000,) to defend society from its own hands," &c., &c.—Westm. Rev., Jan., 1848, art. viii, p. 427. Eng. Ed. The whole article will well reward perusal. What remedy for this state of things can be anticipated from the cultivation or advancement of the Physical sciences alone?

That response we are unable to give, because we have neglected to prosecute with due diligence the sciences which explain the phenomena, and establish the laws of human society. Yet, on this reply depend the conservation of States—the permanence of governments—the sustenance of human life—the security of property and institutions—the preservation of morals—and the general welfare of men. Such is the nature of the questions which are now vehemently, but obscurely agitating the intellect of the world. Few, indeed, are cognizant of the causes, or of the exact character of the difficulties before them, but all are more or less affected by the danger and uncertainty around. Carlyle, hearing the rumbling of approaching eruptions, but, like the Prophets of old, blind to the remedy, stands in the midst of the apparent serenity, exclaiming, Woe! woe! "like the voice of one crying in the wilderness." But his warnings meet with the fate of the oracles of Cassandra, and are cursed with neglect. We have been imbibing and inhaling one only of the elements that constitute the atmosphere of knowledge—the other is ready to ignite and explode. Even those who do not perceive the derangement, are oppressed by the sultry weight of the air that augurs the impending storm. We must restore the healthy combination of the constituent elements of our intellectual atmosphere, or perish by its disorganization. No speculations or discoveries in Natural science will enable us to do this—our sole therapeutics are contained in the Social sciences. By the observance and enforcement of the true maxims of International Justice we must produce greater harmony among nations; but how can we observe and enforce that which we neglect to learn, and deign not to improve? By a more profound study of the laws and mechanism of communities, we must probe the wounds of society and discover medicaments; and we must bring the past face to face with the present; for History like the magic mirror of the necromancer, recalls the absent or unknown in all its living forms and native colours. The balm that may minister to our wants or diseases can be found in this Gilead alone: and we have either neglected to search for it there, or have sought it with such negligent and indifferent eyes that it has eluded our gaze and frustrated our hopes.

But the tide is now turning, though in the mingling of the eddies produced by the conflicting currents, we cannot at once detect which shall prevail. The doubt, however, which exists in all topics of general social interest—the internal disintegration of the fabric of political institutions—the loosening of the bonds which hold together communities—the clogging of the wheels in the great mechanism of society, and their languid and spasmodic movements—all show where the danger resides, and suggest the nature of the requisite inquiry into the morbid action of the system. The singular revival of historic literature, surpassing in activity its condition in all former time, constituting an honorable distinction of the present generation, and promising to form the principal characteristic of the next—this is alone sufficient to manifest that, however vague be the impression of the necessities imposed, or the assistance required, mankind are disposed to seek aid in a renewed acquaintance with the experience and phenomena of human society in by-gone ages: and by tracing its progress and discovering its laws, to extract from the alembic, an elixir of life for the revivification of the paralyzed members.* The experiment of Medea to rejuvenate the aged Æson by hewing him in pieces, and throwing the bleeding limbs into the seething cauldron, is a very rude and unscientific, as well as dangerous process. The advancement of society by revolutions is, however, exactly analogous to it. To this it must come by the law of decomposition, if we cannot check disease: it is the last, worst crisis of decay; and though Providence does deduce good out of evil, yet we should endeavor to anticipate the necessity of killing life in order to preserve its material constituents. In Europe we hear at all times the low murmurs of approaching Revolution†—it is no longer the whizzing of the safety-valve, but the straining of the boiler, that reaches our ears from beyond the Atlantic. We may be in no immediate danger ourselves, but we cannot be indifferent when our neighbor Ucalegon's house is in flames. The miasma of social corruption is infectious;* and it is our interest to study the prognostics of disease, and to guard against the production and extension of contiguous influences. But, if any Moses is to stand between the living and the dead, and to stay the plague, he must derive his power from no quack nostrums of empirical pharmacy, but seek for the prescriptions of his State therapeutics in the profound study of social phenomena.† For these reasons, History and the Sociological sciences are eminently the studies denounced by the necessities of the times; and their zealous cultivation is required imperatively at our hands, as the great duty imposed upon the living generation.

These observations are necessarily very general, and consequently vague; but if I were to embark upon the wide sea of details, I know not where I should stop, or within what limits I should be able to compress them. There is one point, however, which is hourly growing in importance at the North, and is of vital significance in the most civilized countries of Europe. I allude to the question of wages, with its dependent topics, sustenance of the laborer, population, poor-laws, &c. Treatises on Political Economy inform us that wages cannot be depressed below

* "That of this science and art, (speculative sociology founded upon history,) the foundations are but beginning to be laid is sufficiently evident. But the most powerful and accomplished minds of the present age are fairly turning themselves towards that object, and it is the point towards which the speculative tendencies of mankind have now for some time been converging. For the first time it has become the aim of the greatest scientific thinkers to connect by theories the facts of universal history," &c. &c.—Mill's Logic. B. vi. c. x. p. 567. I quote from Mill rather than from his original, M. Comte, because the remarks of Comte are scattered throughout the whole of the last three volumes of his Cours de Philosophie Positive. See however tome iv. p. 48, 157, 526—tome vi. p. 713. &c. 781.

† The MS., from which this extract is taken, was prepared six months before the news of the February Revolution in France reached this country—much of it was written three months before that time. In an Address delivered in the Spring of 1845, the same views however were expressed. "Should the people of Europe overshoot the mark, and, like the French during their Revolution fall into the licence of turbulent anarchy, where is your security for the permanence of your institutions, but in that love for them which grows from long experience of their blessings, &c. In Europe, Agrarianism threatens revolution, and the struggle with which that Continent will burst from its trammals will necessarily give a jar to all other nations." * * * "Is there then no hope? Is there no remedy? Are nations to be struck down in the midst of their civilization, like cattle smitten with the plague? to die uttering groans to which the ears of their fellows are stopped? to fall victims without the hope of cure to that very civilization from which all their glories have sprung? The present phenomena might almost lead us to anticipate such a termination for the career of illustrious States," &c. Similar opinions were published by me also in the summer of 1842. The most remarkable instance of such prophecy is to be found in Comte, Cours, &c., tome i, 1830.

* The suddenness and virulence of this anarchical infection were fully exemplified in the spring elections at Norfolk, 1847, and were strikingly exhibited in the tone of the newspaper press throughout the country. So far as I am aware the National Intelligencer, (probably in consequence of the sound moral principle and political sagacity of Edward Wm. Johnston, Esq.,) was the only paper that was not hurried into insane applause by the rush of shallow revolutionary delusions.

the rate necessary to support the laborer and his family, or to keep life in them. This is at once a truism and a mockery: for human wants are as compressible as they are elastic—and degradation, which is more to be apprehended than death, is many degrees above starvation in the scale. For the past three years* there have been plague, pestilence and famine, operating in concert to desolate Ireland; and throughout Europe there have been want, desolation and misery. The remedies applied have been swallowed up like a drop of rain upon thirsty ground, and have scarcely left a trace behind. Nothing has been proposed which would bring more than temporary relief:† the danger and difficulty are augmented every day: the abyss which threatens to engulf the myriads of the earth yawns wider and wider: and there is no Curtius to close the chasm by devoting his life for the safety of his fellows. Where can we look for any healing aid in this threatening and heart-sickening condition of nations, except to a more profound and diligent study of the kindred sciences of History and Social Economics? The former will furnish us with our instances—it will explain the causes, the consequences and the succession of events—and it will reveal the secret of their connection. The latter will afford us those laws of interpretation and those conclusions which may be applied to the industrial life of nations, and the improvement of the condition of the masses. Until we find a complete solution of these mysteries we can none of us be safe. However secure we may think ourselves, we are slumbering upon the ashes of a volcano, which may at any time break forth again and overwhelm us.

† M. Comte continually points out the provisional and temporary character of all the expedients for the relief of existing social evils. In Mr. John S. Mill's political Economy, published during the present year, (1848,) some remedies are proposed for the distresses of Ireland, which might possibly prove effectual. All hitherto tried have been wholly ineffectual. V. Ed. Rev. Jan., 1848.

The North British Review gives the following clever translation of the old French epigram on Piron.

Ci git Piron; qui ne fut rien;
Pas même académicien.

Here lies Piron; who was—nothing; or, if that could be,
was less:
How!—nothing? Yes, nothing: not so much as F. K. S.

SUMMER IN THE BLUE RIDGE.

And all these wayward pleasures of my youth
Are simple pictures drawn from simple truth.—Crabbe.

It was common, in old times, for Lowlanders in Virginia to spend the summer in the mountains. Bath, in Berkeley, was a place of great resort, and its wild and glossy cedars made it highly romantic—especially at the going down of the sun. But all along the mountains it was customary for families who had wealth, to receive inmates on somewhat protracted visits. They often staid till Jack Frost drove them back to James River, or to the banks of the York or the Appomattox.

The writer remembers how, many years ago, he was domesticated at Forest Inn to the West of the Ridge, and what an agreeable summer he spent. Woman had not then so spread out her charms as to entangle him in the sundry perplexities of life. I had marked out a kind of cosmopolite plan, which of course involved single-blessedness. An inn like the one described by old Walton on the Dove was about the acme of my wishes, and I anticipated the flow of life just as if the seasons were painted on a wheel.

What shall prevent my describing a spot where some few flowers at least were planted in the paradise of the memory? The inn stood about forty yards from the public road, which had been opened through what was once a denser forest than Sherwood or Ettrick. A clump of cool and stately oaks fringed the opposite side of the highway, which presented to the eye a series of round and beautiful wastes. In the rear of these oaks flowed a stream, known in the neighborhood by the name of Mossy Creek, in which were several natural, but slight cascades, and not seriously affecting the tranquillity of the water. There was an air of comfort about the premises, particularly the inn, which was a kind of roomy box with some paper trees planted quite near the verandah. On the sign-post was swung a board, upon which some rustic artist had painted a traveller on horseback arriving about twilight. Our garden was not highly ornamented, but was laid off in agreeable walks—and it bore tulips, pinks and sun-flowers; to which may be added a lonely holly tree, which produced vermilion berries, and stood not far from a spring in which my hostess kept her bottles of milk. My locality for a summer is before the reader; and it was a summer in which radiant suns and green forests conspired to make me happy.

My hostess was a shrewd, sensible widow, who had reached the degree of forty-seven and some minutes over, in the circle of her life. She was neither penny-wise nor pound-foolish; but kept in a happy medium—and by uniting generosity and frugality had prospered. She had added rood after rood to her little domain, and owed nothing either at home or abroad. Formerly she had kept school and taught a great many little urchins: but good humor had kept her from a free use of the birch.

"Did you ever read," said she, "the School Mistress, written by William Shenstone?"

"At least twenty times," I replied.

"That Poem," she rejoined, "first put me in the notion of teaching, and made me ambitious of being remembered by my pupils."

"Boys or girls?" said I.

"Both," she replied; "and some of my little girls have become respectable matrons."

"No doubt," I answered, "you have done good, and some one of your pupils may one day make you renowned. Milton's daughters, Bunyan's blind Mary, Sir Walter Scott's nurse, Byron's page, and Don Quixote's squire, are all safely lodged in the Temple of Fame."

The widow had picked up a good deal of historical knowledge; and I noticed that her information was remarkably minute. If, by way of example, she mentioned Cyrus, the Persian conqueror, she was sure to describe Babylon, the breadth of its walls, the height of its gates, and the structure of its hanging-gardens. And then her queen-like imagination would promenade in the parks of the Assyrian city and stop at mulberry trees and look up to the top of the fan leaf palm, or admire the gazelles. The same is true of the Egyptian Pyramids. She had conned over Rollin with vast attention: surprising woman to be keeping a rustic inn.

"My respected hostess," said I, "what induces you to keep a house of entertainment, when you possess such an abundance of goods and chattels?"

"That question," she replied, "has been often asked, and as often resolved."

"Resolve it then once more," I rejoined.

"Before beginning this way of life," she answered, "my feelings were selfish; but now they are expanded and cosmopolitan. Strangers call and we hear from the big world. The diversity enlivens attention, and occasionally it gives me power to perform an act of kindness to the way-faring man. It is my purpose to give you my best room, free of cost, provided you will keep my accounts, help me to open the mail, and promise to write something about this tavern before you die."

"Should my life be spared to the usual span," I replied, "and when the wheel of time shall have scattered a few sprigs of moss on its roof, it is my intention to scribble something about your inn."

June was now fully set in, and from its censer a multitude of tints were constantly falling. What could have been more transporting than the area which filled the vision! Though the prospect was somewhat bounded by the Ridge, the sight could reach in other directions over a valley that wore the aspect of an immense rural sea, which was green and shaded with blue. Meditation might slowly walk its waves, or fancy stretch her magnetic wires to undefined distance, and receive intelligence from a thousand round and green hills—from azure summits on which wild roses were burning in the sun—from clumps that looked like islands—from bands of reapers—from flocks and herds. The landscape pencil of Gainsborough or Morland's Rural Sketchbook, would have fallen away from the grasp of the master before such a prospect. No sentimentalist can help loving either the heaven or earth, which June always reveals in the valley of the Shenandoah.

The writer was much at his ease, in his slippers and rustic gown, and turning over Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, when his hostess inquired,

"What book?—what book?"

"'Tis Chaucer," I replied. "I am trying to pull a little bark from this old cinnamon tree. Let me tell you the plan of it;" and my hostess waited till she got a sight of Tabard Inn and its hostelrie and the caravan of Pilgrims.

"Where were the Pilgrims going?" she enquired.

"To Canterbury," I replied, "a city in Kent, seated on the river Stour, fifty-five miles from London. It held the shrine of Becket, a turbulent priest, who was killed in the twelfth century by four knights; and when Chaucer lived, superstition was rife both in Italy and England."

"And have you come here," said she, "to watch for Pilgrims?"

"Not exactly," I replied, "though doubtless many trudge along this road. As Schiller says in his Wilhelm Tell—

'Here goes the anxious Merchant and the light
Unarmed pilgrim—the pale, pious monk.
The gloomy robber—and the mirthful shewman—
The carrier with his heavy laden horse
Who comes from far-off lands'— and should a few such pass, it would please me to talk awhile with them about things in general."

"Fine crested carriages stop here at times," remarked my hostess; "and young ladies ride through the hot summer out to the cool springs."

"When such arrive," I replied, "do not call me. I cannot be an aristocrat: but send some one to tap at my door when people come along who look rather lowly."

There are times when my heart is visited with a feeling of philanthropy that amounts to a kind of passion. My philanthropy, however, does not take the turn of Howard's. He travelled the circumference of the globe; but my indolence prevents locomotion. To keep still and look out for the wayfaring man has been to me a source of happiness which I would not exchange for the imperial robe of the Cæsars. The writer is but one of eight hundred millions, who breathe a common atmosphere, and he would like, if possible, to hear each individual of the race tell his story. What an eventful volume would be the consequence! How many touching incidents—what changes of fortune, as it is called—what endless varieties—what a complex web, continually unravelled and unravelling by a celestial hand,—what myriad paths all slowly winding into a circle, from the centre of which the race must finally lift up one universal anthem to Divine benignity! By such reflections, I almost annihilated distance and space, and my imagination was wrought up to a kind of half-persuasion that some Eastern merchant might come along on his camel laden with spicery, or that some Arabian knight might dash up on his mettlesome steed. We longed to talk with Ledyard about tropical garlands—and with Sir Joseph Banks about bread fruit trees—and with Buffon about birds—and with the Autocrat of all the Russias about his Siberian exiles.

Our garden had a summer-house, somewhat larger than the one which Cowper has described, as an appendage to his domicile in Olney. It was covered with vines, which promised grapes, and with honeysuckle, which in the evening drew humming-birds. It was a pleasant retreat from the fervours of June. I was seated in it one morning, in a state of rumination, when my landlady called me from a window of the inn: and upon opening the garden gate, she told me that a stranger had arrived. Knowing myself to be master of ceremonies, I lost no time in repairing to the apartment in which the person was seated.

"My name is Emmons," he remarked, upon my entering, "from Rutland in Vermont."

"Is not that town," I answered, "on Otter Creek, and does not the scenery remind one of Catmose vale in Rutlandshire, England?"

"Not knowing, I cannot say," he replied, "as to the last part of your question; but the green hue of our spruce and pine mountains contrasts well with the blue edging that hangs off from your Virginia summits."

"And do you like azure better than emerald?" I asked, "that you should have perigrinated to a place where prejudice is indulged against New Englanders."

"I did not know," he rejoined, "that prejudice would be felt anywhere against a teacher of music, f that's my vocation."

"That is," I continued, "you wish to get a singing-school in this neighborhood. If so, you must follow my counsel, which is to see Pastor Morrison, who lives several miles off, and who is a most amiable man and a Shepherd-king among his people. You will find him in his harvest field—for he owns a fine farm—though not quite so highly ornamented as Woburn farm near Weybridge in the Shire of Surry." At that, I took out my pencil and wrote him a line of introduction, and he started with all that promptness characteristic of Northeastern people.

I cannot account for it, but it is so, that I never could understand what is called Music by note, and yet I am quite sensitive to musical sounds. Without even an ear for harmony, Dr. Johnson entertained high respect for Burney, though he rowed Piozzi up Salt river. Nothing fires my imagination quicker than to read of a Scotch piper or a minstrel reaching baronial halls of a cold wintry night. What powerful use has McKenzie made of those simple airs, which diversify Alpine life and the sounds, which call in goats from their clamberings. Byron drew concord from the pines and rocks of the Jungfrau. But the writer, a few mornings after the call of the Vermonter, forgot all artificial music, and all made by men and women in the rare melody of the birds. The concert was better than a thousand German flutes, combined with the great Hærlém organ. I do not know that I would have turned my heel on the green sward to have heard Handel, or Mozart, or a full choir of Italian exquisites. It came from the oaks which fronted the Inn. My kind hostess had loaned me some fishing-tackle and I had struck the path which led through the grove to the banks of Mossy creek. The rim of the creek was alive with beams, and the water looked as if held in a vase of gold, and the birds were absolutely frantic, dashing from limb to limb, and all their mouths were open at one and the same time. My red cork was immediately drowned, when turning, a perch happened on the hook: but I permitted it to escape back to its appropriate element. Brief was the time spent in angling, for my attention was drawn to a youth seemingly about twenty-three, who was approaching me through the spaces which divided between the oaks.

"A charming day," he remarked. "One finer never spent its rays on the Valley of Wyoming."

"And what," I replied, "brought you so far West from a valley celebrated by the Muse of Campbell, and where there are better cascades than any which fall from the Persian mountains?"

"There is a power," he rejoined, "in the eye of the imagination of being satiated united with an insatiableness perfectly ravenous. You might blindfold me and I could still cross every brook or bridge and climb every hill and mountain in the Pennsylvania valley. My boyish blood has been cooled scores of times in its grottoes."

"Wyoming," I observed, "needs no commendation. Come, let's go back to the inn," and, as he proceeded, he gave me some particulars of himself quite interesting, and not long after noon we sat down to a repast, which, from its simplicity, was pleasing to my guest." Would you not like," said I, "to hear some musician at play in the distance?"

"Not half so well," he replied, "as to hear the warbling of those forest birds."

"Then you are an Ornithologist."

"A piece of one," he remarked, "and it is my ambition to get on the trail of Audubon: but he is at present abroad."

"The best way then," said I, "to catch him, is to cross the water."

"Not at all," he observed, "for by that time he will be back in Louisiana. He shoots to and fro like some impassioned bird, and he bills and coos at every thing in the shape of a tree. His stay in Scotland will be short, for he can soon tap all its firs, and as to the clumps of England, what are they but pigeon boxes compared to the bird saloons of our wilderness?"

"It is my wish," said I, "that you may find him at home, if he have a home: but Ornithology seems to insert a multitude of plumes into a man's scallop without lining his pocket."

"The pocket," rejoined my guest, "who cares for the pocket when a man leads a single life. Can he not sleep on the ground, or in the hollow of a tree and drink the mountain brook and feed on the wild berry or the plum?"

"But then," said I, "bird-killing is something not to my taste."

"Nor to mine," he replied; "it is my habit to take along with me traps and nets, and upon netting the beautiful creatures, to let them go after an examination had scientifically."

"You are then," I rejoined, "the man to please me, for we do not want the blessed birds diminished. We wish Heaven had made millions in addition to those that now cleave the air and that swarm in the woods. I do not doubt that you will couple your name with that of Cuvier, or Buffon, or any other renowned lover of natural science."

"That would be a high distinction, indeed, to the name of Mifflin: but my only ambition after immense explorations is to return into Wyoming, my native valley, and spend the residuum of life and then let its birds sing my requiem."

"You have been," I rejoined, "at the old Swedish Church in Philadelphia."

"I made an express pilgrimage to it," he observed, "for the express purpose of paying my express homage to the tomb of Wilson, the founder of American ornithology."

At that he rose and brought me a sketch of the church, the tomb and the premises, which he had taken, and also some specimens of birds neatly executed. My feelings were much interested for this apparently ingenious youth, and next morning, notwithstanding his fondness for bills, my influence prevailed with my landlady to shorten his even to annihilation. But my hostess made herself quite merry at my expense, when he turned out a Yankee, who had played off on my romance.

"Do not laugh," said I, "for every impostor is to be pitied."

"But," said she, "you must be more cautious another time and study human nature, and keep an especial look out on the Yankees."

"But New England," I rejoined, "is a part of our country, and has given us poets, statesmen and heroes."

My mortification was extreme at having been outwitted. I had almost resolved upon becoming moody to any other pedestrian who might seek my acquaintance or my good offices. In fact, I permitted several to pass and maintained a dogged silence. There was no want of rustic objects to engage my attention. The sweet brier was climbing to the roof of the inn—the Kentucky rose was in bloom and the summer house was arrayed in blossoms, and, in the distance, reapers were effectively wielding the sickle. My mind fell quite into a reverie about Rousseau's theory of savage and civilized life. Civilized man is often duped, but then stratagem and duplicity prevail among Indians, and thieves are plenty as blackberries in the Pagan islands. Captain Cook lost his life in consequence of a theft, and Mungo Park was probably put to death by savages. Sustained by a number of such facts my love of man began to return, and my landlady was delighted to see the mists disperse which had been hovering over her guest for several days.

"It has struck me," said she, "that you never get the blues when you scribble."

"Never," I replied. "The friends of Cowper set him at his translation of Homer whenever he became sombre: but it would have been better, methinks, to have put him at writing another John Gilpin."

"John Gilpin," she answered, "is not that in Scott's Leasons? I used to make my little pupils say it by heart. And was that written by a hypocondriac? If so he must at times have been right merry."

"He was at times," I replied, "but his sadness outweighed that gossamer kind of spirits to which he was an occasional heir. Poor man! He had his enjoyments in the moist atmosphere of England. He loved hares so well that he hated hounds."

"But Scott's Lessons," continued she, "had the Country Ale House and an account of the Rustic Preacher by Goldsmith. He must have got his name from being a smith who worked in gold and not in iron. His preacher always put me in mind of pastor Morrison, who says you must call at the manse when you ride by his farm. Mercy on us, mercy on us," she exclaimed, and then flew off like a ruffled bird.

This interview had happened in a dim twilight, and, on turning round, what was my astonishment, to see nineteen Indians filing up the porch of the inn. They looked tall and strapping, and, with their rings, tomahawks and red blankets, presented a frightful aspect.

"Is this the Forest Inn?" said a man who seemed to act as interpreter.

"'Tis so called," I observed.

"My Indians," he rejoined, "have had a long stretch to day."

"No doubt," I replied, "you might be accommodated here, but the landlady is excessively alarmed."

"Alarmed indeed," he remarked, "she might as well be alarmed at nineteen spring lambs, or at as many Lilliputians."

"Permit me then," I rejoined, "to see our hostess."

At that I took myself off to where she lay in a kind of hysterical spasm. Her domestics were fanning her and her heart was beating audibly.

"What puts you," said I, "into this disshevelled state?"

"Drive 'em away," she replied, "drive off those monsters."

"'Tis impossible," said I, "they are too strong, though the interpreter says they are Lilliputians."

"Lilliputians," said my hostess, "I read the account of those Tom Thumbs when a little girl and could have whipped 'em by the hundred, but these seven feet men—"

"They are," said I, "but six and a half. Consider, uncle Sam pays for interpreter and all, and the interpreter makes twenty."

"Your words," said she, "fall like dew on the agitated wing of a dove, and it may be well for me to carry an olive leaf among the horrid creatures: but I'll not smoke their pipes."

At this it gave me pleasure to lead in the lady, who had surmounted somewhat, though not entirely, the agitation into which she had been thrown.

"Friend Anderson," said I to the interpreter, "this is our hostess, and she begs that you'll present her good will to those children of the forest. She will have a repast made ready as soon as practicable."

The interpreter expressed his thanks, and in a few minutes every thing was alive in the kitchen. Much of our happiness results from looking in upon culinary scenes, and to Cowper, the steam of the kettle must have given exquisite gratification. It has to the writer a thousand times, though he does not pretend to be more than one fourth, or, if the reader please, one twentieth of a poet.

I do not know why our race has been broken up into tribes and clans. This is a secret which Heaven keeps among its own archives. But it is a mystery still greater, why different clans should go to war. A man marches from among the thistles of Scotland, and another from among the vines of France, who never looked at each other before, and at the signal for battle, begin to shed each other's blood and then stop and make friends. What consummate folly! Oh love of country! What iniquities have been enacted in thy name. This whole planet is my country, and so would Jupiter be, had my destiny been fixed in that orb. Let me never forget that the Moor, the Arab, the Jew and the Indian are members of the human family. Such were my brief reflections in beholding the pedestrians who had just arrived at our inn. Each of them was like myself in this, that he had two eyes, and though they looked tawny and had disfigured themselves, they were noble in stature.

"Our repast is set," said I to the interpreter, and he sounded something like a Chinese gong, when they all came round the table and cast up a look towards the Great Spirit, who feeds the wildman caught in the forests of Germany, as well as the Prince of Wales or the Dauphin of France. My attention was profoundly fixed, and my silence arose partly from the taciturnity of the company. The Indians seemed to place implicit reliance on their interpreter, and some of them laughed when he pointed them to any thing in the repast that was especially palatable. When they rose, I observed to the interpreter, "your wild men do not speak our language."

"If you wish," rejoined he, "you can use me as the channel of communication."

"It would please me then to take a smoke with the chief," said I.

"As to that," he replied, "you can smoke with them all. They love to exchange the wampum belt and send up the curl from the pipe of peace."

In making arrangements to lodge such a caravan of guests we were soon driven to the porch, on which the moon was pouring out the richest rays that ever danced in her round saloon. A lone whippoorwill was singing, though that bird is very rare on the West of the Ridge. The Indians had been stalking about and looking suspiciously at every thing, until, by our pipes, they were brought like myself into a state of delicious repose. We looked like a company of Dutchmen on Manhattan island, except that, in the light of the moon, the Indian peculiarities were so distinct. The lunar rays shed alternate gleams on their bracelets, their beaded sandals and the fantastic knots into which the hair on their heads was cut.

"To what tribe," said I to the interpreter, "do these Indians belong, for they are stouter than usual?"

"To the Osage nation," he replied, "and we chose the tallest, as we had business with Uncle Sam."

"When a boy," I remarked, "I remember reading of that tribe or nation in the explorations of Lewis and Clarke, but Prairies and Prairie dogs were the sum and substance of their journals. Still my imagination was fed on the large desert flowers which skirted the Missouri, and on the honey extracted by the Prairie bees. But these Indians are well dressed."

"True," he rejoined, "Uncle Sam has bled rather freely of late, after making them bleed at every pore."

"Glad to hear that," I replied, "for the Indians once owned this Shenandoah valley, now burdened with crops of wheat and flowers that more than rival the roses which spring on the island of Rhodes, and where the birds sing more sweetly than the colibri of Brazil. But at present they own not an inch of this rural sea, on whose margin their sires culled wampum shells, and from whose chrystal caves they pulled the spar and bead. But," continued I, "are these Indians all of the same rank?"

"The one," he replied, "who sits there is a chief, and the one next him is the prophet. They are both men of influence."

The interpreter gave me a mass of information about the Indian country, and the next morning, after shooting at a few pieces of silver which were set up as targets, they filed off by a short cut through the woods. In the name of the chief the interpreter gave me a calumet, which had a large bowl, and he also gave me a wampum belt, for which my thanks were conveyed in the following lines from Gertrude of Wyoming;

Peace be to thee; my words this belt approve,
The paths of peace my steps have always led.

Our hostess had peeped at the shocking creatures, as she called them, and she seemed glad enough when they had gone.

"How far off," said she, "will they get to-day?"

"I do not know," said I, "but they will take a long tramp before night-fall."

"I did not sleep a wink," she remarked, "the whole night; and if but a mouse moved, it made me tremble from head to foot."

"Really," answered I, "your nerves are too feeble to keep an inn. Your philanthropy does not seem to bear you out. You must expect such things,

For at this wayside lodge the angler calls,
The rambling sportsman, and the travelling Jew,
And Indians sleep within these rustic walls,
Whilst Blue Ridge flowers drink in the nightly dew."

"But," said she, "your taste is so singular. You make up to every body that comes here, whether Jew, or Greek, or Turk, and yet you never go near pastor Morrison, who is a christian man."

"Has the pastor complained," inquired I, "of any want of attention on my part?"

"He complains heavily," she replied, "that you do not spend a night at the manse. He raises his daughters not to dance and reel: but to enlarge their minds and improve their taste. A five minutes talk with Norah Morrison is worth a long talk with those horrid beasts of prey, in whom you took such vast delight."

"A stop," said I, "shall soon be put to the complaints of the pastor, for it is my intention in the morning to ride over to the manse."

At this my landlady was pleased, and she promised to meet me at the kirk the day after, when we would return in company. Accordingly, the writer set out next day and ambled over the intervening space to the abode of a man highly revered by his flock.

"What a fine country," we involuntarily exclaimed on riding up to the gate of the manse. What mountains visible too from the door of the parsonage!—a wide, open, panoramic view with which the eye of the imagination played in protracted dalliance. The eye seemed to caress the prospect and the prospect returned the fondness, and this billing and cooing went on till night closed the panorama.

"Are you fond of books?" said Norah Morrison, and she seemed disposed to fall into easy conversation.

"I did not come here," said I, "to study books, but to think."

"We were in hopes," she rejoined, "that you had come among us to take off the tameness of our mountain scenery by pen or pencil."

"You cannot mean," said I, "to detract from this glorious manifestation of themselves, made by your mountains, by calling them ame."

"My meaning is," she replied, "that description would augment by association this lovely vale not surpassed by any in Italy, but then it looks drowsy because no Raffaelle has ever collected its lights and colors, and no poet comes at the head of the pilgrims who pass through it in caravans,

When summer, with a matron grace,
Retreats to cool and woodland shades."

"But," rejoined I, "my powers with the pencil are very circumscribed, and as to poetry, my hopes of being a poet are extremely dim."

"Poetry," said she, "however it may be decried, adds much to our enjoyments. It has created a sea equal to the circumference of the world. One it seems to me would like to dash about this sea forever, using the imagination for a skiff, and looking down to its mosaic grottoes, or upward to those orbs which turn over and over again in its heavenly vaults."

"But its islands," I remarked. "Would you not like to visit its islands?"

"By all means," she replied, "for they are so green, or rather they are evergreens which have risen, and new ones are still rising on the face of that sea. How many old abbeys, castles and chateaux may be found even in one voyage to the English, Scotch, or Swiss, or Italian parts of this immense ocean."

"You talk," said I, "very much like an ornithologist who called at our inn some weeks ago."

"We heard of him," said she, "and could not help laughing immoderately at the success of the Yankee, in palming himself off as a lover of that science which drew forth such constant and brilliant eloquence from Buffon, and which has quickened into a pedestrian race the footsteps of Wilson, and which has spread out ten thousand silver, and purple, and orange wings to the ever-moving pencil of Audubon."

By this time I began to think that the commendation which my hostess had bestowed on the talk of Norah Morrison was not extravagant. She was about twenty-two, and had a very open and benevolent expression of countenance. She had never seen a city, but yet her manners were soft, and prepossessing, and sprightly. Our talk, however, was interrupted by the entrance of the pastor and of my friend Emmons.

"Did you succeed," said I to the latter, "in getting a school?"

"Several," he replied, "and my thanks are due for that introductory note you gave me to pastor Morrison. It is my purpose, too, in four weeks to hold a concert at the Forest Inn."

"Would it not suit better at the church?" enquired the pastor.

"It would not," answered the New Englander. "The building is too large, and the roof too high for the lark-like voices which are to take part in the concert."

"Be it just as you please," answered the pastor, who was a man remarkably mild. He carried below its brow a soft blue eye, and he was very lowly and unpretending in his demeanor. He had not even a touch of self-complacency, and the next morning he mounted not a showy horse and rode off with us to his church. The church was like those which prevail in the valley. It was large and commodious, and filled to overflowing. Horses in great numbers were tied in the woods. Some were grey and others sorrel, chesnut and mouse-colored. Among the arrivals we noticed that of my landlady, who rode up to a block, and the writer, after helping her off, fastened her steed to the bough of an oak. Just then we heard the sound of music in the church, and our pastor, after going through the preliminary services, delivered a discourse which would have done honor to Fenelon, the bishop of Clermont. His eloquence was mild and persuasive. It put me in mind of the town called Scarborough, in the shire of York, which is built on an elevation, and the hill is overspread by a green plain, and in the centre is a well covered with velvet moss, from which the thirsty inhabitants are supplied. To his flock the mouth of pastor Morrison was at least a kind of oriental well, and after church he asked me to return with him, but my obligations to my hostess were paramount. It turned out a quiet Sabbath evening, and never had our Inn a more pleasant look among the larkspurs and sun flowers which were set out on its premises.

Our little establishment, for several days, assumed an air of unusual tranquillity. The writer was left in full command of his time. Scarcely a team enlivened the road, several of which slowly passed along every day; the horses ornamented with jingling bells and red winkers. In the mean time the attentions of my hostess were redoubled to make me comfortable. The cherry season had passed away, but we had peaches in abundance and apricots of delicious flavor. The weather had become extremely hot, and cool buttermilk was a beverage quite grateful. Much of my time was spent in the summer-house. It was pleasant to hide one's self beneath its crowded leaves among the fierce heats of July.

"Pilgrimage," said I, to our hostess, "seems to slacken."

"It is something," she said, "like a brook—that dries up in very hot weather; but after awhile its murmur will recommence."

"The dust," said I, "is enough to blind man and horse and prevent intercourse."

"But there is a cloud rising," observed my landlady—and sure enough, upon examining the horizon, we found every indication of a rain.

It proved to be a lavish one for the time it lasted. It refreshed every thing, and when passed, the sun rolled over the valley a bow of uncommon tints; and it made me think of Tom Campbell's lines to that superb arch which so often adorns the sky. But the coolness, as contrasted with the previous heat, was superb. All the woods seemed to unlock delightful grottoes, and the birds escaped from their nests to the glades, and the melody lasted till evening led in its pioneer star. After enjoying the night till a reasonable hour, I was about retiring, when three arrivals put a temporary stop to my purpose. They were disposed of in the best way possible, considering the time at which they had come. The morning revealed their faces: but they appeared to be more concerned about business and money, than about holding colloquies.

"Friend Clemmons," said I, "you seem to be somewhat fidgety. What's your will?"

"My will is, he replied," "to sell a Map of the World, and one of the United States, and an engraved plate of all our Presidents."

"Let us look at your goods."

At that, he unrolled several finely-colored maps.

"My purse," said I, "is extremely low, but our hostess is a friend to learning, and a first-rate geographer, and your articles are worth what you ask—that is, ten dollars for the large map, and two dollars and fifty cents for the smaller, and thirty-seven-and-a-half cents for the heads of our rulers. They will make pretty and useful ornaments for our inn. Let your charges always be fair, for Cowper says in his Tyrocinium,

'Truth is not local—God alike pervades
The world of traffic and the quiet shades.'

But just at that moment, our landlady made her appearance.

"You must," said I, "shell out twelve dollars and eighty-seven-and-a-half cents for these chat-tels. Examine them, for they are worth the money. The vender is in a hurry," and at that, she went to her drawer and produced the silver.

"And now, friend Pritchett, let us hear something from you."

"My vocation," said he, "is to lecture on Modern Astronomy, and to show off birds and animals by the Magic Lantern."

"It is my opinion," said I, "that you had better go on to Buchanan, or Fincastle, where there are men of science. This inn is so lonely. The blacksmith might come in, or a dairy-maid, or a harvestee—but each of them would be bewildered among planets and constellations and comets, though doubtless the dairy-maid would be a good deal interested in the Milky Way."

"I bow," said the astronomer, "to your superior judgment; but will thank you for a note to the next town."

"That shall be freely given," I replied, "for it is the duty of all to help on a man of expanded intellect; and especially where all his views are celestial."

"And now, friend Levon, we must attend to your claims."

"A chest of curiosities," he observed.

"For the sight of which you wish to be paid. Nature has marked you for a Jew: but from your partaking with us in our meal, we doubt not that you have been engrafted into the stock of Christianity. Where were you born?"

"In Poland," he replied.

"And where did you become a Christian?"

"In England," he rejoined.

"And of what is this curiosity-shop composed?"

"Some pebbles," he replied, "from the brook Kedron—a bottle of water from the Jordan—some leaves from the Mount of Olives—some spars from Mount Tab—some sprigs from the plain of Sharon—and sundry other things too numerous to be mentioned."

"Credat Judæus," said I. "Are they genuine, for much money has been made out of the relics of Palestine. If I thought so, I should esteem a guinea but a small compensation for the sight."

"You are quite skeptical," he remarked, "but these things were collected by my own hand. My feet have stood in the dust of Jerusalem, and on the margin of Gennesareth, and among the crags of Olivet, and on the summit of Tabor. This eye has roved over the fallen glories of the land that once flowed with milk and honey, and watched the smoke that curled from the pipes of turbaned Turks."

"Enough," said I; "let others call your people dogs, usurers, Shylocks; but such a sin shall not be laid to my charge. Unlock your chest:" and my hostess, and her domestics, and a few neighbors came in to see; after which the three pilgrims went on their way.

We needed now several more passers-by to swell our coterie to the same number that assembled in Southwark, and among whom Chaucer employed his comic pencil. For this reason the writer was disconcerted to see our next traveller arriving alone. He was far as possible from being communicative, for he either was, or pretended to be dumb. There was no ingenuity by which we could extort from him even a word.

"Have you no tongue?" said I to the man; but he looked with a vacant stare. We immediately supposed that his taciturnity resulted from want of acquaintance with our language, and we tried various expedients with him to ascertain whether this were the fact. There was a copy of Petrarch's Sonnets at the inn, and as he seemed to be an Italian, we showed them to him, supposing he would utter articulate sounds in that melodious language. But he maintained a dogged silence. Finding my patience exhausted, he drew from his pocket an old, worn-out paper, being a printed certificate that the individual had once lived near the ruins of Herculaneum and Pompeii, and that his cottage had been overwhelmed by a late commotion in Mount Vesuvius, and of course that he was an object of charity. This great travelling story was palpably false, and we immediately denounced him as an impostor.

"I am glad," said my landlady, "to find you so knowing."

"But," said I to the man, "it is my wish to talk about Naples, Mount Pausilippo, the tomb of Virgil, and the ruins of those cities overwhelmed in the year 79. I will agree to give you all the silver contained in the circumference of this dollar. Birds that can sing and won't sing, must be made to sing." Still this Italian stranger refused to talk. My dollar was then returned to my purse and he beckoned to go; but all of a sudden, he fell into quite an agreeable garrulity and answered all my inquiries.

After this he decamped, and had the telegraph been invented at that time, it would have been very well to have published him along the line of his travels as a dumb man, whom six Virginia shillings could make loquacious.

But my apprehensions were at this time quite excited by the fact that my hostess insisted that she had heard the Banshee, or some cry that betokened her death.

"Are you of Irish extraction?" I remarked.

"Not at all," she replied; "but much of this valley was settled by the Scotch Irish, and they proselyted me to their creed even in my girlhood. Our dogs have been whining for several nights."

Upon reflection, however, this piece of superstition gave me no concern, till one day a covered cart, drawn by a poor tottering horse, drove up to the door of the inn. The horse was glad enough to stop, for he was fairly staggering under his burden. The crazy vehicle was owned by a poor man and his wife, who begged our help to lift from the cart a feverish daughter about, as they said, eleven years of age.

"Whither were you going?" said I to the man.

"Any where," he answered, "to escape starvation. The oil of whales, or stunted roots, would be sweet. My hut took fire, and this cart is my all."

By this time we had lifted out the child.

"Oh lay me down," she said, "where I can give thanks and die."

"Poor child," thought I, "it would please me to heal you;" but my emotions were far too deep for utterance.

My landlady was weeping bitterly. "The child," said she, "is dying. Send for Pastor Morrison."

"Would he come?" I enquired.

"He would in a moment," she replied. "He lives in obscurity, but he can tell by intuition whenever there is a cloud over a house, just as a blind man, like Professor Sanderson, who could tell by touching the ground."

"And of what service can he be to the child?"

"Service," said she; "he has rolled the Star of Bethlehem into a thousand clouds."

My sensibility was now all alive, and in about an hour and twenty minutes, Pastor Morrison alighted at the inn. He was much affected when he entered and saw that the child was dying.

"My dear little child," he said, as he felt her pulse, "I was just reading an account, when called to you, of a medicinal spring discovered in a gold mine. Religion then, like the gold, can make you rich, and like the spring, it can heal you to enter into the bloom of Heaven."

"It is mine, already," replied the child, as she opened her blue eyes above her cheeks, which were feverish and red as the French rose. "Good minister," she continued, "I want to be baptized."

"Pastor Morrison," said I, "a Christian Jew passed here some weeks ago, who, as a great favour, gave me a vial full of genuine water from the river of Jordan."

"Let it be brought out then," said the pastor. And he used it in the celebration of the rite, and soon after her body went into a sleep as sound as death and her spirit into Paradise. We buried her at the foot of the garden, and her bereaved parents passed on to the West, but not till Pastor Morrison's influence had filled the old man's cart and put a new horse into gear for his use.

In beginning this paper, it was my intention to give some account of the concert held at our inn, by the Vermonter mentioned at its opening. But a recurrence to the demise of that little child has made me sad. The concert happened but a few days before my leaving, towards the close of the summer, and went off very well. Norah Morrison was at it, and outsang all the rest. The mugs on the mantel-piece were all filled with pinks and hyacinths. Soon after it was enacted, my intention of leaving was communicated to my kind hostess.

"Can't you stay? Must you go?" she enquired.

"Certainly must," I replied. "The great world calls me, and though I expect to act in it but a small part, that small part must be acted. We have talked with travellers; but it's time for me to become a homeward pedestrian. Accept my best thanks, and my souvenirs will always return to your quiet home when summer is uttering its deep and loud voices."

"Adieu, then," she said. "Adieu—but come again."

"I will," was my reply, "si vita supersit."

And now, in the words of Sir Walter Raleigh—

"Give me my scallop shell of quiet,
My staff of truth to walk upon—
My scrip of joy—immortal diet—
My bottle of salvation.
My hope of glory—Hope's true gage,
And thus I take my Pilgrimage."

SPIRIT OF SLEEP.

BY MRS. E. J. EAMES.

Oh gentle sleep, Nature's soft nurse;—
How have I frighted thee, that thou no more
Wilt steep my senses in forgetfulness?

Shakespeare.

I.

Spirit that hidest 'neath thy brooding wing
The many-million woes and cares that spring
In man's harsh path by day,—
Thou who dost fold Earth's tired ones to thy breast,
And on their heavy eyelids softly rest,
Chasing their cares away:—
Thou whose sweet ministry o'er the silent world
Is felt—where'er thy pinion is unfurled,
Oh! unseen spirit! say,
By what enchanted spell—what magic sign
I, too, may hope to make thy blessings mine?—

II.

Spirit of universal Nature's rest—
Refresher of the frame by toil opprest,—
Or lingering illness bow'd.
Sweet influence that is ever, ever woo'd
Both for the restless mind, and languid mood,
For the hopes and fears that crowd
Into our little life, and through the day
Prompt us to rise, or struggle as we may,—
How shall the weary-bow'd
And weary-hearted win thy bland caress,
O, then! that hast such holy power to bless?

III.

Spirit! I seek thee in the solemn night—
Through the long watches, till the morning light,
I seek thee, but in vain!
The clear calm stars and moonbeams on me shine,
They bring no calmness to this heart of mine—
No quiet to this brain;
But pale and anxious, by sad thoughts opprest,
I turn and toss, 'till morn (O! welcome guest),
Bringeth the light again:
And then, once more I close my drooping lids,
But memory still thy soothing reign forbids!

IV.

Spirit invoked, oh! vainly: thou hast not
The power to chase the shadows from my lot;
The gift is not with thee!
But one, who hath been called thine elder-brother,
Who soon or late all human woe doth smother—
Will be more kind to me.
He will not scorn this sinking heart's appeal—
Which hath no sorrow but his touch can heal
Most sure and lastingly.
Spirit! no more thy presence I compel,
But turn beneath his shadowy wing to dwell!

THE NEW PYTHAGOREAN.

CHAPTER SECOND.

It would be a rich fruit indeed of spells and enchantments, a noble crown of mystical lore, could we call up the men of the olden time, whose spirits should give us living light upon the grand old cities, their arts, their poetry, their every-day thoughts and ways of life. Could we evoke, for instance, some man who had lived at Athens in her grandest days, who should appear not awaking from three and twenty centuries of dreamless slumber, but knowing the present, remembering the past, and bearing in his one spirit the scenes, and events, and thoughts, which man evolved in the intervening years, it would be truly a glorious shade. The real shades of the men of Athens, like those of other men, have entered into that immortality not of earth, of which their half-inspired Plato dreamed. But there is also an earthly immortality of which men speak, not altogether in a figure; and shades which, whether in fact or in figure, inhabit those earthly immortalities. And even here, "farther west than his sires' islands of the Blest," such an one may not disrespectfully be invited to give us at least the shadow of light upon things of old.

"I come. You shall hear me if you will hear. Let your spirit fly far backwards in the long journey of the marching years. Of a distant age, of times when a different light lay on the spirit of man from that which I now see upon it, and of a distant land, you shall hear if you will hear. At Athens I was Theophaustus. My birth was in Lesbos, the land of Sappho. I first saw Athens just after the day of Mantinea, when Epaminondas fell in the greatest glory of all the Greeks. The Athenian warriors had fought against the Theban that day; but the Theban had beaten the Spartan wing, not the Athenian wing; and as the news of the fight spread in the marble city, its mercurial men highly extolled the great dead Theban as comparable even to their own Pericles, inquired briefly of the battle, gave a few words of pity and regret to their own dead who had fallen there, and rushed to a drama of Euripides' at the theatre. Pericles had been dead nearly seventy years. Since he was taken away, the disastrous close of the Peloponnesian war, the reign of the Thirty, and the liberation by Thrasylbulus had come and gone. Iphicrates and Chabrias were the leaders of the State in its new freedom; but they were not sons, hardly were they effigies, of Pericles. Had you compared them to him in the Agora, some aged man with his braided hair surmounted by the Golden Cicada, mingling in his tones, sadness, reproof and a sense of triumph in the old times, would have shown you Pericles in the field; would have told you how the eloquence of Pericles inspired thoughts so lofty and heroic, that the people called it Olympian, and said it thundered; would have described to you the scene when the throneless and now childless old statesman came one day into the Pnyx into the public Assembly, where the fickle Demos had a little while before fined him fifty talents; how the crowd saluted him with deeper reverence than ever, and sobs of contrition burst from the whole Assembly; how they all earnestly entreated his forgiveness, and by one sweeping vote re-invested him with all authority in the State. 'That,' he would have said, 'was indeed a man.' Zeuxis and Parrhasius were men when Pericles was a boy. Phidias, the sculptor, was near the same age as his great patron, and died less than one Olympiad before him. And of about the same age was also Ictinus, the architect of the Parthenon. I myself, in the latter years of my life, saw Praxiteles, who came from Italy and wrought in Parian marble instead of the Pentelican which had been chiefly used before. These were the men of Athens of that grand day, which was just before my day, in the arts which shed glory upon outward life. I saw their works about the city—the canvass of Zeuxis and the marble of Praxiteles at the portico of the Poecile, which caused one to feel on entering and looking around, as if he had entered Jove's richest hall on Olympus, and found a conclave of the brightest gods and goddesses sitting together consulting or enjoying in their tranquil blessedness—the Propylea with the widely beautiful temples on its wings—the statue of Minerva Promachos within the enclosure of the Acropolis, lifting her tall crest and spear-point so high as to be visible to sailors at sea farther off than Sunium—and to crown all the works of glory, as it crowned the Acropolis, there stood the Parthenon itself, and within it the gold-and-ivory statue of Minerva by Phidias. There was a robe of beauty about these things, a seeming life and meaning and language which spoke to the soul as you gazed, and most clearly to the highest soul, which nothing but the sudden breaking out of a vernal sunbeam on an Attic landscape could illustrate. It was a city then in which an hour's walk in the common haunts of the citizens, sent dreams of ideal loveliness into the soul fairer than men of all other ages and climes have since attained to form or to conceive.

"Such beauty in the outer world singing its daily song to the eye and to the imagination,—almost indeed singing to the ear—was sure to breed its kindred things in the inner world of man. It is true, indeed, that Æschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, Aristophanes, had all passed away. But though dead, yet they were still speaking to the Athenians in the theatre. And by feeding the spirits of men with the intellectual beauties they were prepared to taste, the tragedies were preparing them, by the mystic and prophetic strains of the choruses, for higher things yet to come. From such a cradle, in such an age, PLATO came; and none less than Plato would have been a worthy offspring. I, a school-boy, was sent from Lesbos to be his pupil; and I saw him first seated in the grove of the Academy, venerable with more than sixty years of age, surrounded by a crowd of the young nobles of all Greece, modestly professing to teach them merely the philosophy of the murdered Socrates, yet bearing away his auditors, their heads inclining to him and their countenances lighted with rapture, in the flights of a genius which all felt to be of far more nervous wing, and higher soaring and keener eye than that of Socrates. Some years after my coming, there came also, one day, from the city of Stagyræ to school there, young ARISTOTLE, a gentleman of the most accomplished manners, scrupulously elegant in his dress, contrary to the maxims of the first Academy, and of a sort of inexorable justness of thought, which led him often to scruple at the loftier visions of the poet-sage. This finally made his house a rallying point to those members of the Academy in whose minds the rational and reflective understanding was stronger than the poetic faculty; and was the nucleus of the school on the other side of the city in the grove of the Lyceum:—but not until after the death of Plato. For twenty years Aristotle lived with his master, beloved by him, and by him called "the mind of the school." I became a member of that school in the Lyceum called Peripatetic; and finally succeeded Aristotle as its head. From this new location, between the city walls and Mount Hymettus, on the South-eastern side of the city, being not far from the theatre of Bacchus, we could hear every night the plaudits of the people, and the soft wild chorus of flutes, causing us to feel that Athens was learning rapidly to speak to the ear in music, and clothe in sound the mystic joy, and love, and aspiration of mortal life, as she had before spoken to the eye and the imagination, and the reason, by sculpture, and poetry, and philosophy. Then it seemed to us that the beam of light was perfect, having all its prismatic rays, and was pure and clear white. But it was not yet so; there was yet another earthly ray to be added; another yet different from that beam from the Higher God which was to shine on another city, far eastward of Athens, and which Plato foresaw and longed to see with open vision, and which he said some greater Socrates, descending from a city above, even higher than that of the Olympian deities, was to visit the earth to bring down.* There was yet another ray to come beside that. A young orator whom I had known a short while as a senior school-fellow at the Academy was the next year hissed from the Bema of Athens. For some years he had been lost from public sight. Few cared to inquire what had become of him. Of those who spoke of him at all, some said he was taking private lessons from an actor who professed to see a jewel in him; and others that he was living in a cave by the sea-shore, declaiming in greater anger to the angry waves. But suddenly one day there came a tremendous shout from the Public Assembly. It was the day on which the repeal of Leptines' law came up for discussion. This man, making an invidious distinction in favor of the descendants of Harmodius and Aristogiton, had proposed and carried a heavy tax on every other citizen of Athens. Young Demosthenes had reappeared that day; and seizing on the occasion which gave full scope to his favorite passion, as well as the favorite passion of his audience, the pride of Athenian glory, he overwhelmed Leptines in an oration "on the Immunities of Athenian citizens." With such an orator as he proved himself to be on this and on other occasions, when even the schools of philosophy went to hear him, not excepting the snarlers of the Cynosarges themselves, we felt that the beam of the intellectual light of Athens was complete.

"Yet fair as was that shining city, it is not the mere preception of its wonders which chiefly returns to me now of the reminiscences of that Athenian life of mine. Although I have stood in the Propylea when some grand procession of citizens of all classes and ranks, clad in mystic or triumphal dress in honor of Minerva, was about to pass through, and seeing the bronze valves of the five gates fly suddenly open, have felt the force of the exultation of Aristophanes:

'Shout, shout aloud of the view which appears of the old time-honored Athenae,
Wondrous in sight and famous in song where the noble
Demos abideth,'

when the grandeur of the Parthenon burst upon my view;—although from one of the hills of Hymettus, I have looked upon the city in distant view, on a fair day, when it seemed as if a bevy of the Spirits of the Blest had descended to nestle and abide there;—although I have gazed and wondered for hours at the Poecile and in other porticoes of the artists;—although in listening to legends of Pericles or in hearing an oration of Demosthenes, I have had visions of civil grandeur brought before me of great magnificence; even although I have gone along with some chorus of Euripides in the theatre, or some rhapsody of Plato in the grove, to the highest reach of their searing powers of invention, yet it is the response to these things in the depths of my own soul which now arises to my view rather than the bare memory of the things themselves. The arts of Athens sprang from certain primitive fountains of the love of beauty in the human soul. They did not create those fountains, as some suppose; but were born of them. And as offspring is like parent, as face answers to face in a glass, as the sky which appeared beneath the waters at Sunium was the image of the sky which glided over Attica, so were the arts of Athens the images of the love and the dreams of ideal beauty in the souls of men. And our souls respond in flashes of inward light and glory to their own image in their own offspring. It is those flashes of light which now return upon me in connection with the grandeur of Grecian life, rather than the memory of the scenes and perceptions themselves which were but the connecting chains by which the inward and the outward world held communion. And flying from life to life, those gleams of inward light pass down the stream of life in devious and wonderful ways. As a poet of the race which is, in the modern world, what the Greeks were in the ancient, has said :

Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting
The soul that rises with us, our life's star
Hath had elsewhere its setting,
And cometh from afar;
Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory do we come."

STANZAS.

I looked on the sun as he sank in the west—
Not a cloud overshadowed his beam;
But calmly he shone from the place of his rest,
And brightly expired with a gleam.

And, while 'neath the curtain of eve his last ray
Was still on the far-rolling wave,
He fled like a spirit when passing away
Beyond the sad gloom of the grave.

As calmly he poised on his pinions of light—
And left, as he faded from view,
Such smile as a heaven-bound spirit would write
On his clay when he whispers—adieu!

There came o'er the earth and along the blue sky
A beauty as tranquil as sleep,
And the soft, balmy dews on the breeze that moaned by Seemed hovering angels to weep!

How calm was that hour! as calm as if Death
Had reigned o'er the land and the sea—
For the dash of each wave, and the moan of each breath
Spoke but of repose unto me.

The green earth around me was yet smiling on,
Though its luminous spirit had fled,—
And soft from the sky the evening-star shone,
Like the hope that remains for the dead!

The hues of his glory soon vanished away,
Pursuing the Sun in his flight,
While, swift on the track of the fast-fading day,
Flew darkly the shadow of night.

The reign of deep silence came still o'er the scene—
Scarce aught save a murmur arose,
Of the faint-breathing zephyr, that told how serene—
How pure the untroubled repose.

It seemed that the angel of peace had descended,
And all with his spirit had blessed;—
The thoughts that rushed darkly within me were blended
With hopes of a heaven of rest!

Soon thus—did I think—will the cares of this life
In the stillness of death be no more,
And the storms, that attend us with tumult and strife,
Forever be hushed in their roar.

The sorrows that gather so dark shall be past,
The cares that our pleasures would drown—
And all shall be peaceful—be tranquil at last,
When brightly the sun shall go down!

THE RECOLLECTIONS Of another Elderly Gentleman.

BY LAUNCELOT WAGSTAFF.

When the Countess of Blessington's very agreeable book first appeared, a number of good people determined not to be amazed, because the variety of her hero's entanglements seemed to them both unnatural and improper. I, on the contrary, belonged to that small and unhappy class, who fancied that she had not done entire justice to the capacity of the human heart. Looking back from my mellow autumn, through a sweet summer, to a pleasant spring, I recalled more adventures of that sort, than her amiable hero had encountered. Not all indeed were as successful. It is my misfortune to remember having chased several butterflies, which, after keeping me breathless with haste, anxiety and expectation, left me, cap in hand, a sad spectacle of their triumphant escape from the projected capture. But yet, on the whole, I have had no reason to be dissatisfied with my success; and as the pleasing delusion of being dearly loved, has never in my case been purchased by the misery of the fair lady who did me that honor, my reflections have not been disturbed by any phantoms of remorse for a little innocent amusement.

The instance that I am about to relate is of that kind which derives its chief character from the intention of the man who plays the part of tempter. As I certainly had no satanic design in view, nor dreamed of expelling the fair Eve, at whose ear I sat, from that position which through sheer necessity she was constrained to regard as a paradise, I bespeak the silence of all good people as to the heinous character of my offence. If the tranquillity of my conscience, reflecting at this day upon the whole affair, be regarded as any proof of innocent intention, my conduct must be looked upon as lamb-like in the retrospect.

In the year—, no matter what, I found myself in the town of Havre, waiting for some ship that would carry me back to the United States. I was at that period near the mature age of twenty-three years: a time of life at which a man may be considered to have been perfectly capable of appreciating many of those enjoyments which the continent of Europe and the French capital offer to the idle mind. And it may be well to observe in passing, that during the season which I had spent abroad, I had not suffered my spirits, inclined as they naturally were to despondency, to wear one hue of the sombre tints of casati.

I had left Paris for a reason which many of my young countrymen are able to understand. Sitting one evening in my room, I took a sudden fancy to discover the precise state of my account with the banker. It was, after an adventure which I had been unlucky enough to encounter on the preceding evening, rather a matter of agreeable surprise for me to discover, that when all my bills were paid, I should have money enough to land me upon the soil of liberty. My ties in the city were not of that sort which it required a great effort of the heart to break. So on the following morning, with no more adieux than could be waved from the open window of the coupé of a diligence, I rolled past the barriers on my route to Havre.

Arriving there, I found the ship, in which I was destined to sail, not quite ready for sea. Not, however, being in any condition to commit further extravagances, I went on board and put my house in order. It was dreary enough the first day. Havre is not a gay town, and after having dusted my boots in a walk around the ramparts and had them polished in the public square—venturously crossed to Harfleur—strolled upon the quais—roamed over the castle of Francois Ier—watched the process of opening the gates as the tide rose—and generally looked into every corner that seemed tolerably attractive, I grew profoundly weary of the place. Ship-board offered me no great attractions. I had the felicity, thanks to the care of the French police, of going to bed without a light,—this simple luxury being absolutely prohibited in those pleasant docks.

The next morning as I was pacing up and down the dead flat of the promenade deck, thinking of the Rue de Rivoli, and comparing my steady step very disadvantageously even with the rolling gait of a man at sea, I saw ascending the long plank to the gangway, two figures,—one a man and the other, to my profound delight, a woman. The man was a nervous man, it was quite evident. Small attention did he pay to the walk of the person following after him. With the rope clutched tightly in his hand, he trod gingerly along the springing plank, regaining a comparative serenity when he reached the brass railing at the gangway. Then he was polite enough to help the partner of his ascent, through the easiest portion of her journey,—handing her to where I stood, with our excellent skipper, upon the quarter deck.

There may be some need for a national costume among certain people. I thank heaven that we Americans can follow what freak of fancy we please without ever losing our national likeness. Though we dressed as Bedouins and rambled through all sorts of wadys in the desert;—lifted our slippered feet in Lapahan;—smoked the meerschaum in Heidelberg, or Gottingen,—played at Baden;—rode in England;—and did all unexceptionably;—the keen eye of a fellow countryman, alive to those native graces which survive all changes of climate, could detect the naked Jonathan, covered up in foreign fashions and by foreign manners as he might be. Had I seen the gentleman who settled his hat upon his head as he reached the spot where we were, on the top of the Pyramids; or met him as he man in Eothen did his fellow wanderer in the desert, and had done no more than observed him touch his hat and look at me, I should have murmured—Broadway, and known that his feet were familiar with the flag-stones of that pleasant avenue. If “a body” were to ask me why, and there are people incredulous enough to ask any thing, I should doubtless make a very lame argument about the matter. But if any man ever saw an American abroad, who had left his own country full grown, without knowing him to be from the direction of the setting-sun, we have yet to see such a case of amblyopia.

I did not very narrowly consider the exterior man of my countryman; for the face of his companion was just then turned towards me. She was a beautiful woman. There was no particular style in her figure of expression. You can almost always say of an English woman, “here is one well-bred: a person of family and fortune:” or the reverse. And if your eye is familiarized to the shades of manner, you can soon discriminate between that general sprightliness and snavity of demeanor which all Frenchwomen possess as their peculiar heritage, and the yet more refined and delicate courtesy, haughty even in its flattering concessions, which distinguishes the French lady of the old régime. But it is difficult to pronounce upon the social position of an American woman when you see her out of her own country or circle. Every observer has had the ill-fortune to behold almost as many coarse, ill-bred women filling the saloons of good society in this country, as he would be likely to find in that lower circle upon which these people look down. While on the other hand, in some small family group, where such a treasure was not to be looked for, as if Nature in the very bounty of her gifts scorned to be circumscribed by any limits not of her own fixing, the wandering and almost unobservant eye will sometimes fall upon a woman of such surpassing refinement, gentleness and grace, that her untutored loveliness appears to be a miracle of delight.

It would be passing far beyond the bounds of that truth, to which, as a voracious historian, I am bound to adhere, for me to say that the lady who looked at me upon the quarter deck of our good ship was any such miracle. She was very beautiful, and very graceful; but she had that calm assurance of her own charms, which sets the beholder in opposition to their influence. Perhaps the cool manner with which she recognized my sense of her presence on the quarter deck, and the careless catalogue she seemed to be making in her mind of the items of my identity, may have prejudiced me against her discernment. And yet, as a judicious man, I could not quarrel with her taste. Figure to yourself, reader, (alas! how difficult it is for me, now beholding the rickety image of what I was, in the neighboring mirror, to do likewise!) a tall youth, some twenty-three years of age, not very carefully arrayed, with untrimmed, bushy whiskers and twisted moustache, shaded by a travelling cap, the worse for wear. She was in a spotless morning dress—the ribbons evidently fresh from the Rue Chaussée d'Antin, and the exquisitely fitting gloves bespeaking No. 8, Rue Castiglione. She glanced at me from head to foot, and entered her cabin, leaving me just about commencing a nautical criticism, which I was ready to think would interest a timorous woman, about to trust her precious freight of ribbons and silks to the faithless sea.

We spent all that day on ship-board, the wind proving too unfavorable to leave the harbor. At night our fellow passengers came on board. There were no more women. There was one young American, who had, like me, been a wanderer abroad, though for a far longer time than I had journeyed, and one old American, who had toiled like a galley-slave somewhere in the western part of the State of N. York, selling potashes and pearlshes, thus accumulating a large fortune, and who, in his sixtieth year, had quitted his "snuggery" to trust his old age in foreign countries. He was returning to his own quiet home, to his cosy wife and comfortable daughters under the impression that the wide world did not show any thing half so beautiful as the falls of the Genesee, or as the flats through which the river wanders to Lake Ontario. As for my New Yorker, he had found his legs and his voice in the comfortable cabin, and as we sat in the dark, stirring the unseen sugar at the bottom of our sangarees, (still no light) he opened his full heart in complaint over all the miseries which he had undergone since he was beguiled into crossing the ocean. There were the children—

But stay, I had forgotten the children. It was not worth while to disturb a feature of female loveliness by introducing two such imps. But two, nevertheless, this delicate beauty, scarcely yet turned of twenty-four, unquestionably had—one a dumpy girl, some four years of age, another a less dumpy but more peevish boy of two summers. These were the children of whom he began pathetically to lament. He had brought them with him to Europe, thinking that in that land of civilization their young wants would be amply attended to. But such agonies as they had endured!—rooms without carpets, doors without listing, hearths without fires large enough to blacken them! With a touching pathos he told me of the sad ravages made by unnumbered cramps and coughs in the sad visages of his offspring. There was not much amusement to be had in the dark; so accommodating myself to my restricted enjoyments, and using my advantages, I strengthened his punch, when our fellow voyagers retired and we made a night of it.

His confidences were rather dull, but I gathered enough to be assured that his marriage was of no uncommon sort. Some managing mother had acted as unlicensed broker and sold her daughter's lilies and roses, her soft brown hair, dark lustrous eyes, and well-moulded figure for what they would bring. He spoke of her attractive points, as though he had a catalogue of them; and I listened, for I love to hear on what terms God's creatures are made marketable.

Early next morning the captain announced to us that we had a chance of getting out into the channel when the tide rose, and we all appeared upon deck to see the exit of our vessel. The quiet way which some of our ships at home have of getting off, such as casting loose the bow and stern ropes, and letting the foretopsail fall is not to be thought of in Havre. When our turn came to pass through the narrow gate-way of the dock, we were tugged to the appointed place by an infinitely long string of crapauds and sailors; which, when we had reached under a storm of Sacres, we were joined in brief bonds to a little worm of a steamer, and with it struggled out into the open channel.

Our fair friend watched all these proceedings with a sort of scornful curiosity. And really as she stood near the binnacle, with her brown hair smoothly tressed over a clear white brow, and falling down upon cheeks of exquisite smoothness and coloring, I found it in my heart to forgive the supercilious look that lingered about her large dark eyes. When the bustle had subsided, I suggested to my sangaree intimate of the night before, to present me to my fair fellow voyager. He did me that honor, and she coolly inclined her head in my direction. As for my civilities, I am free to confess that she received them very cavalierly. So that, despairing of making myself at all agreeable, while I wore the travelling cap and bushy moustache, I meditated their destruction.

Solitude, however, works miracles. Infants are not wholesome company for a pretty woman. And one of that exacting class, who had been used to spend her morning in the Champs Elysées, talking to heaven knows what dulcet-toned cavalier, was not likely to be entirely amused with the innocent prattling of babes in the confined area of a ladies' cabin. Our friend, her husband too, had a delicate stomach, and when the wind freshened in the channel to a top-gallant breeze, his countenance paled to a most hideous coloring. In short, he grew sick, despite of oranges and sangarees, and was conveyed below, leaving his fair wife to promenade as she might. Thanks to some old experience of the unsteady element, the even pace at which, with some extra rigidity of muscle I will allow, I contrived to walk the deck attracted her notice. And she did me the honor to accept my arm. The campaign commenced.

Thenceforward, for sangarees were entirely unavailing, we were inseparable. The aged pearlsh vender dreaded the near neighborhood of another man's wife, who had been living in Paris. He seemed to think the atmosphere of the capital singularly deleterious to the female moral constitution. And had the beautiful woman, who walked every evening with me, ventured to look askance at him, he would have received the terrors of St. Anthony. The young American was something of a bachelor in his notions of comfort, and was ever willing to sacrifice all his personal convenience to female whims; and so he did not enter the lists against me. I was the lady's sole gallant.

If any man can sit at sunset, of a May evening, on the lofty deck of a ship at sea, beside a beautiful woman, when there is just motion enough in the water to maintain the sense of motion, under a serene sky, without feeling his heart yearn towards his companion, then ought such a person, from his native constitution, to be set up as a cheap and durable figure-head for the vessel which he is occupying as a passenger. "We," at the indiscreet age of twenty-three, forgot the sick gentleman below, before that sun had seven times gone down into the ocean, and found ourselves talking worlds of nonsense. Gentle reader, if you be pious, as I hope you are, do not close this history with a profound sense of the wickedness of its author, or with a trembling vision look forward to its close. Believe me the vista is not terminated by a thin female with dishevelled hair, nor by a gentleman half distracted between remorse and dyspepsia induced by want of cheerful reflections. Nor do you, my delicate young reader, be you wife or maiden, put your curiosity or sympathies in too active order of operation. The tale that I am telling is a true tale; and, therefore, in it there is not much that will make your various tears flow from their fountains.

"Worlds of nonsense," and I talked them! It was he old story. We exhausted generalities and began to talk about ourselves. She, dear creature, told me of the many adventures which, as a maid of sixteen, she had encountered, and how she met with the gentleman below. My confidences were not very exchangeable, but I did the best I could with them. I seemed a pensive of the most gloomy coloring. I had been disappointed a good many times,—I said only once—life is a drama requiring all the unities. By and by she fell into my view. It had been, evidently, a long time since she had heard any thing like genuine sentiment. The invalid below had not dealt much in it. She began to whisper of her disappointments;—her one disappointment; "it was that of her life," she said—"her whole life." And at that down drooped over her pale cheek the long fringes of her dark eyelashes. One tear, only one,—what woman of discretion sheds more,—hung impaled in the glossy net. Remember, gentle reader,—good reader, I was but twenty-three: the sun was down, and I saw her delicate beauty in the new light of a cloudless moon. Pray remember this.

Was it I,—stigmatised but yesterday by my respectable laundress in my hearing, as a "particular old codger," and only because I objected to a superfluity of starch—reminded one week since, when I complained to my tailor that his old measure did not fit me, and that his cutter was growing careless, that my figure had, within ten years, lost its fair proportions; was it I, really I, who, on that balmy evening, when her declining head loosed from its resting place, the one tear that had flowed from her inmost heart; was it I who caught it precisely upon the nape of my neck as I leaned forward and took her clasped hands (Madonna wise) between mine? Peccavi: it was I.

Yes, I took her hands in mine and held them, heaven knows, closely and earnestly enough. It is not for me, now grown into a cynical old man, to gibe and jeer at feelings which then stirred my young heart to its depths. She had a deep, low, musical voice, and her own emotions, long subdued by the utter want of sympathy which she found in her help-mate, overmastered pride and resolution, and found such a voice as seldom breathes even in this world of beauty. She forgot that a hand, not joined to hers in wedlock, held her own unrebuked, while she poured out a flood of passionate mourning over her lonely and unreturning youth. She forgot that my hand pressed hers; but I did not. The hour, the silence, her beauty, the deep distress of her tearful and impassioned eyes, all helped as inspirations, and I said a vast variety of things, which were all profoundly true at the time, but yet very improper.

I was excessively in love with her that evening, and I told her as much. If any one is curious to know exactly what I said, I have only to inform him that he requires what is beyond my power to give. The reproduction of an avowal of this sort in cold blood, an attempt to imitate in language, from memory, the glow, light and warmth of coloring of a young love, would be as preposterous as an attempt at noonday to get an idea of a sun-rise by looking towards the east with tinted spectacles. Enough to say, that as I sat with that small white hand clasped in mine, murmuring impossible consolations into her ear, I utterly forgot, and I suspect she did, the gentleman below.

The watch was changed. The bustle of feet near us startled her from her trance of agony; she rose and with a pressure of my hand, which I could have just sworn to, waved me an adieu, and left me alone. The stars, bless their twinkling souls, have in their generation witnessed a great deal of folly. I do not know that they ever gleamed upon a more disordered head than mine that night. There is no check on a man's absurdities in the dark, especially at sea. All about us presents such a notion of limitless grandeur and sublimity,—a space so immense in its movements and vicissitudes, that the imagination contemns the petty, fixed barriers of social life, as unworthy of a man. I thought of impossible islands overgrown with palm-trees in some far-off summer sea—of cottages, or as Dr. Whately says—a “thatched cottage on a flowery heath on the border of a fine wood.” I dreamed of a lonely glen that I had seen among the mountains of my native State. The dim mist that hovered over the pathway of the vessel, now driving faster on as the night wind freshened, shaped itself into the glorified likeness of that sweet spot. There it was—the open glade skirted about by its noble oaks; the smooth meadow rising gently on one side with a natural terrace; and on it, just beneath the spreading branches of the tree of centuries, “our pretty cot” with its “tallest rose.” And, standing on the green sward, watching for a figure that hastened to receive her welcome, stood the calm, beautiful presence of the weeping woman who had just left upon my hand the faint pressure of her grasp.

Gentle reader, have you ever been in love? If you are a prudent man, as the world has it, and never yearned for any thing except what was precisely proper and advantageous, this history will not find a sympathizing reader in you. Do me the kindness to lay it down. I spent, it would be difficult to say how many hours, in such profitable reflections, as those to which I have alluded. The night waned,—the breeze freshened,—the moon went from my view behind a veil of heavy clouds,—the wind began to sing among the rigging,—the stentorian voice of our skipper, calling all hands to reduce sail, woke me from my trance,—and, thoroughly aroused by tumbling over the mizzen-topsail halyards, I retreated to my state-room, and slept, aye calmly, despite the gale and the recollection of having nursed, to expression even, a passion that could not but prove unhappy.

Next morning! If there be a panacea for human woes, it is to be found in that happy season. Some wise observer, in view, doubtless, of his altered sensations after a night's profound rest, suggested that the soul walked in sleep through the waters of some shadowy Lethe, and in it forgot the grosser troubles of the day. Be that as it may, I put it solemnly, as a curious fact for explanation, to such of my good readers as care to analyze their own sensations, whether they have not frequently gone to bed in a fever-fit of anxiety and vexation, troubled to death with something or other, and waked in the morning with no earthly reason for peace, with no new avenue from its difficulties discovered, and yet as tranquil as an infant: with no more trace of the last night's agony remaining, than amounts to that suspicion of a heart-ache, which stands between the tenement and its perfect tranquillity.

Next morning came, and as I stood balancing my body in all sorts of postures to accommodate it to the rolling vessel, the breakfast gong sounded. I turned the lattice of my state-room and looked into the cabin. The invalid, weary of waiting to be well, had accomplished his toilet at the expense of a face awfully gashed, and sat dismally over his coffee. By his side, calm, peaceful as a bright May morning could make her, sat my weeping friend of the night before. She was unexceptionably attired. I looked for the trace of tears, for some forgotten ornament which might betray a spirit ill at ease,—unable even in its greatest effort to remember all the petty ornaments which she must now view with such disdain. Every thing was in order. You might have seen your face in the gloss of her hair. The dress was exquisitely fitted. Every ring that had pressed into my hand the night before shone upon her fingers. And to crown my mortified astonishment, she was gently helping the invalid to some condiment which would be likely to sustain his long sickened appetite.

Things were not altered when I appeared. I thought that I perceived a faint hue richer than usual upon her cheek and neck, but it was possibly the dim light gleaming through a bottle of tomato catsup which she held in her hand. Now, if she had shown great agitation—had looked at me with a rueful or distressed countenance, I am quite sure that I could have been very agreeable that morning. Nothing satisfies a man so well with himself as a sense of his influence and power. He is never so agreeable as he is to a woman of whose affection he is internally sure, but to the existence of which he has never been constrained to accord an official recognition. She was quite at her ease, and I became of course dissatisfied,—was cynical, bitter,—not to say rude. From the particularly haughty manner with which I declined all her politeness, she could not but argue that I was offended. Then began her uneasiness. Women, bless their uncertain hearts, are very like their fellow-creatures, the men. So long as they are satisfied of your love, you may consider your ill-treatment as guaranteed, no matter what reasons they may have to respect the extent of your private information. The more submissive you are, the more harsh and tyrannical they grow; but once grow restive and the little courtesies recommence. But this is very serious criticism; and I return to my story.

My sweet friend grew observant. When the breakfast was over we went to the promenade deck. There I lounged apart upon a bench. She looked listlessly over the railing. The captain offered his arm. They promenaded awhile. I laid down and watched the flying scud. The time came to "take the sun," and the captain left the lady to her own meditations. She experimented on a stroll with the invalid. His first exploit was a fall over the chicken-coop, where he was ferociously picked at by those hungry voyagers. He descended below to repair his injuries. Madame boldly essayed to walk alone. A slight lurch, (I prayed for it,) sent her to leeward with most unmatronly rapidity. My arms, the occasion excusing it, caught her; and although it might be said that the release was not of that instantaneous sort which such a predicament demanded, still something must be allowed for the novelty of the situation. The reconciliation was effected. We walked longer than usual that morning. The invalid was below.

How well I remember that morning! It returns to me even now with its questions and answers.

"I had nearly fallen!"

"It is quite true."

"I should have injured myself; perhaps fallen overboard!"

"Your fall would have been severe."

(A pause.)

"The day is pleasant."

"Very."

"Is the wind fair?"

"It is."

"You are laconic to-day?"

"You seemed to think that I had said too much?"

"When?"

"Last night."

(Another pause.)

"Did I say so?"

"No, but looked it."

"I was not offended."

"No—but more."

"How?"

"Unconcerned."

(Another pause.)

"Do not let us speak of that."

"Your silence is easy."

"Why?"

"It gives you no pain."

"And yours?"—

That was an unlucky question; because I answered it. Not yet, most reverend matron,—do not yet close the volume. You have not heard what I said. Wait until I tell you, and then acknowledge that you came nigh to prejudging the case. Whatever I said, she did not say much; but she listened. And how much did she say in that? I put the question to you, most prudent lady,—how much did she say in that?

The invalid grew stout and well. He got his "sea legs" on, and insisted on playing gallant to his wife. He called her at the twilight time. She was delicate, and it was damp. The little promenades with me grew fewer. When she was making the fifth round, the baby was sure to cry out from below.

"My dear!"

"What, love?"

"The baby cries."

"No—does it?"

"Aha—aha—aha—a—a—a."

"There it is again."

"It is cross to-day—better let the nurse manage it."

"Aha—aha—a—a—a."

"It must be sick!"

"Oh no, my love, only cross."

"Mrs. — I think sick."

"I hope not, my love."

"You had better see."

"Certainly, if you wish it."

So ended one week. Before many days these perpetual interruptions put an end to our talks upon deck. The invalid had grown companionable and liked his wife beside him, even when he played chess. I sat on the opposite side. It was my amusement to draw an infinitude of absurd caricatures—what caricatures! which I explained in doggerel. These I regularly threw to Cerberus as sops. He soon grew tired of my wit, but rather encouraged its exhibition. Now and then a piece of bolder rhythm passed into his wife's hands;—once he picked such a stanza up from the floor and looked at it. I saw it in his hands. Happily it was a mild dose. But not knowing that he had got possession of it accidentally, I scribbled her a note. I have it now before me. Her answer was on the same piece of paper.

"Did you show — that piece of rhyme? Devotedly."

"No, I have not shown anything, or said anything. Do you not feel ashamed of imagining such a thing? You seem very much afraid of him."

That was an unlucky gibe.

The invalid did not like note-writing. The baby cried as usual. I believe he had a mesmerie influence over that child. My fair friend and I were still more estranged. One night, however, he was deep in chess. I was inquired for. The deluded captain, innocent of evil intention, announced my retirement. I was comfortably stretched upon the monkey-rail looking at the phosphorescence of the ocean. The fair captive had leave to quit her master's side. She came to the door of the saloon. I stood in the dark and talked with her. I complained of her estrangement. Poor thing! she told me with tears in her eyes,—I saw them glistening in the faint light of the stars,—that her husband had expressed a stolid disapprobation of our intimacy: he said she ought to be more attentive to him. Poor prisoner! captive for a life-time,—with but one life,—doomed to minister with her fair hands to the rude and selfish ease of a vulgar master. My heart truly yearned to her as she stood weeping silently,—listening without a word of reply to such consolation as I could give her.

"Do not weep more."

"Do not, I pray, observe me."

"I cannot help it."

"Then, I will go."

"No—stay. You shall not be displeased."

"We shall be observed."

"He is at chess."

"This is useless. We should not meet in secret."

"He is to blame. It is his foolish jealousy."

"Has he no cause?"

"From you,—none."

"But I also am in error."

"How?"

"I should not have allowed it."

"You have permitted nothing."

"But you have said much."

"You could not have kept me silent."

"We are near land—are we not?"

"Yes."

"Well, we part then."

"Are you glad that it is so?"

"I should have been better pleased if we had not met."

"But as it is?"—

"This must not be. Good-night!"

"Stay—but as it is? Answer."

"No—I cannot. Good-night."

And yet it was answered.

The next day we again met. She was as calm and composed as ever. I could not approach her. I retired sad and dispirited to my stateroom. The captain announced that we were near the land. I had grown in love. Touched by her beauty, a warmer feeling than any that I had known in my intercourse with her sprang up in my heart. I wrote the following stanzas. I thought them poetry then. I was but twenty-three.

I know that thou canst love me not;
And soon my name will be forgot:
And all that I have uttered seem
The fragment of a morning dream.

But still thy steps I linger near,
And every word in gladness hear,
As if to be where'er thou art,
Were place within thy secret heart.

But thou perchance canst inly smile,
To see me thus my life beguile;
And care not if our parting day
In grief or gladness pass away.

But fare thee well: I'll ne'er regret
That I must leave thee as we met;
But to remembrance fondly give
Thy lovely image, while I live,

As that which in an earlier day
A moment beamed upon my way;
Although my life of thee bereft,
Seem ever more to darkness left.

Rather enthusiastic to me reading it at fifty: but I have no doubt it seemed icy to me at the ripe age of twenty-three. I was sick that night, or at least told the captain so, and called for my light. But in a little while I again enconced among the ropes coiled upon the monkey-rail.

I waited long, and at last fearing that she would not come, cursed in my heart the prosperous breeze that drove us on so rapidly to the shores of America. But the light that twinkled through the door-way suddenly disappeared. I stood beside the entrance. She said:

"Is it you?"

"Yes."

"The captain said that you were sick."

"I have not yet retired."

"We are almost within soundings, are we not?"

"Unfortunately, yes."

"You should be glad."

"But I am not."

"I have been preparing to depart."

"Doubtless well satisfied to be so near your home."

"They expect me."

"I have not a married life to look forward to. I cannot congratulate myself upon leaving you."

"You have friends?"

"They ill supply the happiness of married life."

"You are bitter"—

"And just."

"But not to me. You should spare me your satire."

"Satire? You are too happy in your husband's companionship to regard this as satire."

"Good night."

"Why do you go?"

"Will you not bid me good night?"

"No, for we then would part in anger."

"I am not angry."

"Then it is well. You know we shall reach the harbor to-morrow."

"I know it."

"Ours has been a sad companionship."

"More than sad, I fear."

"Do you think that we shall meet soon again?"

"I trust not. We should both avoid such a meeting."

"I wrote to you this morning."

"Do not ask me to receive it."

"It is not a letter."

"What then?"

"Only this."

I gave her the lines, and she retired to the cabin and read them. She rejoined me.

"You must take these again, I cannot keep them."

"Why not keep them?"

"It would be wrong."

"Why?"

"You surely know."

"I do not."

"They breathe what I should not hear."

"It is what you knew."

"What would you think if I kept them?"

"That you pitied me."

"I fear I am wrong."

"No—keep them—listen to your heart."

"Well—be it so—it is not much. To-morrow we part."

"But not forever."

"Yes, forever. This weakness must end here. Have pity on me and do not make me regret what has passed more than I do."

The tears again fell freely. I could not see her sorrow unmoved. With such strength of purpose and utterance as I could command, I gave her my promise. I held her hand long in mine without speaking. Without a word she turned away and left me. Next morning our vessel lay at anchor, and by noon we were at the city. Emigrants crowded the deck. Custom-house officers ran to and fro. Strangers came on board to see relatives and friends. The invalid, now a bustling pompous man of business, hurried my six weeks' companion past me. As she went by I took her hand in mine for one instant, waved her a last adieu as she turned towards me on entering her carriage, and so parted from her—forever.

I might as well say forever, for although I have not heard that she is dead, I do not think I could now be tempted with an interview, and we have not met since we parted on the deck of the good ship. What a long time it is since then! Ten years ago I saw the name of that vessel in the list of maritime disasters. She had gone ashore somewhere in the North Pacific, having degenerated from her noble uses into a base whaler. It would be intolerable to meet an elderly lady without teeth, and it would be no less intolerable for this same elderly person to descry changes in me. I have before me a blooming picture of what she was, and it shall never be changed into a caricature by any sight of what she now may be.

I have no doubt that somebody is curious enough to conjecture whether, after the sad parting scene to which I have alluded, I did not make some attempt afterwards to see her. Human vanity is, in general, stronger than human virtue, and I do not know that I have any right to announce myself as an exception to this mortal weakness. It was true that on my return home the passion that had well nigh consumed me on ship-board, gradually went out, burning less and less brightly, and finally disappearing. Still, however, I had the folly to imagine her pining in her splendid home; a nightingale with her breast against the bars of her gilded cage, carolling sad melodies for a dream that haunted her lonely life. And I longed to see her again. The longing grew into a fever. Accident threw in my way one who knew her. He was about to pass through the city where she dwelt, and I, inventing some long story as an excuse to satisfy his friendly curiosity, commissioned him to call upon her. He was instructed to paint me as remembering her tenderly: not as though this secret had been entrusted to him, but as the discovery of his observant eye.

When he returned he told me that he had called upon her. Three years had ripened her beauty, and added another link to the chain which bound her to old associations. She was living in great luxury and splendor, and seemed, my informant told me, to be as happy as she could be with a reasonable contempt for her weak lord and master. He spoke incidentally of me, and she inquired kindly after me. She hoped I had married or was about to, and that I would marry well. She said she recollected me as rather romantic, but supposed that I had recovered from that youthful fancy. In fine, she desired to be kindly remembered to me, and hoped that I would some day pay her a visit.

I was quite wounded when I heard of this unexpected tranquillity. To tell the honest truth, the certainty of her peace of mind being entirely free from all danger on my account made me very indignant. I never was more in love with her than I was when I found out she was living quite happily. Consigning the whole sex to an evil name for frivolity and heartlessness, I made myself agreeable to the very next woman I encountered.

THOUGHTS,

Suggested by Powers' Proserpine,—a beautiful work of art in the possession of H. D. Maxwell, Esq., of Pennsylvania.

BY M. J.

Hail, western world! our own fair Attica!
 Already is thy brow with honors crowned,
 And yet they thicken round thee. Thou hast sons,
 Who have thy glory at their inmost heart,
 And who in every path of light are found,
 Competing with the foremost:—not to win
 Distinctions high wherewith to clothe themselves;
 But for a nobler purpose;—to compel
 From half-reluctant lips the hard-earned praise,
 And only feel it precious when 'tis laid,
 With true devotion, at their country's feet,

A wanderer from the far Atlantic shore,
 Becomes a dweller by the classic side
 Of Arno,—threads the pictur'd galleries,
 And sculptur'd halls and storied palaces
 Of queenly Florence;—muses, studies long;
 Converses closely with the mighty Past;
 Marks Nature's loveliest developments,—
 Learns how her muscles play, and pulses beat;—
 Discourses thus with all that is sublime,
 And lofty and ennobling, till his mind
 Filled to o'erflowing can receive no more.

He seeks expression for his thronging thoughts,
 And writes them out in marble. Day by day,
 Beneath his plastic touch, the stone receives Intenser life; the spirit breathes within;
 His dreams have found their richest utterance;
 And Proserpine,—impersonation bright,
 Of art and beauty, dwells on earth again!

By starry night and in the broad, clear day,
 'Mid crowded streets, and thro' his lonely hours,
 She still has followed, sweet and shadow-like,
 A breathing presence near him. Were it strange,—
 Since he hath watched those lineaments so long,
 If to his eye the human countenance
 Should lose its remnant of divinity?
 That half-averted face—how passing fair!
 The smile that lingers round the curving mouth
 With mournful meaning filled; the pensive brow
 So beautifully calm and passionless;
 The rounded cheek that seems as it would yield
 Beneath a finger's weight; the wavy hair
 About the imperial head; and more than all,
 The chasten'd woman's look of tenderness,
 That pleads in every line, and longs to break
 The trembling silence of those breathing lips!
 —What marvel if this varied loveliness,
 Should captive lead the sculptor's heart for years!

Ascend, successful master! farther still.
 The path that lies before thee: take the torch,
 Than Ceres' brighter, which thy genius lights
 At its own Etna-fire, to guide thee on,
 And go, a spirit-traveller o'er the world,
 In tireless search of faultless excellence.
 Outstrip the Grecian in his wondrous fame,—
 Shake in the grasp of Angelo the palm,—
 Receive the chisel from Canova's hand,
 And catch Thorwaldsen's mantle as it falls;—
 Then to complete thy triumph, turn from all
 The grand magnificence of earthly art,—
 Confessing that its most transcendent skill
 Is less than nothing laid beside His power,
 Who fashioned with a word a perfect man,
 And breathed into the clay a living soul!

THE CRIME OF ANDREW BLAIR.

BY F. F. COOKE.

CHAPTER IV.

The Greeks believed that their Achaian temple, dedicated to the "dread Eumenides," could try, by some influence of its cold walls or sombre airs, the purity of those who entered it. If a man entered it with a crime lying secret at his heart, he betrayed himself by bodily tremors and the loss of reason. The house of John Herries, with its murder-pictures, and its thronging reminiscences of a former master, had been such a temple of the Furies to Andrew Blair.

He continued for many days in a state of mental imbecility and bodily prostration. During this time Herries hung about the sick man, with a misery and dread in his looks which excited the remark of all who saw him. When, at last, he learned, watching in a room adjoining the chamber in which Andrew Blair lay, that the unhappy man had awaked from a long sleep better in body, and with a restored intelligence, he placed a hand upon his brows, and drew a breath so long and so loud, that one might have fancied he had been fished up from a lake of brimstone just at the last gasp. And indeed the catching at hope, of which that hard-drawn inspiration was the outward sign, was the catching at life. When he spoke it was but to say—"now we will do well again."

"Yes," replied Dr. Gaunt, the physician in attendance, an old gentleman of much simplicity, who saw a great deal of sweet affection and sympathy in the emotion of Herries—"yes; he will do well now. These attacks are peculiar. Indeed I may say that my patient is already fully himself again."

And, in confirmation of Dr. Gaunt's decisive opinion, Andrew Blair immediately prepared to return to his own house. Persuasion against his doing so too suddenly only threw him into nervous agitation, and Herries willingly saw him depart. The old man went away in his carriage, with Minny at his side. Erect, pale, with feeble hands clutching for a support, and the resolution of his features making all the sadder their strange expression of distress, the uncle deeply moved the heart of the niece on this melancholy return to Lindores. Minny had learned a profound lesson of devotion.

As soon as he could safely do so, Herries went to Lindores to arrange his important affairs. He chose for his visit one of those miraculous mornings, of glorious sunshine and cheering airs, which we sometimes find in the budget of December—like a leaf of Ariosto misplaced into Young's Night Thoughts. Andrew Blair sat by an open window, which, facing the south, caught obliquely a gentle south-west wind. The rays of the sun, coming also obliquely from the morning quarter, began to touch him. A pair of blue birds interchanged merry speeches, in a lilac clump, the buds of which were bursting. About a dwarfed cedar, misshapen and crouching, and looking like a Caliban among the straight brotherhood of lindens and beeches, some jays were engaged in a battle. The din was prodigious, and occasionally a pinch of feathers was whisked away, and scattered on the air. The jay is irritable and punctilious, and prefers war to peace, in any weather. Far away, down the slopes of the great hill, cattle browsed, or economised the unseasonable sunshine in motionless attitudes. At times, the shadow of a soaring hawk fell upon the grass, still green, below the open window, and silenced for a moment the pugnacious jays, leaving the blue-birds—those little winged violets which peep from under the fringes of winter, and are safe in their humility—to prate away as if not a care hovered in the skies above them. Refreshed by the scene—enjoying the south-wind—cheered by the sunshine—Andrew Blair had not for a long time escaped so far from unhappiness. But suddenly the jays retreated from the cedar; the blue-birds passed twittering round a corner of the house; the calm currents beginning to keep even tone at the old man's ruined heart became again troubled. The arrival of John Herries made the change.

Herries, entering, greeted his host with politeness, and apparently with kindness. He congratulated him, pressing his hand at the same time, upon appearances of improved health. After a time he approached the point, and said:

"I have come, sir, to renew a business which your unfortunate illness interrupted."

Andrew Blair waved his hands and became troubled in countenance.

"I think we understand each other," continued Herries; "and I shall touch the subject now without cutting to the quick. I content myself with repeating that my son is a suitor for the hand of your niece. I presume that you will use your influence in his behalf?"

Herries paused upon this last sentence, which, worded so as to express a fact taken for granted, was yet sounded as a question.

"This is a sad proposition," said Andrew Blair feebly.

"How a sad proposition?" Herries became sinister in his looks. "You think it a degradation to mingle the common blood of my family with the pure blood of your own. Such is your thought; is it not?"

"I have no thought. I am incapable of thought, my good Herries," Blair replied. "Give me rest, Herries—give me rest."

"Willingly would I do so," said Herries, with a show of feeling too natural for hypocrisy; "but rest to you will be fatal to me."

"I do not understand you, Herries. Why are you bent upon this marriage? How can it effect you so deeply?"

Herries drew his chair close to his listener. "Hear me," said he, "and do not be unmanned by a fear that I shall tear open old wounds. I have a great object in view. I attain it by this marriage. It is unnecessary to enter into details. We must bring about this marriage."

"Then bring it about, Herries. I am shaken by disease and cares, and can aid very little in these struggles."

"Why should there be struggles?"

"Surely you cannot believe," said Andrew Blair, "that poor Minny will become willingly the wife of your son?"

"Why should I not believe so?" Herries replied, with bended brows. "You make a mistake. You have seen the surface of this wild boy of mine. Perhaps it is ridiculous. But I tell you that we—you, sir, and I—have nothing so good or so great in us as this apparent simpleton possesses under his absurd appearances."

"He may be worthy enough—and yet, Herries, he scarcely seems to be a match for my niece."

"Here is again your prejudice of blood," said Herries. "Blood—blood—when it flows under the lancet we see no difference between the currents of the high and of the low; when it spurts out under the knife, and boils into the ground, it cries with the same voice to God, whether the arteries from which it springs belong to a gentleman or to the poorest devil that ever dug for his bread."

"You are killing me," moaned Andrew Blair.

Herries paused. "I forget my resolution," he muttered, and held his peace for some minutes. The sunshine, the light wind, the glitter of the grassy slopes, restored the old man; as certain remedies restore the patient who sinks under the knife of the surgeon. "We must deal gently," said Herries, and then in a louder tone spoke on: "My friend there is a secret between us. Be firm, I beg of you; let us forever drown the recollection of it. Let us bury it in a community of interests—in a fatherly affection centering on the same objects. My son once the husband of your niece, we will stand together, united, with no room for doubts, suspicions, betrayals, between us. Urge your niece—even give her a glimpse of the danger of your position, if you fail to move her by other means. You understand me when I say the danger of your position; and truly these are not empty words. Your disgrace—your destruction—will be the result of your [failure; for I shall be desperate, and will speak. I temper my words to your weakness. You take their meaning fully, however. Now decide: will you or will you not urge the girl to this marriage?"

The lips of Andrew Blair moved, but no language came from them. Presently he succeeded, with a feeble struggle of his thin hands, in opening a case attached to his chair. He took from it a small bottle, and a wine-glass. He drank, with tremulous haste, a black looking draught.

"Send Minny to me," he said, "and wait below until I can give you an answer."

Herries, with a quick step, left the room. In a few moments Miss Blair entered it.

"You have sent for me, uncle," said Minny, as she drew a chair to the old man's side.

"Yes, my child; but give me a little time to collect my poor old intellects."

"How pleasant the wind is, uncle."

"Yes—yes—pleasant."

"This balmy weather brings up the violets; here is a bunch of them. You see how I have tied them up with berries of the strawberry tree. It makes something quite pretty. The little blue flowers are relieved by the scarlet wax of the berries."

"My child," said the old man—beginning to assume an energetic expression, which perhaps his recourse to the bottle with the dark-coloured liquid had something to do in producing—"my child, what we shall have to say may prove a bitter sequel to this pretty nonsense of yours."

"I listen, sir."

"To come to the point then. Mr. John Herries has this morning proposed for your hand in the name of his son."

Minny stared.

"Is it so?"

"Even so," said Andrew Blair.

Minny threw her head back and laughed. It was a vibrating, metallic laugh, that. The ceilings pealed it back as though her white pulsing throat had been like that of Arcite, which Dryden tells us was "a trumpet with a silver sound." She presently controlled her merriment and said:

"And what answer did you make to this proposal which flatters me excessively?"

The old man seemed to be pained by the levity of his niece. It was with a manner of nervous irritation that he said:

"Be graver. If you reject the young gentleman, do it with a decent composure. Regard his feelings."

"Ah, sir," Minny answered, no longer laughing,—“he will find me grave and gentle when, face to face, I deny him. Do I wound human hearts wantonly? But you rebuke me for a slight fault as if there was more in this thing than you discover to me.” As she spoke her glances became quick and apprehensive.

The old man answered:

“There is indeed a stern necessity that you should give to this proposal a serious consideration; indeed that you should school your inclinations, and give even a favorable answer.”

“Uncle—uncle!” cried Minny Blair, with eyes round with their wonder, and her mouth contracted to a ruby ring; “Do you say that I must become the wife of silly Tom Herries? You are in one of your dreams.”

The uncle shook his head. Presently he replied: “Minny, this young person is quite respectable,—honest and kind-hearted, I think,—and not ill-looking. His property will be considerable—and although I shall make your own considerable enough to render this argument of no great force, perhaps you will attach some importance to it.

“None whatever, uncle. Hear me sir. You seem to be serious. I hardly understand that you can be so. But I must be so. I am then with a solemn face to answer yes or no to this singular proposal. Well I answer no—a thousand times no.”

There was spirit enough in this answer to rouse the old man to a peevish and direct assault.

“My dear,” he said, “our preface has been long enough. You must marry this Tom Herries.”

The girl rose in strange amazement—paused a moment—then putting the palm of a soft hand on each of her uncle’s sallow cheeks, brought her lips near to his, and replied:

“No—inexorably no.”

And she kissed his lips many times to prevent his answer. Perhaps she imagined that dull, ill-omened, denying monosyllable—a wave of the Dead Sea to draggle and drown poor Cupid at any time—made an end of the matter. But the answer, delayed by her gentle arts, came at last.

“Then, my child, you to whom I have looked for happiness in this miserable world will betray me to ruin, disgrace, perhaps death.”

“You are dreaming uncle!”

“Dreaming? not so. This decision of yours will surely destroy me.”

“Explain sir—make your meaning clear to me.”

“No—there can be no explanation. But I speak the truth.” He presently added “know this much: years—many miserable years ago—

I lost the great game of life in the temptations of one awful hour. I committed a terrible crime. There was a witness to it. I am the slave of that witness.”

The girl stood speechless. As she stared, the eyes of her uncle seemed to protrude from their sockets, his hair to rise with electric life, and moisture gathered upon his forehead and upper lip in distinct drops.

“The vision is coming,” the old man murmured. But the pale and nervous girl cast her arms about his neck, drew his cheek to her warm maiden bosom and said:

“Then there is a terrible truth, uncle. It is remorse, and not merely a disordered imagination that has shaken you for years. Poor uncle! Do you think that your Minny could love you less? You have fed me—loved me—saved me from the world that has but a cold heart for poor little parentless children. I have grown up to be of some importance. How proud I am! Uncle I am to save you. Worse than this absurd marriage would be possible to my love for you. I do not say ‘I consent’—that would be rash. It may be avoided with safety to you. We must see. Man yourself. There is nothing to frighten us. We are here in the blessed sunshine. These are Minny’s arms that you feel on your neck.”

“Our hearts must break”—said the old man in tones infinitely mournful—for his spiritual terrors had subsided into mere grief. “Our hearts must break. How often high natures come to despair! Ah, we are creatures of fire when we are young; it is quicksilver that courses in our veins then. We are proud and swift, and do many unwise things. Well, we cure the unwise deeds with after wisdom. In our youth too we break dear ties, estrange those that love us; for we are self-sufficient, and say we are strong, able, chosen lords of the world, made in God’s image; and the fires which we kindle within us for self-worship, we think should dazzle our fellows also and bring them to bow down. Even of this age tames us. Time sweeps the nature bare of its vain glory. We heal the wounded self-love of others; we reunite the broken ties; we win back the lost friendship. Our errors break under us and are trampled into dust as we pass on. The road of life may glitter darkly with them under the onward feet—and yet the bright goal may be won. But crime—crime—ah! that is fatal. When in our swift pride we strike—when we shed the blood of man upon the betraying ground—then is there no cure—no cure. We pass then, living, the inexorable gates, with the fiery blazon ‘hope passes not here.’ We are given over to the fire that is not quenched, and the worm that never dieth.”

“Uncle,” said Minny, when these wild laudanum-kindled sentences had blazed to an end, "there is always hope. Our Saviour died that he might win that touching title. Let us pray to him."

The old man bowed his head; he did not answer the invitation to prayer. He presently spoke on:

"I am a poor old man—worn, weary and desolate. I have been sinful. Have I not been punished enough—punished enough? And yet around my closing years, in accumulation upon these dreadful sufferings, are crowding real dangers. Child, did you never discover that I was a—coward. Yes—men—the very brutes—have always quelled me. I have been subtle, never bold. Minny, if the true temper of a courageous nature which I have seen flash out from your girl's face had been mine I would have been to-day on the summits of man's ambition, renowned, able, and iron-braced. I did not possess it. I quailed—took life like a crouching beast that springs on a sure prey—and have grown old, remorseful and trembling. I quake now with real fears. Forgive me, brave little child, I am a coward."

Minny Blair answered:

"Uncle, I grope in the dark. I will not ask you to enlighten me. I catch, perhaps, a true guidance from the wild gleams which you have thrown on my path. I fear to have more light. We speak no more of your deeds, or of the inexplicable power which another seems to possess over you, and over my poor self. Just now I told you that I should postpone my consent to the proposed marriage until I discovered that it could not be avoided. Your manner and words drive me on. Perhaps I err; but for life or death, happiness or misery, I choose my lot promptly. I consent to the marriage which, a little while ago, I abhorred. Truly I am changed; I no longer abhor it."

Hope struggled with surprise in the weak visage of the old man.

"Say you so, my dear child? But you will again abhor it, when you fall from your higher feelings, and then you will renounce this decision."

"Uncle, I have come to a resolution, I will remain constant in it. Send for this gentleman who comes to us as a messenger. I will presently answer him."

The old man drew his niece to his bosom; no female emotion disturbed her; a smile more like the quivering gleam of blue steel, than any more cheerful radiance flitted over her cheerful face. She kissed him with hard lips, so strictly were they compressed, and said:

"Who knows, uncle, but we may be a very happy couple. A good heart does much to make a home happy."

Presently the elder Herries was summoned.

"My niece assents to the proposal with which she has been honored," said Andrew Blair with a slight haughtiness in his manner.

"I willingly consent to become the wife of your son," Minny added.

Herries answered these supremely pleasant words with mute action. Pressing Minny's white hand, he bowed very low.

The scene was at an end.

The stately girl, with head a little drooped, and a step as noiseless as the fall of snow on a winter lake, passed to the door, and disappeared.

CHAPTER V.

"Wife, wife," said John Herries, "we have triumphed, and now life really begins to us. I feel like a Caesar fresh from a Pharsalia. That magnificent swindler you know, Mrs. Herries, extricated himself very honorably from his debts by that success. Now I may say that the past is purified, and our future secured."

"We should thank God, and not be too presumptuous in our anticipations," answered the wife.

"There it is," said Herries. "You and I never seem to hope together. Put your hand into the bend of my arm. Now look up. Don't we look very much like a candlestick and its extinguisher. Madam, you are my extinguisher. But to-day my blaze is too strong for you. Dropping figures, Mrs. Herries, you are a conceited little person; you imagine yourself to be temperate, calm, and very wise. The truth is you are only not ardent, your frigidity has sometimes seen dull results which, in my sanguine temper I would not see; the consequence is you fancy your frigidity to be infallibility. You are conceited—more, you are wrong. Even if you were infallible it would be one of those cursed gifts which make life barren. What the deuce would life be without its delusions? Are you happy now, looking into the future as you do—like a little plain statue, cut out of cold gray marble, looking out over a waste tract, with two fixed frigid eyes? Madam, you take a great deal of trouble to make yourself disagreeable to me."

"I have no enthusiasm, my dear husband. But am I really disagreeable to you? I thought, if this grand match was made, we were to go down the hill of life happily together. I think you said that."

"If we have a partnership in happiness, you must contribute to the common fund. And yet after all, wife, I think I have enough for both. You are a good kind creature. God bless you with your demure airs. I feel like a lad of twenty. Positively I have not a care on earth."

"When will we have the wedding?" asked the wife, with a smile which discovered something of the hopeful cheerfulness of the husband.

"I did not forget that. Time defeats us too often to trust over much. A month from to-day the wedding will take place. What a lucky dog Tom is, to be sure. Thank you, my little fairy of the primp cap, for this son who secures so much to us. We must send for Georgiana. She must come from school to her brother's wedding."

With such talk Herries cheered himself after his successful visit to Lindores. His cares seemed to have been broken up and blown away, like a bank of cloud which a March wind assails, and lashes, huddling, beyond the horizon. His welkin was blue again, and flooded with a sunstream.

Meantime, as the days flew by, Minny Blair became less and less braced for the sacrifice, to which, in a moment of extreme emotion, she had devoted herself. The first visit of poor Tom Herries gave a beginning to this unnerving process. She spent a wretched night after enduring the interview with her intended bridegroom, whose misfortune it was to conceal many genuine qualities, of which the reader will become cognizant, under a mask of awkward folly. What an end did this marriage seem to those beautiful dreams which the imaginative girl had treasured, and which the young and pure of her sex, even where the instinct of love is yet objectless, "the maiden meditation fancy free," always pour upon the future! Poor Minny concealed, as well as could be, the despondency into which she sank deeper and deeper. Her nature had an unusual degree of force, and those controlling grasps with which the strong of soul hold down their feelings and hide their sufferings were possible to her; she could put self down, and cheer the old man who had devoted her to wretchedness, with a brave ease and quite a genuine appearance of contentment with her fate. But this noble hypocrisy, exacting so much of her, was a stifling mask which might be assumed for a time, not worn constantly. She found her best escape from it in those out-of-door exercises to which she had always been accustomed, wandering walks to the woodlands, or gallops over the breezy slopes.

The beautiful weather of which I have spoken continued, with only some temporary interruptions. On a day as bright as that which saw her consent yielded to the approaching marriage, Minny Blair rode her swift mare Flight at a restrained gallop over a firm road at the foot of the Lindores' hill. A servant followed her at a short distance. She rode to a rendezvous. Our friend, Major Wright, and his daughters, two magnificent young monsters of a family of Centaurs, had given her an invitation to a fox chase; an invitation which, making an experiment with the "atra cura post equitem," she readily accepted. Animated by the exercise, and gathering that confidence in self which the swift but controlled motion of a free horse creates in the rider, Minny came in a resolute humor to the rendezvous.

Major Wright, his daughters and a number of other persons were assembled in an open field when Miss Blair arrived. Dogs were howling, whining and yelping, horses were snorting and pawing, young gentlemen were laughing, elderly gentlemen were directing and swearing.

"My dear young lady," cried Major Wright, who had come to the ground in a sulky, and seemed, by ridding himself of a superfluous coat, to be preparing to get on horseback—"my dear young lady, you are quite an acquisition, and I appoint myself your servant in the ride. But here comes that black-guard Tom Herries, to deprive me of the greatest pleasure in the world. Tom, you rascal, what are you doing in that extraordinary toggery? Do you think that you cut a creditable figure?"

"Whatever mistake there is, Major, Jerry Maddox the tailor made. But attend to your own business."

Major Wright, without deigning an answer to Tom's rebellious request, brought his long whip over his right shoulder, and then into contact with a particular portion of the body of a small boy who, doubled up behind him on the bars of the sulky, held a saddled horse by the bridle. The manœuvre displayed practice; the tip of the thong came down with precision; the little knot of a boy unrolled himself as a matter of course, got down and led the horse forward. The dogs, meantime, had been turned off into a swampy thicket near at hand; as the Major mounted they broke suddenly into full cry. Almost at the same instant a member of the party gave the view halloo. The fox had waited to be flushed like a woodcock, and now made a gallant dash forward at his best pace, with the pack thundering after him, all in a body, over open ground.

"He'll never get clear. They'll have him down at the first fence. We must give up all hopes of a run," sighed a rosy old gentleman, as the well-disciplined party awaited with drawn reins the moment for dashing on after fox and hounds.

"He's over. That snap of Black Bell's just missed him," cried Major Wright. "Set forward—slowly."

Thirty good horses went forward with one will. Tom Herries rode at Minny Blair's side, Flap-ear keeping an even stride with Flight. Poor Tom, generally an ardent fox-hunter, looked moody. A minor trouble had grown out of Major Wright's critical remarks upon his coat. His tailor, perhaps a runaway English apprentice, had made it after a subdued and correct English fashion; Nimrod might have approved of it—Major Wright did not. Tom was enflamed with disgust for it.

"But," he resolved, "I will carry it with the foremost, and a tumble or two will make it plain and common enough. However, if I live, I shall beat Jerry Maddox."

But this minor annoyance was only one trivial cause of his moodiness.

The party presently came to a strong fence with a single panel half down. All took it, in turn, at the gap—all except Tom Herries. He diverged and selected a high and strong panel; he touched Flap-ear with the spurs, lifted him and went handsomely over.

"A good, and bold horseman," mused Minny Blair.

A word from the lady showed Tom that her criticism had been favorable; and this word chained him all the more surely to her side. As they rode on, Minny was forced to perceive that her lover was many times on the point of speaking, and that the subject which occupied him was quite too engrossing for his enjoyment of the chase.

"You have something to say to me, Mr. Herries," she said kindly.

"Yes," Tom answered; "but how did you know it, Miss Minny? It is kind of you to give me a chance of speaking what I have to say. I could never find courage to speak out on my legs; but on horseback it is different. I feel myself more of a man when I have a fast horse under me."

"Speak, Mr. Herries—I am listening."

"Miss Minny, the old folks have arranged that we are to be married. If any man in the world says that any man in the world—you see I hitch in what I had to say already; but I mean no man in the world ever loved a person more than I love you. Do you see the cabin there—to your left? I would give the best part of my life if you were a poor girl living there, that I might show how dearly I love you, by lifting you up to be my wife. Pardon me, Miss Minny, if I am too bold."

"We are to be man and wife, Mr. Herries," replied Minny coldly, "and, of course, you are not over-bold in saying that you love me."

"Thank you," sighed poor Tom, "but you talk so coldly, and look so sad, that I am afraid the old folks are forcing you to marry me. If so, say the word; I think I can manage the matter."

"How would you manage it, Mr. Herries?"

"By breaking my neck in this ride."

"He possesses generosity and courage," mused Minny. She smiled kindly, but gave no answer in words.

Riding side by side, the unmatched lovers took every obstacle with equal strides; the chase had kept a direct line; only Major Wright and his elder daughter, Miss Boadicea, were well up with them. The crowd came in long-drawn array behind. The chase had continued an hour at a quick pace. Miss Araminta Wright, who surely would otherwise have been with the first, loitered with a lover—a young townsman who thought a gallop a dreadfully fast gait, and was by no means comfortable in a pair of close-fitting buck-skin breeches, which the same innovating Jerry Maddox had made for him.

Major Wright, observing Tom Herries and Minny Blair, said to himself:

"I never before thought 'em matched."

Then he shouted to them. They were fifty yards before him, but his voice was sharp and practised, and they heard him very well.

"Turn to the right—bear down."

Tom and the lady made no answer, but galloped straight on.

"Bear to the right," shouted the Major again. "The Deep Cut is half a mile ahead—just before you."

"I know that very well," Tom shouted back.

"I think I shall go over it, Major. Remember Rattlesnake Bob."

"Hold up—hold up," cried the old fox-hunter.

"It is a real gulf—thirty feet across, and fifty feet deep. Turn you fool—turn to the right."

"Rattlesnake Bob rode at a gully thirty feet wide," answered Tom, without turning in his saddle.

"I exaggerated," screamed the Major. "Besides, he fell in. Stop—stop—for God's sake."

As he said this, Tom and Minny Blair, galloping over descending ground, came within view of the gully. It was indeed more than enough to justify Major Wright's remonstrance. The gathered waters of a wide extent of sloping country, contributed in rills, made a torrent here after every dashing rain, and had ploughed out not a mere gully but a frightful chasm.

"Do you mean to try that leap?" said Minny calmly, as she saw the gulf full in front, at a distance of some four hundred yards.

"Answer me one question," Tom Herries replied with fire in his eyes. "Do you love me, Miss Minny, or am I to marry you and break our hearts?" Tom reduced his speed as he spoke.

"Do not try the leap," said Minny. "I warn you."

"Yes or no." Tom raised his reins; the fire of his eyes burned brighter.

The mind will sometimes take in at a glance the full picture of life; condense thoughts and passions into the throb of a moment. Minny Blair, as Tom Herries spoke, sounded the present, and despaired of the future. Then a resolution, as swift as that with which Bianca Capello halved the poisoned cake and ate with her husband, took possession of her.

"Perhaps you are wise," she said. "Death is nothing."

Tom Herries saw the purpose of the gallant girl; a sudden appreciation of this sole fellowship of which she could assure him, made him furious with joy.

Major Wright, thundering on, screamed with a cracked voice:

"Stop—stop—you d—d fool."

Tom, now within a hundred yards of the chasm, answered:

"Good-bye, Major. Your fine story gave me this glorious idea."

"Be wary," almost whispered Minny Blair, with a sudden return to love of life. "It is possible to get over."

Flight and Flap-ear were within ten yards of the brink. The sharp whip of the lady stung the shoulder of the gallant mare. Flap-ear felt the grinding rowels tear his flanks. Then both bounded. Major Wright dashed a hand over his eyes to clear their vision. He saw the mare clinging to the opposite brink of the chasm, Minny bending forward in the saddle to aid her. His heart was in his mouth. But in another moment he found words. "Thank God," he said;—for he saw Flight rise with a struggle, which broke away several feet of the bank, and escape with her burthen. Tom Herries was not visible.

CHAPTER VI.

Major Wright, by a circuitous course, reached the bottom of the Deep Cut. He hurried to the spot which must have received the falling man and horse. He came near it; he gave that first eager look which we give with beating hearts, when we dash on to learn if life has become death. The horse was lying on his back, with his neck bent beneath him, and the foaming mouth turned up near the saddle. There could be no life with such a posture. At the distance of several feet from the dead horse lay the rider. Major Wright bent over him.

"Tom—Tom—my boy"—cried the old gentleman—"if there's any life left in you, for God's sake inform me of the fact."

Tom Herries made no answer. Major Wright called to his daughter, whose large-featured face, surrounded with superb red curls, he saw thrust forward beyond the brink above.

"Gallop down and head the crowd; bring Gaunt; you'll find him amongst the foremost; ride fast, you jade, ride fast."

As he spoke a shadow fell on the ground near him; he was kneeling with the head of Tom Herries on his arm; as he looked up from this posture he saw Minny Blair coming to join him. The red face of the immense gully was in most parts nearly precipitous, but Minny had chosen her path well, and the nimble-footed girl was presently at the bottom.

"If the boy is dead," said Major Wright, "a good rider, and a bold fellow has gone to his account."

"And a generous and true-hearted man"—added Minny Blair, with white lips, as she sought with tremulous fingers for the pulses of life.

"See how this arm falls," said the Major; "and here is a bloody cut on the head. Look at his neck. It is as white as your own, and as round as a column. And his breast here—what muscle the boy shows!"

Minny searched the wound on the head, cleansed it of the clay, and bound it up with the kerchief from her neck. Then with no feminine fastidiousness she placed her fingers upon the natural surface above poor Tom's heart.

Meanwhile Miss Boadicea, with fast riding, had overtaken Dr. Gaunt. Long, slim, sallow, high-cheeked, with hat aslant from the stress of the wind, and skirts puffed wide, loose-riding and enthusiastic, the good Doctor took his fences and snuff alternately and with equal precipitation. He reminded one, in some points, of Punch's imagination of Lord Brougham hunting the wild boar at his French chateau. Miss Boadicea, overtaking, laid violent hands on him.

"You must come, Doctor. Mr. Herries is hurt. Father sends for you."

"In five minutes—the fox will be down in four," remonstrated Dr. Gaunt.

Miss Boadicea, with a "gentle force," wrenched the old gentleman's hand from its hold on the reins, drew these over his horse's ears, and led him at a canter to a place of descent into Deep Cut. Dr. Gaunt took snuff out of his waistcoat pocket, like Napoleon.

When the Doctor had examined Tom Herries in silence, for a minute, he said:

"Life is still in him."

Major Wright snorting like one of his horses, blew off a thousand motes of trouble. But he quickly asked—

"Will life stay in him?"

"Get him up," answered Dr. Gaunt; "get him up without a rub. We may save him."

"Thank God," escaped Minny's lips, with a subdued sob.

News of the fall into the Deep Cut had reached the hunting party at various stages of the chase. Some were already at hand to aid in getting Tom Herries up: When this had been accomplished, Dr. Gaunt plied his art with judgment. In a short time plain signs of returning animation appeared. At last the lips moved, and the eyes opened.

"The left arm is broken, and the cut on the head has let out a great deal of blood," said the Doctor. "But the bleeding has saved the brain. If there is no serious internal damage, we will make him all right again. Go some of you to the next cabin and bring the door and a bed. What an escape to be sure! He must have been terribly stunned," concluded the old gentleman as he looked over, and down, into Deep Cut.

"If the boy is alive this day month," said Major Wright with a fine energy, "I'll give him such a dinner as will put the county under the table; and, Gaunt, we'll drink his health before a tip-top appreciating company as a fine, dashing, dare-devil fellow. We will. I have made up my mind. After that," added Major Wright, "never say die."

"We must bring him through," said the Doctor enthusiastically.

"And this dear young lady," the Major continued, "has positively succeeded in doing what this stout young fellow showed a glorious spirit in only attempting. The mare beats the world at a level leap. We must meet here shortly to measure the distance accurately. We must also look about for some expert writer to put the young lady and her mare into a spirited description. Gaunt—if it wouldn't disturb Tom, I should like very much to make myself comfortable with a shout or two."

By this time a door and bed had been procured; Tom, placed on these, was borne homeward. Minny Blair remained with Miss Boadicea, whilst a servant went after Flight, who browsed beyond the gully. As they waited, Miss Araminta approached with her lover. They came on, now swiftly, now cautiously—cantering and walking by turns—like the measure of Mr. Poe's Ulalume. The young gentleman from town was in a gay humor. The pair had heard nothing of the misadventure—love is so engrossing. When the owner of the uncomfortable buckskins was enlightened, and looked, craning, into the depths of Deep Cut, his whiskers stood on end, and his boots rattled in the stirrups.

Miss Blair, once more in the saddle, bade the young ladies adieu, and turned Flight's head.

"Won't you ride home with us?" suggested Miss Araminta politely.

"You must excuse me," answered the poor girl, only slowly recovering a firm tone. "I ride after Mr. Herries."

The young ladies stared.

"Well, I thought Miss Minny detested Tom Herries!" said Miss Boadicea.

"They are lovers. Love—love!" sighed Miss Araminta, looking affectionately upon the young gentleman from town.

"Do your ladies," inquired this latter, who had conceived, from her unimpressed demeanor, that Miss Blair appreciated himself too lightly—"do your ladies ride off, in this way, after their sweethearts, as a general thing? But a person who could bring herself to take such a jump as this, over such a terribly deep place, is capable of the most extravagant actions."

Minny Blair, unconconscious of this censure, galloped away, saying:

"To-day has made a great change in my views."

Some hundred yards before her Dr. Gaunt and Major Wright rode, one on each side of Tom Herries.

"What are you thinking of, Gaunt?" said the Major. "Does the boy's case look worse?"

"No—he does well enough," replied Dr. Gaunt. He added after a sigh—"We lost the best end of the run. What became of the fox, gentlemen?"

[To be Continued.]

A VISION OF LIFE.

I heard upon the plain of life
A strange and thrilling sound,—
And louder still the anthem grew,
Deepening and swelling round;
A tone of hope—a tone of joy,—
From the heart of youth it broke,
And it swelled and rolled triumphantly
As the glad New Year awoke.

I saw a youthful throng appear,
Like the billows of the ocean,
Swelling and heaving everywhere
With a torrent's wild commotion;
And deeper grew the golden haze,
And louder pealed the song,
As swiftly to the measured tune
Their footsteps glanced along.

I saw a maiden's airy form
As it floated softly by,
And love was on her smiling lip
And gladness in her eye;

She moved, in festal robes arrayed,
Amid that joyous train,
And sweetest of the heart-tones there
Arose her sweet refrain.

And blending with those thrilling tones
In cadence soft and deep,
The heart of one beside her there
Did measured sweetness keep;
They heeded not the gladsome crowd,
But onward, hand in hand,
They walked beneath a golden bow
That brightly o'er them spanned.

The joyous train swept swiftly by,
The music died away—
And fainter grew the golden haze,
As fades the sunset ray;
There fell a darkness on mine eye,
And a stillness on my heart,
As I caught the music's dying swell,
And saw the light depart.

But again a solemn sound arose
All fitfully and low,—
'Twas a wail of disappointed hope,—
'Twas a cry of grief and woe!
Afar and faint at first it rose,
Then grew more loud and clear,
As again the train of youth came on
To hail another year.

All darkly, like a torrent's roll,
It swept before my sight—
Unheard the joyous melody,
Unseen the golden light.
And they who sang the song of love
Beneath the golden bow,
Sang they the blissful numbers still?—
Walked they together now?

I saw him not—but far away—
Amid the troubled throng
I heard a tone like unto his—
A light and careless song!
But deep and mournful was the wail
That her full spirit poured,
Like the murmur of a stricken lyre
When the tempest wrings each chord.

Undying love was in its tone.
Whence all of hope had fled;
It mingled with a mournful strain—
A wailing for the dead,
And onward still she feebly pressed
With footsteps sad and slow,
With a drooping form, and a pale, pale cheek,
And the mourner's garb of woe.

There was the shock of a heavy knell,
And a weight of sullen gloom—
And a coffin slowly passed me by,
And before me rose a tomb.
A silence hushed the solemn throng
As noiselessly they sped,
A mist arose before my sight,—
The phantom forms were fled!

Schiller's Correspondence with Korner.

FROM 1784 TO THE DEATH OF SCHILLER.

Part First; From 1784 to 1788.

TRANSLATED BY S. E. BROWNELL.

THE CORRESPONDENCE between Schiller, the most widely popular, the most European of all Teutonic writers, and the lamented author of the LYRE AND SWORD, whose thrilling, patriotic songs are dear and familiar to all German ears and hearts, having recently been given to the public, we have thought that American readers would perhaps not unwillingly share in the legacy of these noble minds. This correspondence, covering nearly the whole of Schiller's life as an author, is characterized by the warmest and noblest mutual esteem and regard, and by a singular and earnest devotion to all literary, philosophical and artistic pursuits. The letters of Schiller, in particular, are marked by a hearty frankness, often by a fervid impetuosity of feeling, clearly indicating the source of many of his earlier productions. In general, this correspondence will be found to contain the freest and fullest expression of the private and personal feelings and sentiments of these gifted men, any where upon record. In this respect, these letters differ widely from the "Correspondence between Schiller and Goethe," a volume of which recently appeared. The heart as well as intellect, is here brought fully into play, and we read the unreserved communications of the sincerest friendship.

Many of Schiller's favorite moral and aesthetic theories, and numerous criticisms, hints and suggestions of both poets, will be found in this correspondence. Indeed, except "Goethe's Conversations with Eckerman," we know of no running commentary upon German literature by any means to be compared with this.

The origin of this correspondence is not less beautiful than characteristic. "Some days ago," says Schiller, "I met with a very flattering surprise. There came to me, out of Leipzig, from unknown hands, four parcels and as many letters, written with the highest enthusiasm towards me, and overflowing with poetical devotion. They were accompanied by four miniature portraits, two of which are of very beautiful young ladies, and by a pocket-book sewed in the finest taste. Such a present, from people who can have no interest in it, but to let me know that they wish me well, and thank me for some cheerful hours, I prize extremely; the loudest applause of the world could scarcely have flattered me so agreeably."

These unknown friends were at length discovered to be, the poet Körner, his friend Huber, and the fair ladies to whom they were respectively betrothed, Minna and Dora Stock. The miniatures were executed by the latter, whilst the pocket-book was the work of the former: both ladies are mentioned by Goethe as among his life-long friends, and Dora is called an excellent artist.

In conclusion, may we express the hope that the friendly words and relation of these noble and gifted beings may not be without effect upon our minds and hearts, leading us away from all unworthy aims and vain pursuits and contentions, to a life of helpful goodness, and of true, earnest endeavor.

LETTER I.

JUNE, 1784.

At a time when art is daily becoming more and more the venal slave of a rich and powerful sensualism, it is well that a great man steps forth and shows what man is still adequate to accomplish. The better portion of mankind, who have long been disgusted with their age, who, in the crowd of degenerate productions, still longed for something genuine and great, now quench their thirst, feeling within an emotion that raises them above their contemporaries, and strength imparted on their toilsome path towards each worthy aim. Gladly, therefore, would such press the hand of their benefactor, would permit him to see in their eyes the tears of joy and enthusiasm—that they might strengthen and encourage him also, should he ever be in doubt whether his contemporaries are worthy that he should labor for them. It is for this reason that I, with three others, who are not altogether unworthy to read your works, have united to express to you our thanks and grateful homage. For proof whether I understand you, I have attempted to compose music to one of your songs.* Besides the method I have chosen, two others were admissible: each strophe might have been arranged differently, or at least with the melodies; for the first and third, for the second and fourth, and for the last. But neither seemed to me well suited to a song introduced for its own sake. Variations with respect to time, movement, strength and softness, belong naturally to each verse; and those introduced are merely such as were indispensable.

* This is the song of AMELIA, in the first Scene of the third Act of the ROBBERS.

If I, although in a different field, have shown that I also belong to the salt of the earth, then may you know my name; now it could avail nothing.

II.

MANHEIM, 7th Dec., 1784.

Never can you forgive me, my most valued friends, that to your letters so full of friendship, breathing so much enthusiasm towards myself, accompanied also by those precious tokens of your goodness,—I could remain seven months silent. I confess to you, it is with blushing shame, that abashes me even before myself, that I write this letter, and that, like a culprit, I cast down my eyes before your portraits, which at this instant seem to be indued with life, and to accuse me. Certainly, my excellent and fair friends, the shame and embarrassment which I now suffer is punishment enough. Do not seek to inflict any other. But allow me a few words—not to excuse this unheard of negligence, but in order to render it, in some manner, conceivable.

Your letters, which gave me unspeakable joy, and relieved in the most agreeable manner an hour in my life, found me in the saddest humor at heart, of which I can, by letter, give no account. The state of my mind at that time was not that in which one gladly and for the first time brings one's self before such persons as I conceive you to be. Your flattering opinion of me was, indeed, only an agreeable illusion, yet I was weak enough to wish that it might not all too soon pass away. Therefore, dear friends, I deferred my answer till a happier hour, to a visit of my better genius, when in a more genial mood my heart should be open to better feelings. Those quiet hours have never yet arrived, and in the sad series of vexations and disappointments, my heart at length became dried up to friendship and joy. Unhappy distractions, the thought of which still wounds, by degrees obliterated the purpose from my mind. An accident, a gloomy evening, suddenly reminds me of you, and of my own misconduct; I hasten to my writing-table to apologize to you, dear friends, for this shameful neglect, which from my heart I know not how to explain to myself. How painful must be to you the thought of having loved one who could make such a return for your generous goodness! How must you have allowed yourselves to repent of a kindness performed towards the most ungrateful of men! But no; ~~that I have never been,~~ and will never be. Could I believe that you still retained only a few sparks of that warmth which you formerly cherished towards me, I would demand that you should put my heart to the severest test, and allow me by some means to retrieve my past neglect.

But enough of an affair in which I have played so sorry a part.

When I confess to you that your letters and presents were the most agreeable of aught that has happened to me either before or since in the whole period of my authorship, that their joyful appearance indemnified me for the many painful trials which attended me in youth, that, (I say not too much,) you may ascribe it to yourselves if I recall the curse upon my luckless calling of poet, extorted from my heart by the contradictions of my fate;—when I say this to you, I know that you will not repent of your kindness towards me. If such men, such beautiful souls, reward not the poet, who then shall reward him.

I had hoped, not without grounds, to see you this year face to face, whilst there was a prospect of my going to Berlin. The occurrence of certain circumstances must postpone this, at least for a year; yet it might come about that I shall visit Leipzig at the fair. What a joyful moment could I meet you there, and your real presence eclipse even the joyful recollection of your images!—Mina and Dora must let it pass should they surprise me amid my new poetic ideals, with a little theft upon their images.

I know not whether you, my most valued friends, will consider me, after my past conduct, as worthy of a continuation of your regards, and of a farther correspondence, yet I beg it of you with all warmth. Only a more intimate acquaintance with me and my peculiar manner of being, can restore to you some shadow of that idea which you once conceived of me. I have enjoyed few pleasures in life, but, (and this is the proudest I can say of myself,) I owe those few to my heart.

You here receive something new from my pen, the announcement of a Journal. It may surprise you that I should play also this part in the world, but perhaps it may yet be reconciled to your ideas. Besides, the German public compels its author to make his election not according to the aim of his genius, but the speculations of the trade. I shall bestow upon this Thalia all my powers; still I do not deny, could I have acted independently of pecuniary considerations, I should have employed them in another sphere.

Could I, by a few lines, be assured of your forgiveness, a second letter would follow this in quick succession. Ladies are sometimes less forgiving than men; therefore must I read the pardon subscribed also by their fair hands.

With unfailing esteem,

Yours,

SCHILLER.

CHARACTER OF "FESTUS."

"A POEM."

Who has not heard of "Festus?" It has won
Its way into the Literary World,
Spite of its faults, by the sheer force of Genius;
Till it stands side by side with "The Excursion,"
Even in Giffillan's judgment, and above it,
As the great Poem of this century,
In the esteem of others, who still dread
Its influence for Evil. While the world
Is thus divided on it, let me speak
My own opinion in your listening ear.

It is a book sacred in its Intention—
And should for this receive our just respect,
Whatever perilous errors it contains.
Few like its author under twenty years,
Endowed with Poetry's divinest gifts,
Have aimed so high and worthily as he,
To serve God sacredly as "Poet Priest."
And few thus aiming, have brought such rich fruits
Of three years' toil, and offered them to God.
Yet should he have more sacredly remembered
The Law and Testimony of God's word,
In entering on a labor so august,
Above the reach of Arch-Angelic reason;
Nor offered aught to God in sacrifice,
But Truth from Heaven descended, and declared
Alone accepted by the God of Truth.
The first-born son of Adam failed in this;
And his rich offering, on God's altar laid,
Fruit of his toil and sweat, young Nature's pride
And clustering glory, won not Heaven's regard.

It is a book of rare Imagination—
Vast, daring, strong, rich, tender, beautiful.
Like Dante or like Milton in its range
Exploring Heaven, Earth, Air, Sea, Centre, Hell,
All visible things, and all invisible;
Inspired, creative; brightening, beautifying;
Yet dazzling sometimes and bewildering
Like a mock sun upon the lofty tops
Of snow-clad mountains, to the traveller.
Yet when it stoops to paint the living world
Of Nature, in communion with the thoughts
And sentiments of pure and noble souls,
How true its touch, how free, and yet how firm!
How all the beauties of creation rise
Fresh as the morning, delicate as dew,
Gay as the flowers, and glorious as the streams,
Rich as the music of the birds and breeze,
Solemn as Night, with shadows and with stars,
And silent thoughts of worlds beyond the grave,
And Him who dwelleth in Eternity!
How nations rise with their peculiar traits!
How pass before us all the castes of men!
How every type of feeling and of creed,
Finds its fit time and tongue of utterance!
And Woman, lovely Woman! how she smiles
Upon us in her every phase of Beauty!
Now pure as Clara, true as Angela,
Tender as Marian, passionate as Eliasa,
Witty and wise and musical as Helen:
But trustful, fond, and ever faithful still,
Exalted by religious sentiment,
And loving on, in hope of love forever!

It is a book sublime in its Religion—
 Treating of God's mysterious Providence,
 In the probation of Immortal Mind ;
 The Ministry of Evil, and its End—
 The high perfection of the Soul Elect.
 In almost all its glowing sentiments
 Most orthodox, most evangelical ;
 Yet through "philosophy and vain deceit,"
 Erring with mighty Origen of old,
 In love with "charitable heresies."
 As if there could be aught of Charity,
 In contradiction to the Truth of God,
 And the pure Morals which his dying son
 Sealed with the Sanctions of Eternity !
 Yet there are bursts of eloquent love and pride,
 Throughout, most true to the experience
 Of saints who lived on earth the life of Heaven,
 Mingling devoutly with the sweetest strains
 Of Moses, David, Paul, Isaiah and John ;
 Broken only by a bold irreverence
 At times, engendered from another source,
 Of which no likeness can be found in them,
 Which jars harsh discord on the Heaven-tuned heart.

It is a book of deep Philosophy—
 Profound in insight, clear and luminous
 In exposition. Pregnant passages
 Appear on almost every page, condensed
 Into a single line. Not much-tried Job,
 Nor all experimenting Solomon,
 Seem richer in proverbial wisdom, fit
 For all the multifarious scenes of life,
 Yet leading onward to eternity,
 And radiant with the glory of the Lord.
 And there are subtlest reasonings—first at war
 With Guilty Passion in its Protean forms,
 Then warmed and warped by Evils they assail,
 And wrecked like some strong line of battle ship
 By the explosion of a magazine,
 On sudden thunder gust from day o'er hot.

It is a book whose high Dramatic power
 At times approaches Shakspeare—on a theme
 More sweet than Romeo and Juliet,
 More spiritual than the Midsummer Dream,
 Far more magnificent and tragical
 Than haunted Hamlet, or forsaken Lear,
 Or duped Othello, or blood-stained Macbeth.
 Yet strangely turning Tragedy to Farce,
 The solemn Tragedy of Human time,
 The last great Judgment and its sure awards !
 The highest aim of its delineations
 Is not, like that of Shakspeare, to portray Man as he is—the evil and the good,
 As they are found commingled in the world,
 In all diversities of character
 Distinct and individual—and their end
 In harmony therewith, at least hereafter,
 Under the moral government of God—
 But to combine all characters in one,
 A soul elect of God, exalted, pure,
 By the All Holy sanctified ; yet proud,
 Tempted, deceived, and with perverted mind,
 Still doing evil, hoping good may come !
 To link the Christ of God with Belial !
 Mould stubborn, unassimilating facts
 To this fond theory—most perilous
 In lofty souls—most certain to corrupt
 The baser sort to ruin—yet promise all,
 Both good and bad, including Lucifer,

A common destiny in endless bliss !
 What more could Satan promise, for his ends,
 When, to deceive, arrayed in robes of light ?

The root of all its most imposing errors
 Is a "God-fixed Necessity" of Sin.
 From this false postulate, advanced in form
 As if self-evident, or subtly argued
 Not only from the lips of Lucifer,
 Or tempted Festus, but, most horrible !
 From his angelic mother in the skies—
 Spring the rank weeds and poisonous flowers amid
 The pure blooms of a Paradise of God,
 Here planted by a master Poet's hand.
 This once eradicated by the power
 Of Christian Wisdom, all beside is pure,
 And sweet as pure, like Eden at its birth.
 The morning mists of Error cleared away,
 Great truths appear in Earth and in the Heavens,
 Shining in sunlight with a diamond brightness,
 And pure bright Truth is, and must be, immortal !

Lexington, Va. Dec. 1, 1848.

HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER.

Henry St. George Tucker, who lately died at Winchester, in the 68th year of his age, was born at Matoax, in the county of Chesterfield, on the 29th of December 1780. His father, St. George Tucker, was a native of the Island of Bermuda ; and having been educated at the College of William & Mary, he remained in Virginia where he, in the course of a long life, filled several high judicial offices, as that of Professor of Law, and where he married Mrs. Randolph, the mother of John Randolph, of Roanoke, as well as of the subject of the present notice. This lady, much celebrated for her beauty, wit and force of character, died at the early age of 36.

When Judge Henry Tucker was about nine years of age his father was appointed Professor of Law in William & Mary, and consequently became a resident of Williamsburg. His son there went through a thorough course of classical instruction, first in the Grammar school attached to the college, and then in the College itself, under the Rev. Mr. Bracken, the senior Professor of Humanity.

On obtaining a license to practise law in 1802, Mr. Tucker settled in Winchester, where, in 1806, he married Miss Hunter. He was very successful in his profession ; and, in 1807, he was elected to the State Legislature. In two or three speeches on important subjects at the ensuing session, he acquired a high reputation for political independence as well as ability.

In the war with great Britain, a few years afterwards, he raised a volunteer troop of cavary, and was at Baltimore when the British were there repulsed in 1814. It may be inferred that his military career, though brief, was meritorious, from the facts that in the succeeding year he was elected to Congress, and in the year after was appointed by the Legislature Brigadier General.

He continued four years in Congress, where, among his intimate associates, were his brother, John Randolph, Mr. Lowndes, Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Clay and Mr. Bolling Robertson of Louisiana. As chairman of a committee he made an argumentative report, in which he maintained that Congress possessed the power, under the Constitution, to construct roads and canals, with the consent of the States they pass through. He was also one of those republicans who voted in 1816 in favor of a Bank of the United States, then deemed indispensable by Mr. Dallas, to reestablish a sound currency throughout the union, and to secure the collection of the national revenue.

These views of the Constitution, as frankly avowed as they were deliberately and conscientiously formed were in conflict with the opinions of the politicians then in the ascendant in his native State, and they probably decided his subsequent destiny as a public man. There is good reason to believe that they more than once prevented his election to the Senate of the United States, and his appointment to the Federal Supreme Court.

The memorable law by which members of Congress were to receive a fixed salary of $1,500 per annum, instead of a per diem allowance of six dollars, passed while he was a member. He not only voted against it, but after it passed, with a fastidious honor, he refused to receive the extra allowance which yet remains in the Treasury. In this course it is believed that he stood alone.

In 1819 he quitted Congress to return to the practice of the law, and in 1823-4 he was appointed Chancellor for the Winchester District. In the following year he established a law school, to which his reputation soon attracted students from every part of the State, and even from other States. He had afterwards the pleasure of seeing among those who had been his pupils several who took a leading part in the councils of their country.

This school was continued until 1831, when he was appointed President of the Court of Appeals. As he was now compelled to pass most of his time in Richmond, he, after a while, became a resident of that city. In the year that he received the last appointment, General Jackson offered him the place of Attorney General, which, on his refusal, was afterwards given to Mr. Taney, now the Chief Justice of the United States. Ten years afterwards he was induced to accept the professorship of law in the University of Virginia, which office he had previously refused in the life time of Mr. Jefferson. In this situation he did not long enjoy health, and in four years, the progress of his disease compelled him to resign. He lingered three years longer, and terminated his busy, well-spent life on the 28th day of August last.

To a very pleasing exterior, both in face and figure, Judge Tucker added an address and manners that are rarely equalled; for besides being a strict observer of the conventional rules of good breeding, he possessed that higher order of politeness which nothing but genuine benevolence and great delicacy of tact can give. Perhaps his most striking characteristic was an affectionate disposition; and it was his never-failing flow of kindness, and desire to see others happy, that so admirably fitted him for all the duties of fireside life. Certainly no one ever discharged those of husband, parent, master, or friend, more cordially, more faithfully, or with better grace. The love he so fervently felt, was, as is usual, cordially reciprocated, and in some instances amounted almost to idolatry.

Such was his very amiable temper as well as scrupulous propriety, that when a personal altercation arose in the House of Representatives between his brother, Mr. Randolph and Mr. Robertson, of Louisiana, he maintained his friendly relations with Mr. Robertson without giving offence to the very irritable and somewhat exacting disposition of his brother.

But with all this blandness of feeling—this love of conciliation and peace—he never hesitated to differ from his political associates when his judgment told him they were wrong. It was thus that he had maintained the federal power to make roads and canals; had voted for an United States Bank; and had opposed the doctrine of nullification, though he was one of Mr. Calhoun's most devoted friends. But while he thus fearlessly differed from his party on particular occasions, agreeing with them in the main, he remained attached to them and voted with them through life.

His mind, while it was vigorous, discriminating and comprehensive, was yet more distinguished for its polish and its exquisite taste. His style was at once easy, natural and graceful. Both in speaking and writing, perspicuity, elegance and good sense were the predominant qualities. While he conducted a law school he published two volumes of commentaries on the laws of Virginia, which soon became a handbook for the practitioner in that State, and still so continua. This work, and a few of his lectures delivered at the University of Virginia, and some fugitive essays, are the only monuments he has left of his professional or literary talent. He had a very ready talent at versification, which was often exercised for the gratification of the social circle he so adorned. His taste for classical studies continued through life. His essays at Latin composition, intended only for the eye of his friends, were very respectable. In no pursuit of life did he succeed better than as a law lecturer; and while he instructed the minds of his pupils, his courtesy and almost paternal kindness, never failed to win their hearts.

Until Judge Tucker had passed the age of sixty, his life had been unusually prosperous and happy. But his last few years were overclouded by disease, and the anxieties attending a lawsuit of a peculiarly vexatious character. His malady was a species of epilepsy, of a mild description indeed, but evidently impairing his memory, and, in some degree, the vigor of his mind. Of this he was not unconscious, and the fear of the loss of his mental faculties, forever haunted his imagination, until life became a burden to him. Sensibly declining in body and mind, he earnestly wished for death as the best of the alternatives presented to him, and he met his end with a firmness and resignation which never deserted him. He left a widow, two daughters and six sons, and it soothed his last moments to be surrounded by all those cherished objects of his affection.

Few men had as many warm personal friends; and, judging of others' charity by his own, he not long ago said to a friend, that he "flattered himself he had not an enemy in the world." Certainly the memory of no one could be more venerated by those to whom he was best known; and to them, it is feared, that this small tribute from one who loved him, will appear altogether inadequate to his merits.

THE CRUSADER'S SERENADE.

The sweet star that is beaming on evening's still sky,
To my fancy appeareth less bright than thine eye,
And thy musical tones are more pleasant to me,
Than the warbling of songsters from thicket and tree.

On thy cheek are the tints of the beautiful flower,
That blooms o'er the vine-covered sides of thy bower,
And graceful and fair as a spirit of light,
Thy form ever riseth to gladden my sight.

Sweet maid of the tower, adieu to thy charms,
For the tumult of camps and the clangor of arms;
By the side of my loved-one forever I'd stay,
But a vision of glory has called me away.

A loud summons is borne like a blast o'er the sea,
'The tomb of the Just from the Moslem to free,
O'er Jerusalem's walls where the crescent doth gleam,
The flag of the "red cross" in triumph shall stream.

Farewell to thee! maid of the tower! farewell!

There are pangs of the heart which the tongue cannot tell—
And such the deep grief of his bosom must be,
Who is torn in his spirit's devotion from thee.

FROM OUR PARIS CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS, December, 1848.

In this letter I shall not trouble you with politics. The prediction of woes yet to fall upon France from the election of Louis Napoleon, the account of the spread of democracy on the continent, its excesses, the flight of the Pope from Rome, the civil wars of Germany, the abdication of Ferdinand of Austria,—all these, I take it, will interest the generality of your readers less than a chapter from Chateaubriand's posthumous work, particularly concerning the United States. A few months after the death of Chateaubriand, which occurred 4th July last, the journal the Presse commenced the publication of his "Memoires d'outré-tombe," or "Memoirs from beyond the tomb." The reproduction of these Memoirs in any other form being forbidden by the company to which the copyright belongs, they have not yet appeared in regular volumes. The fleeting, but popular feuilleton of the Presse is eagerly resorted to by the enthusiastic admirers of the illustrious deceased. Four years ago the Presse purchased the right of first publishing these Memoirs, upon the condition that the publication should not be commenced till after the death of the author. The price then paid for this privilege is understood to have been 96,000 francs, (about $19,000.) Chateaubriand was never so highly thought of abroad as in France. Though for many years he has lived a perfectly retired life, taking no part, and apparently no interest, in the events transpiring around him, he was regarded with a veneration little short of worship. The Memoirs, if what has yet been published may be taken as a criterion for the whole, will hardly bring a great accession to his world-wide fame. A chapter devoted to the United States I am about to translate for the Messenger. It was written, as appears by the date, in 1822. It is curious as a critique upon the United States and their institutions. It is interesting as issuing from the illustrious Chateaubriand, but possesses very little value as the result of the reflections of a sage and philosopher. It bears too evidently the mark of the political school in which the author received his early and abiding impressions. I doubt if any one can read the chapter, even remembering the date, A. D., 1822, without a smile, which the illustrious author of the "Mémoires d'outre-tombe" would deem any thing but complimentary.

He says touching these Memoirs, in the preface written 14th April, 1846, that hard necessity, which through his whole life had kept foot upon his throat, had compelled him to sell them. "Nobody can know what I suffered in being obliged to mortgage my tomb." His design had been to leave the Memoirs to Madame de Chateaubriand; who would have used her discretion in publishing or suppressing them. If he were still master of them he would, he says, either keep them in manuscript, or forbid their publication till after the lapse of fifty years. "The Memoirs have been written," he continues, "at different epochs and in different countries. Hence the necessary prologues which describe the places where I happened to be and the thoughts which occupied me at the moment of resuming the thread of my narrative. It is thus that the changing forms of my life are mingled one with another. In my moments of prosperity I have had to speak of my days of adversity: and in deep affliction I have had to wander back to and describe my hours of happiness. My youth penetrating my old age, the grave experience of years saddening the frivolity of youth, the rays of my sun, from its aurora to its setting, crossing and mingling with each other, have produced in my recital a sort of confusion, or if you please, a sort of undefinable unity. My cradle has something of my tomb: my tomb has something of my cradle. My sufferings become pleasures, my pleasures, pains, so that after reading my Memoirs I hardly know whether they proceed from a brown or a hoary head. I know not whether this mélange will please or displease. There was no help for it. It is the fruit of the inconstancy of my fate. The tempests have often left me no table whereon to write save the breakers which wrecked me. I have been urged to publish during my life certain portions of these Memoirs. I prefer to speak from my grave. My narrative will then be accompanied by those voices which are sacred, because they issue from the tomb. If I have suffered sufficiently in this world to become a blessed shade, in the next, a ray darting from the Elysian Fields, shall shed upon my last pictures a protecting light. Life becomes me ill. Perhaps death will be more graceful." M. Chateaubriand then with a volubility and want of sequence which I must think find their excuse rather in his seventy-eight years, than in the necessities under which he was writing, quotes with ostentatious humility a flattering letter from the Mayor of St. Malo, written 10 October, 1831, informing him that a romantic spot on the sea-shore, near that town, which he desired to have for a grave, had been finally secured for him: and he thus concludes his preface—"I shall rest then beside the sea I have so much loved! If my decease takes place out of France, I desire that my body shall not be brought back to my country till fifty years shall have elapsed from the date of my death. Let my remains be protected from sacrilegious autopsy. Let no one take the trouble to seek in my icy brain and in my extinguished heart, the mystery of my being. Death reveals not the secrets of life. The idea of a corpse travelling post is horrible to me. Bleached and light bones may be easily transported. They will be less fatigued during this last journey than when I was wearily dragging them hither and thither, laden with my sorrows."

If the above extract had formed a portion of his last will and testament, or if it had found place in a diary, the private record of current thoughts and feelings, never intended to meet the public eye, it would have legitimately claimed the sympathy and respect of the reader. But it was written only two years ago, the matter of the grave having been determined seventeen years ago. He knew that a few weeks after his death it would be published as the feuilleton of a newspaper. Was he, like Alexander Dumas and the other feuilletonists of the Parisian press, striving to furnish so many hundred lines in consideration of the ninety-six thousand francs received? or is it simply to be deemed the egotistic garrulity of second childhood? I adopt the latter hypothesis as the most respectful to the memory of Chateaubriand.

Before proceeding with the extract of his chapter on the United States, let me aid him in giving publicity to the correction of an error into which he had led the world respecting his name and age. Chateaubriand, it seems, was an author of world-wide reputation before he knew his own name or age. He publishes verbatim an extract from the register of births of the commune of St. Malo, where he was born, and remarks after it—"It is perceived that I have been mistaken in my published works, wherein I state myself to have been born the 14th October, instead of the 4th October, 1768. My given names are François René, and not François Auguste."

He farther gives some interesting information touching the origin of his family name. It turns out to be a much more common name in the United States than most of us had supposed. I add a passage upon this subject :

"My name was originally written Brien, afterwards Briant and Briand, as French orthography changed. William  Brittany writes Castum-Briani. There is not a name of France which does not offer these changes of letters. The Brien family towards the beginning of the eleventh century, gave their name to a considerable chateau in Brittany, and this chateau became the chief-place of the Barony of Chateaubriand. The arms of Chateaubriand were originally pommes de pin,* with the motto, "Je sème For." † Geoffry, baron of Chateaubriand, accompanied St. Louis to the Holy Land. Made prisoner at the battle of Massoure, he returned home, and his wife Sybill died of joy and surprise upon beholding him again. St. Louis to recompense his services, granted to Geoffry and his heirs in place of his ancient coat-of-arms a shield of gules, strewed with fleurs de lys of gold. Cui et ejus hæredibus, attest the records of the priory of Bérbe, sanctus Ludovicus tum Francorum rex, propter ejus probitatem in armis flores lili aurii, loco pomorum pini aurii contulit."

I will delay no longer the chapter on the United States. It was in 1790-91 that Chateaubriand visited our country.

"Memoirs from Beyond the Tomb."

BY CHATEAUBRIAND.

VOLUME II.

"London—from April to September 1822."

"Why is it that the solitudes of Erie and Ontario present themselves now to my imagination with a charm which the memory of the brilliant Bosphorus does not possess? The reason is, that when travelling in the United States I was yet full of illusions. The troubles of France were commencing at the same time with my own existence. Nothing was finished in me, nothing finished in my country. The memory of those days is sweet to me, because they recall associations of family and of youthful pleasures. Fifteen years later, after my travels in the Levant, the Republic, swollen with wrecks and with tears, had rushed, like a torrent of the deluge, into Despotism. I no longer amused myself with chimeras; my souvenirs, taking their origin thenceforth in society and in the passions, lost their virgin whiteness. Disappointed in my two pilgrimages to the West and to the East, I had not discovered the passage to the pole; I had not ravished glory from the banks of the Niagara, whither I had gone to seek her: and I had left her seated upon the ruins of Athens.

First a traveller in America, then a soldier in Europe, I pursued to the end neither of these careers. An Evil Genius snatched from me the staff and the sword, and placed in my hand the pen.

It was after fifteen other years had rolled by that I found myself in Sparta, gazing one night upon the heavens, and thinking of the countries which had formerly witnessed my peaceful or troubled slumbers. Amid the forests of Germany, upon the heaths of England, on the fields of Italy, in mid-ocean, and in the woods of Canada, I had hailed the same stars which I then saw burning over the country of Helen and Menelaus. But why complain to the stars, those unmoving witnesses of my wandering destiny? One day they will cease to be weary with watching me: and now, indifferent to my fate, I will not ask of these stars to shed upon it a sweeter influence, or to restore to me that portion of life which the traveller leaves in the regions which he visits.

Were I now to revisit the United States I should not recognize them. Where I left forests, I should find cultivated fields: where I cleared me a path through the bush-wood, I should travel upon high-ways. At Natchez, where stood the hut of Celuta, now stands a city of five thousand inhabitants. Chactas might be at present a member of Congress. I have recently received a pamphlet, printed among the Cherokees, which, in behalf of those savages, is addressed to me as a defender of the liberty of the press. There is among the Muscogees, the Seminoles, the Chickasaws, a City of Athens, another City of Marathon, another of Carthage, another of Memphis, another of Sparta, another of Florence. You find there a county of Columbia, a county of Marengo. The glory of all countries has placed a name in those very solitudes where I met father Aubry and the obscure Atala. Kentucky shows a Versailles, and a territory called Bourbon has a Paris for its capital. All the exiled and all the oppressed who have found refuge in America, have borne there the memory of their country.

* * * * * falsi Simeoentis ad undam
Libabat cineri Andromache.

The United States possess, under the protection of liberty, an image and a souvenir of nearly all the celebrated places of antiquity and of modern Europe. In the garden of his country-seat near Rome, Adrian caused to be imitated all the monuments of his empire.

* This means what we call the pine-burr, or cone of the pine tree: not the fruit pine-apple, a species of anana.

† I sow, strew or scatter gold.

Thirty-three highways now lead from Washington, as formerly Roman roads started from the capital. They end, after numerous ramifications, at the outer limits of the Union, and trace lines of communication 25,747 miles in length. Upon a great number of these roads posts are established. One may take the stage for Ohio or for Niagara, as in my time one took a guide or an Indian interpreter. The means of transport are two fold. Lakes and rivers exist every where connected by canals. One may travel, beside the highways, in row-boats and sail-boats, or in barges drawn by horses, or in steamers. Fuel is inexhaustible, for immense forests cover mines of coal rising to the very surface of the earth.

The population of the United States has increased every ten years from 1790 to 1820 at the rate of thirty-five per cent. It is presumed that in 1830 the population will amount to 12,875,000 souls. Continuing to double itself every twenty five years, in the year 1855 it will have reached 25,750,000, and twenty-five years later, in 1880 it will exceed 50,000,000.

This human sap is making the desert to bloom in every direction. The lakes of Canada, lately without sails, are now like docks where frigates and sloops of war, cutters and barques, are continually crossing the paths of the Indian skiffs and canoes, as the ships and galleys mingle with shallops, punks and long-boats in the waters of Constantinople. The Mississippi, the Missouri and the Ohio no longer flow in solitude. Ships ascend them. More than two hundred steam-boats impart animation to their banks.

This immense internal navigation, which alone would suffice to insure the prosperity of the United States, interrupts not at all their foreign commerce. Their ships traverse every sea, they are engaged in every species of adventure, bearing the star-spangled banner from the West to those shores of the East, which have never known other than the state of slavery.

To complete this surprising picture, one must figure to himself cities like Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Charleston, Savannah, New Orleans, lighted at night, filled with horses and carriages, adorned with Cafés, museums, libraries, dancing-rooms, theatres, and offering all the enjoyments of luxury.

Still you must not seek in the United States for that which distinguishes man from other created beings, for that which is his certificate of immortality, which is the ornament of his days. Letters are unknown in the new republic, although they are invited there by a crowd of literary institutions. The American has substituted positive for intellectual operations. But do not impute to inferiority his mediocrity in the Arts: for it is not in that quarter that he has directed his attention. Thrown by various causes upon a desert soil, agriculture and commerce have been the object of his care. One must provide the necessities of life before he can become a thinker. Before planting trees, he must fell the forest and till the earth. The original colonists, whose minds were so engrossed with religious controversies, carried, it is true, the passion for dispute into the bosom of these forests: but they had to proceed immediately, axe upon the shoulder, to the conquest of the wilds; and their only pulpit, in the intervals of labor, was the elm tree they were hewing. The Americans, as a people, have not passed through the several stages of age. They left in Europe their childhood and youth. The innocent accents of the cradle are unknown to them. They never tasted the sweets of the domestic fireside, unaccompanied with regret of a country they had never seen, which they were never to see; and whose charms, as recounted to them in stories, they sighed for in vain.

There is not in the new Continent either classic, romantic, or Indian literature. For classic literature the Americans have no models; for romantic they have no middle age; for Indian the Americans despise the savages and hold the forests in horror, as they would a prison in which it had been intended to confine them.

It is not therefore a substantive literature, a literature properly so called, that it is to be found in America. It is a literature of working-men, of merchants, of sailors, of tillers of the earth. The Americans only succeed in mechanics and the sciences, because the sciences have their material side. Franklin and Fulton seized lightning and steam for the benefit of men. It belonged to America to endow the world with the discovery, by the aid of which no continent can henceforth escape the researches of the navigator. Poetry and the imagination, cultivated by a very small number of men of leisure, are regarded in the United States as puerilities of the earliest and latest stages of life. But the Americans have never had an infancy, nor have they yet had an old age.

From this it results that the men engaged in serious studies must have necessarily taken an active part in the affairs of their country in order to obtain a knowledge of them. They must have been actors in their revolution. But it is sad to remark the prompt degeneracy of talent which has taken place from the earlier men of the American revolution to those of later days. Yet the latter immediately succeeded the former. The first presidents of the republic have a religious, simple, elevated, calm character, of which is found no trace in the bloody turmoils of our own republic and revolution. The solitude will which the Americans were surrounded reacted upon their own nature: and they worked out their liberty in silence. Washington's farewell address to the people of the United States might have been pronounced by the gravest personages of antiquity. "How far in the discharge of my official duties," says the General "I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have at least believed myself to be guided by them.

"Though, in reviewing the incidents of my administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my many defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest."

Jefferson, in his residence at Monticello, writes, after the death of one of his two children,

"My loss is great indeed. Others may lose of their abundance, but I, of my want, have lost even the half of all I had. My evening prospects now hang on the slender thread of a single life. Perhaps I may be destined to see even this last cord of parental affection broken."

Philosophy, rarely affecting, is so here to a sovereign degree. This is not the idle plaint of recluse who had never borne his part in the strifes of life. Jefferson died 4th July, 1826, in the 84th year of his age and the fifty-fourth of his country's independence. His remains repose beneath a single stone, having for epitaph only these words,

THOMAS JEFFERSON

*Author of the Declaration of Independence.

Pericles and Demosthenes had pronounced the funeral oration of the young Greeks who fell for a people which disappeared soon after them. Brackenridge, in 1827, celebrated the death of the young Americans from whose blood a people has started forth.

* M. Chateaubriand has not correctly quoted the inscription on Mr. Jefferson's tomb. It is as follows:

Here lies buried
THOMAS JEFFERSON

Author of the Declaration of American Independence,
Of the Statute of Virginia for Religious Freedom,
And Father of the University of Virginia.

There is a gallery of the portraits of distinguished Americans in four volumes octavo: and more singular still, a biography containing the lives of more than a hundred principal Indian chiefs. Logan, chief of Virginia, pronounced before Lord Dunmore these words:

"Colonel Cresap the last Spring, in cold blood and unprovoked, murdered all the relations of Logan not even sparing my women and children. There runs not a drop of my blood in the veins of any living creature. This called on me for revenge—I have sought it; I have killed many: I have fully glutted my vengeance. For my country I rejoice at the beams of peace. But do not harbor a thought that mine is the joy of fear. Logan never felt fear. He will not turn on his heel to save his life. Who is there to mourn for Logan? Not one."

Without loving nature the Americans have applied themselves to the study of Natural History. Townsend, starting from Philadelphia, has traversed a-foot the regions which separate the Atlantic from the Pacific ocean, and committed to a diary his numerous observations. Thomas Say, a traveller in Florida, and among the Rocky Mountains, has published a work upon American entomology. Wilson, a weaver, turned author, has some tolerably finished paintings.

Coming now to literature, properly so called, though it be, indeed, but a small affair, there are nevertheless some writers to be cited in the order of novelists and poets. The son of a Quaker, Brown, is the author of Wieland, which Wieland is the source and model of the romances of the New School. Unlike his countrymen, "I prefer," said Brown, "wandering in the forests to threshing wheat." Wieland—the hero of the story, is a Puritan whom heaven has commanded to slay his wife.

"I brought thee hither to fulfil a divine command. I am appointed thy destroyer and destroy thee I must.' Saying this I seized her wrists. She shrieked aloud and endeavored to free herself from my grasp: but her efforts were vain. 'Surely, surely, Wieland, thou dost not mean it! Am I not thy wife? and wouldst thou kill me? Thou wilt not: and yet—I see—thou art Wieland no longer! A fury—resistless and horrible possesses thee—spare me—spare me—help!—help!' Till her breath was stopped she shrieked for help—for mercy!" Wieland strangles his wife and experiences unspeakable rapture beside the lifeless corpse. The horror of our modern inventions is here surpassed. Brown formed himself by the reading of Caleb Williams; and he imitated in Wieland a scene of Othello. At present the American novelists, Cooper and Washington Irving, are forced to betake themselves to Europe to find criticism and readers. The tongue of the great English writers has become creolized, provincialized, barbarized, and yet has acquired no energy in the midst of virgin nature. They have been obliged to compile a glossary of American expressions.

As for the American poets, their versification is agreeable, but they rise little above the common level, still the ode To the Evening Wind—Sun-rise upon the Mountain—The Rivulet, and some other poems are worth reading. Halleck has sung the death of Bozzaris, and George Hill has wandered among the ruins of Greece. Of Athens he sings

"There sits the queen of temples,—gray and lone.
She, like the last of an imperial line,
Has seen her sister structures, one by one,
To Time their gods and worshippers resign."

It is pleasant to me who have visited as a traveller the shores of Hellas and Atlantis to hear the independent voice of a land unknown to antiquity, mourning over the lost liberty of the ancient world.

Dangers for the United States.

Will America preserve its form of government? Will there not be a separation of the States? Has not a deputy from Virginia already advocated the system of antique liberty with slavery, the offspring of paganism, against a deputy from Massachusetts, who argued for modern liberty without slaves, such as christianity has made it? The States of the North and South, are they not opposed to each other in character and interests? Will not the States of the West, too distant from the Atlantic, desire to have a distinct government? On one side, is the Federal Government sufficiently strong to maintain the Union, and confine each State within its limits? On the other, if the Executive power be increased, will not despotism, with the guards and privileges of the dictator, be the result?

The isolation of the United States has allowed them to rise and flourish. It is doubtful whether they could have survived and grown in Europe. Federal Switzerland subsists in the midst of us. Why? Because it is small, poor, occupying a little space at the foot of the mountains, a nursery of soldiers for kings, and the rendezvous for fashionable travellers.

Separated from the old world, the population of the United States yet inhabits the solitudes. Its wilds have been its liberty. But already the conditions of its existence are being modified. The existence of the democracies of Mexico, of Columbia, of Peru, of Chili and Buenos-Ayres, troubled though they be, is a danger. So long as the United States had near them only the colonies of a trans-atlantic kingdom, no serious war was probable. But now are not rivalries to be apprehended? Let both sides rush to arms; let a military spirit take possession of the children of Washington, and some great captain may arise and mount the throne. Glory loves crowns.

I have said that the States of the North, of the South and of the West, were divided in interests. Every one knows this. If these States secede from the Union, will it be attempted to reduce them by force? Then what a ferment of hostilities is cast into the social body! Will the seceding States maintain their independence? Then what discords will burst forth among the emancipated States? These republics, beyond seas, disunited, will form but feeble unities, of no weight in the social balance. They would, one after another, be subjugated by some one of the republics. (I pass without allusion to the grave subjects of foreign alliances and interventions.) Kentucky, peopled by a more rustic, hardy, war-like race of men, would seem destined to become the conquering State. In this State, which would swallow up the rest, the power of one would not fail to erect itself upon the ruins of the power of all.

I have spoken of the dangers of war. I must also speak of the dangers of a long peace. The United States, since their independence, have, except during a few months, enjoyed the most profound peace. While a hundred battles were shaking Europe to its foundations, they were cultivating their fields in safety. Hence an overflowing of population and wealth with all the inconveniences of excess of riches and population. Suppose hostilities were committed upon an unwarlike people; can they resist? Would fortunes and habits consent to sacrifices? How forego the pleasant habitudes, the comforts, the indolent ease of life? China and India, listless in their muslin, have been ever subjected to foreign domination. The condition suited to a free society is one of peace, moderated by war, and of war tempered by peace. The Americans have already worn for too long a time, without interruption, the olive crown. The tree which furnishes it is not indigenous to their shores. The mercantile spirit begins to invade them. Interest is becoming their national vice. Already the play of the banks of the different states is producing embarrassment, and bankruptcy threatens the public fortune. So long as liberty produces gold, an industrial republic performs wonders; but when the gold is gained, or spent, then vanishes its love of independence, which was not founded upon moral sentiment, but was the product of the thirst of gain and of the passion of industry.

Moreover, it is difficult to create a feeling of country in states which have no community of religion and of interests, which had their origin at various epochs, from various sources, which occupy different soils and live under different suns. What connection can there be between a Frenchman of Louisiana, a Spaniard of Florida, a German of New York, an Englishman of New England, Virginia, Carolina and Georgia, who are all accounted Americans? One is frivolous and a duelist; another is Catholic, lazy and proud; another is Lutheran, cultivates his own ground and has no slaves; another is Anglican, a planter and slaveholder, and yet another is Puritan and commercial. How many centuries will it require to render these elements homogeneous? An aristocracy begotten of gold is upon the eve of appearing, greedy of distinctions and fond of titles. It is supposed that a general level exists in the United States. This is altogether a mistake. There are circles which disdain each other and hold no communication. There are saloons, the haughtiness of whose masters exceeds that of a German prince of sixteen descents. These plebeian nobles aspire to caste, in spite of the progress of intelligence which has made them equal and free. Some of them can talk of nothing else but their ancestors, haughty barons, in all probability bastards, and companions of William the Bastard. They parade the coats-of-arms of the old world, bedecked with serpents, lizards, and parroquets of the new. A younger son from Gascony, landing upon the republican shores with nothing but his cloak and umbrella, if he takes care to class Marquis to his name, is forthwith a man of high consideration on board the steamboats. The enormous inequality of fortunes threatens still more seriously to extinguish the spirit of equality. Certain Americans possess one or two millions income. Already the Yankee of high life can no longer consent to live like Franklin. The true gentleman, disgusted with his new country, comes to Europe in search of the old. You meet him in the hotels, making, like the English, full of extravagance and spleen, the tour of Italy. These ramblers from Carolina or Virginia purchase ruined abbeys in France, and plant English gardens with American trees at Melun. Naples sends to New York her singers and perfumers, Paris her modistes and operadancers, London her boxers and jockeys. And with all her exotic pleasures the Union is not gay. The amusement there is plunging over the cataract of Niagara with the applause of fifty thousand half savage planters, whom Death is hard put to it to make laugh.

And it is most extraordinary, that while inequality of fortune is becoming general, and an aristocracy is springing up, the great external impulse towards inequality is compelling the rich manufacturers and land-owners to mask their luxury and conceal their wealth for fear of being murdered by their neighbors. The executive authority is not recognized. The local authorities, freely chosen, are displaced at pleasure, and others substituted in their room. But all this does not disturb public order. Democracy is maintained in practice, while in theory they make fun of the laws imposed by democracy itself. The spirit of family hardly exists. No sooner is a son able to work, than, like a fledged bird, he must fly with his own wings. These generations starting forth in all the freedom of premature orphanage, their numbers swollen by emigrants from Europe, form themselves into romantic bands which, never forming for themselves fixed establishments upon the soil, clear the wild lands, dig the canals, and go wherever there is a call for labour. They commence habitations in the wilds, to be abandoned, perhaps, by their transient proprietors after an occupation of a few days.

In the cities a cold and hard selfishness reigns. Dollars, bank-notes, money, the rise and fall of stocks, are the only subjects of conversation. One might suppose himself upon change, or at the counter of an immense shop. The journals of huge size are filled with mercantile advertisements, or with the merest tittle-tattle. Are the Americans unconsciously obeying the law of climate under the influence of which vegetable nature seems to thrive at the expense of animated nature? This law has been combatted by distinguished intellects; but refutation has not yet put it utterly beyond dispute. One may well ask himself if philosophic liberty in America, as civilized despotism in Russia, has not been used too freely for the good of the people.

In fine, the United States present the idea of a colony and not of a mother-country. They have no past—manners are not formed there by the laws. The citizens of the New World took rank among nations at an epoch when political ideas were entering upon an ascending phase. This explains the fact of their transformation with such extraordinary rapidity. Permanent society would seem to be impracticable among them; because, first, of the extreme ennui which seizes upon individuals; and secondly, from their inability to be still; from the necessity of action which possesses them. Society can never be stable there, where the Penates are wandering. Having position upon the high-way of the oceans, at the head of progressive opinions new as his-country, the American seems to have inherited from Columbus the mission to discover new worlds rather than to create them.

A RIDE TO GRACEHAM.

Perhaps in this neglected spot is laid
Some heart once pregnant with celestial fire;
Hands that the rod of empire might have awayed,
Or waked to ecstasy the living lyre.—Gray.

Some years since, on the morning of Easter Sunday, I rode to the village of Graceham in the upper part of Frederick county, Maryland. I had heard of a sect of Moravians there, who had for more than eighty years, with untiring zeal, illustrated their faith to their surrounding neighbors, by holiness of life and devotion to the cause of the Redeemer. Curiosity prompted me to spend a day among this singular and philanthropic people. On the road I overtook a venerable man whose manners and appearance were very prepossessing, whose countenance betokened profound reflection and intelligence, and whom I afterwards found to possess great literary acquirements. He was a member of the Society. By him I was told, that the congregation consisted of four hundred members: that more than half a century had elapsed since a Mr. Dulancy had conveyed to the brethren several acres of land on which their church was erected, that at the dawn of the revolution he had fled to England, and his immense real estate was confiscated by an act of Assembly because he was a tory.

We arrived at the village. The church was a substantial building, and the adjacent grounds were well enclosed. The Catoctin mountain is close by on the west—a fine level country in front, variegated by many beautiful farms and dwelling-houses, and several miles off, you may see the Catholic chapel attached to Emmetsburg college, elevated to the clouds on a lofty hill, from which objects can be discerned in Pennsylvania as far as vision will extend. The sun was unobscured by a single cloud: a solemn silence reigned around, and the holy feelings excited by the anticipated pleasures of the sanctuary, subdued and tranquilized every passion of my soul.

We had hardly entered the house before the solemn tones of the organ, accompanied by the finest female voices, rivetted the attention of the audience. Every countenance was thoughtful. The pastor soon appeared with slow and solemn step. He was tall, thin and pale; his features indicating intense study and unaffected piety. He ascended the pulpit and delivered a plain discourse. As he closed, an infant was presented for baptism by its parents, in front of the chancel. Several of the most venerable members of the Society placed their right hands on the head of the child. The minister explained the nature of the ordinance and pouring water three successive times into a white china bowl, pronouncing the names of the trinity, and then that of the infant, ended with prayer.

It was now announced, that conformably to ancient custom, a procession to the grave-yard would be formed. The pastor led. After him came the musicians with trumpets and various other instruments: then the members of the congregation, and lastly the multitude. It reminded me somewhat of the march of the Israelites. At the grave-yard a hollow square was formed: a band of ladies clad in white, sung a German hymn as the stanzas were read out by the preacher. Never did I listen to such touching, melodious strains as now floated on the air. It seemed like the voice of the angelic host. We were reminded in strong, but solemn terms, of our frailty, and the necessity of preparation for the spirit-land: the pastor significantly pointed to the newly-made graves before our eyes, and read from a paper the names of those who had been laid there during the last year. Returning in the same order to the church, we were dismissed.

I sought the spot we had just left. It was surrounded by an enclosure painted black, and was laid out like a garden. The graves were not mounded, but level, and raised about four inches. In one department lay the husbands, in another the married women, and lastly the single of either sex. The few head-stones I saw, simply informed us that the person had departed at a particular time.

How different is this scene, I exclaimed, from the pride and pomp of Westminster Abbey, where kings, statesmen, poets and writers, notwithstanding their flattering epitaphs, are in no better condition than the tenants of these humble resting-places. "The cave of Machpelah before Mamre," was the last bed of the friend of God, and without any other monument than his faith and good deeds, his name has come down to posterity the pattern of perfect obedience to the will of Heaven.

Just at this moment, the companion of my morning ride appeared. I asked him who was the founder of this order of Christians?

"Count Zinzendorf," said he, "a nobleman of Moravia, who owned a principality of perhaps half the size of the Northern Neck of Virginia, originated our sect. He was a man of distinguished literary attainments. Deeply imbued with the spirit of his Divine Master, he devoted his immense revenue to the spread of Christianity; established the system of missions, which Wesley carried out and which yet prevails among the Methodists. After planting his standard in Europe, he crossed the ocean for the purpose of teaching the way of salvation to the down-trodden and benighted Indians, then very numerous, but now waning away to small and dispirited bands. He founded Litiz and Bethlehem in Pennsylvania where female seminaries of learning yet flourish. He despatched the servants of the Most High to the desolate and frozen regions of the Greenlander and Esquimaux, as well as to the parched deserts of Asia and Africa. His missionaries perforated forests where no white man had ever trod; fearless of wild beasts and savages; exposed to peril and famine by day and night; passing rivers and dangerous morasses where no help could be obtained; not knowing how soon their bones might be bleaching on the snow or sand; with no shield but the Gospel, and no protector but its author, they planted many churches in the old world as well as in America. By their meek deportment, the confidence and love of the red men on either side of the Alleghany were soon won.

"So apt were these sons of the forest in learning the German language, that one of their number would translate into the Indian tongue the sermons as they were delivered. Thus a large congregation comprehended the words of the speaker with perfect facility. So they lived as sheep with a kind shepherd.

"The revolutionary war, however, retarded their work. The sound of arms illy accorded with the holy work of the ministry. And beyond this, early in 1781, some of the inhabitants of Western Virginia, under the command of a Colonel Williams, erroneously supposing that our settlements of friendly Indians at the mouth of Muskingum, in what is now the State of Ohio, was favorable to the British, resolved to spill their blood on bare suspicion. Their leader, like Cresap, who murdered Logan's family, will descend to the latest ages abhorred and scorned by the world. The party in open day demanded that their victims should be brought out for the sacrifice. Arranged in a line in the street of their little hamlet, and knowing that their end was at hand, they asked the privilege of singing and praying together, ere they were hurried into eternity. During this solemn scene the hearts of the white men did not relent, no sigh escaped from their bosoms; no tear moistened their eyes: revenge and cowardice hushed the voice of nature. As these friendly natives of the West arose from their knees, ninety-one men, women and children were despatched and were soon dragged into one pile of corpses. The surviving Indians were sufficiently numerous and brave to have exterminated the monsters who had perpetrated this foul murder, but were restrained by Zeisberger, the only preacher who beheld this awful spectacle. With that mild and forgiving spirit which a true christian only can manifest, he bade his weeping people follow him into their church. He prayed for the savages who had just slaked their vengeance in blood, told them to turn their eye to 'the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world,' who prayed for his foes on the cross, and that the time had arrived when they were called on to follow his example in patience and suffering.

"He calmed the storm which otherwise would have burst on the guilty heads of those ruffians, and the dead were interred with reverence and submission.

"Show me," said my companion, while the fire of enthusiasm flashed from his eye, "where, out of the Bible, can be found a scene of so much forbearance and resignation amidst such unparalleled provocation! What the end of the band was, I know not. It is to be hoped that 'repentance unto life' relieved them from the deep-toned thunders of a guilty conscience ere the final summons came which brought them into the presence of Him who will judge 'both quick and dead.' About two months after the massacre, Shabosch, one of our ministers, (whose son also fell on that disastrous day) left that country in order to memorialize Congress, which was then sitting at York, Pennsylvania, concerning the recent outrage, and claim protection from future aggression. It so happened that I met him in the ferry-boat near Pittsburgh and travelled with him for some days. The opposite bank of the river was covered with friendly Indians, who had convened to bid him farewell. His appearance was venerable, and as his dispirited and broken-hearted people crowded round him, the whole assembly was melted into tears and deep silence prevailed. They gazed after him until we were hidden in the woods. Congress did not interpose so far as I have heard."

"Pray sir," said I, "can you inform me as to the doctrines of a sect which has rendered such signal benefits to the world? I have somewhere read that yours was the first Protestant sect which sent missionaries to instruct and civilize Pagan nations, that in both hemispheres and in the isles of the ocean, your schools and religious assemblies flourish abundantly; tell me what is your peculiar creed?"

"We are distinguished," he answered, "perhaps beyond any other denomination of christians, in this—that with limited means we have spread the word farther and wider and diffused over society a greater moral influence under all circumstances than any other religious order of men. We are characterized by our peaceful habits, retirement from the world, 'its pomps and vanities,' refusal to hold civil offices, bringing no law suits, nor being concerned in strife or litigation, and enforcing upon children, strict attendance on public worship and submission to the laws of our country. We shun all theological and political controversies—we publish no polemical works—we practise the principle of community in our villages so far as we can and cultivate peace and good will on earth. The Augsburg Confession is the acknowledged symbol of our Church, and we contend that the atonement of our Saviour is general in its extent and vicarious in its nature. We have no particular theories relative to any aspect of this doctrine but abstain from all attempts to philosophize on this subject. As to the Eucharist we differ from a majority of the Lutherans in Europe and America, in still maintaining the doctrine of the real presence as taught in the Augsburg Confession. We have bishops but claim for them no jure divino authority. With us free toleration is a cardinal principle. All are allowed 'to worship under their own vine and fig tree,' and in no instance did we persecute any one of our fellow creatures for any cause whatever."

The sun was now about to set. I bade the holy man adieu and reached my residence pleased with the novel and striking incidents of the day.

MARTIN F. TUPPER, ESQ., M. A.

Author of Proverbial Philosophy, &c. An interesting letter from him to an American Correspondent; some allusions to his writings, character, &c.

Mr. Editor.—My attention was first directed to the writings of Tupper some years since, when the Messenger was under the control of your very esteemed predecessor, Mr. Minor. The Editor, at that time, reviewed some of the writings of this distinguished author in a highly favorable manner, and quoted some striking and interesting passages from his Proverbial Philosophy and other works. After having read Proverbial Philosophy several times, I felt an irresistible inclination to learn more of the history and character of the author, and with this view as well as for the purpose of expressing the great pleasure and benefit I had derived from his writings, I addressed to him a letter, in reply to which I received the following:

Albury, Near Guilford, England,

June 20th, 1848.

MY DEAR SIR AND UNSEEN FRIEND,—After a long travel, evidenced by many post marks, your cordial and therefore welcome letter has at last found me out. I hasten to respond to the friendly feeling wherewith it overflows. America is to me a very Potosi of kindness, and I am continually finding the popularity to which you allude, made manifest to myself, by letters full of love from many good people in your far-off states, to whom I can be known only in the spirit. I need not say how glad I am to add your name to the number; nor how heartily I rejoice in the rich fund of (I may really call it) gratitude, which God's blessing has added to my writings so well received among you.

It is by no means impossible that, some day or other, I may pay America a visit, for so many friends urge it, and there will be so much true pleasure in making their personal acquaintance, that I have not the stoical virtue to resist an inclination so attractive. Not but that I hate, abjure and would go any distance to avoid lionization, but that I hold to be a very different thing from the hearty good will and christian love wherewith I shall be greeted.

Praise is a good thing when it comes from good men, as honest guerdon for a good deed, and I am far from the hypocrisy of pretending not to appreciate the rich reward of commendation from his servants, wherewith our Father has already blest me, as far as I trust I shall always be from seeking praise unworthily, in any manner irrespective of His work on earth, nor without a willing eye and a covetous ear for his own "Ἐὐδωλὴ αγαθῆ." Thus only do I wish to reap my honors. And now, my dear sir, you ask me many questions which I really must not answer except by reference. There will shortly, I believe, be emanating from a house in New York, a complete edition of all my works, prefaced by a life of their author. My portrait—not entirely unlike, though they tell me a little flattering, is in your shop windows—and for the inner man, you have my heart and mind pretty well laid bare in my books. As to all else, I am blessed with health, wealth, wife, children and honor. I am not bald, nor gray, nor crooked, nor a fright. My inches are some 5 feet 6—you find me cordial, I have no mysteries, and number many friends. Several American gentlemen have visited my old family house at Albury, and you will find one such visit published in your Literary World, another in your Boston Atlas, and another in, (I think,) Mr. Bryant's paper. Is not all this enough to satisfy common curiosity? Still do not suppose I set lightly by your kind enquiries; as a proof of your esteem, if not of your affection, I thank you for them, and with you all like-minded at Memphis. Have you a Thebes or a Heliopolis? how strange it seems to have a Memphian friend,—however, Tennessee—strange adjunct brings one hot-foot from Old Egypt to Young Columbia. Liked you my sonnets to Co-

Columbia in "Hactenus?" Enquire for the booklet. Soon you will see my loving ballad to Brother Jonathan and will not hate me for it. My high errand as between mother and child (possibly truant-child, but there were many excuses) is peace; and I suspect I shall avail to do more this way than all our diplomatists.

Let me know whether you get this letter, which, after all contains nothing, and therefore will, I hope, be stolen by no-body. Tell me in your next all about the many unseen friends of

Your unworthy

MARTIN F. TUPPER.

The following was rapidly sketched down not long since, in reference to Mr. Tupper's writings and personal character, and may, perhaps, be read with some interest by his admirers.

This excellent and distinguished gentleman has, in a very short time, acquired great celebrity in the literary world. He has, for the last five or six years, been delighting and instructing the reading community on both sides of the Atlantic. Some of the ablest reviewers have complimented his productions as displaying great genius, learning, power and passion. His Proverbial Philosophy struck with almost electric force and effect upon the minds and hearts of a large class of American readers, and at once rendered his name and character famous and beloved in this country. Of this work, it has been said by the editor of the Southern Literary Messenger, some years since, "It abounds in gems and apt allusions, which display without an effort the deep practical views and aesthetical culture of the author. His prose writings, chiefly in the form of moral fictions, have also won for their author much credit. His 'Booklet,' Hactenus, contains some spirited and beautiful poems, indicating in the author a warm, pious, and patriotic heart, and his 'Sonnets' to Columbia contained in this volume, contain a deep and earnest love and sympathy with our country which does great credit to the head and heart of the author. We believe that there has long existed an unfortunate and unreasonable prejudice between us and the mother country. Mr. Tupper seems far above all such narrow prejudices, and in his writings, has been exerting all his influence to break down such contracted prejudices, and affect a kind and fraternal affection between two great nations, both speaking the same language and claiming the same distinguished ancestry."

As an evidence, among many others, of Mr. Tupper's kindly feelings to our country, he remarks in a letter received by the writer of this, "Next, make my affectionate salutations welcome to all who love me in my writings. I think, and hope I am no mere words-penner, no hypocrite in prose or poetry, but a man who desires and attempts to illustrate all that I say by all that I do. You therefore all know me much better than you suspect, and I find that I can get on with my American friends with a more pleasing feeling of sympathy, than with many on this side of the Atlantic; for reserve and restraint and the pompousness of empty dignity are as abhorrent from my nature as from that of the genuine Yankee."

Mr. Tupper is a young man, (about 37,) for one who has written so much. He is said to possess a fine person; his manners are described as elegant and eminently social, and he is remarkably happy in his domestic relations. He is a retired, literary gentleman of splendid acquirements and eminent piety, residing on his paternal estates and finding happiness in his home, his wife and children, books and writings. I would take him to be a man of enlarged and liberal views on all subjects—quite withdrawn from the politics and factions of his own or any other country, and free from that acerbity of temper which so often characterizes the "genus irritabile." He possesses overflowing wealth without the accompanying curse of avarice—claims every blessing the human heart can desire, and styles himself a happy man. His writings appear to be the offspring of a mind laboring for usefulness and good to his fellow men, and are designed to act upon the heart and life. You believe him always in earnest, and Carlyle, with much truth and eloquence, places earnestness at the bottom of all true greatness. Tupper seems to write both from an earnest and religious heart, and his warm and impressive teachings are imprinted with more than ordinary effect and power upon the minds and hearts of his readers.

PROPHECY OF NAPOLEON.

Mr. Thompson.—In January of last year I wrote, as you will remember, a notice of Montholon's Captivity of Napoleon, which appeared in the Messenger for that month. Recent events in France induced me to look over it again, as I remembered some quotations which struck me as remarkable, and which I thought worthy of being looked at with reference to passing occurrences. I have not now before me Count Montholon's book, but I have copied one of the quotations before alluded to. The remarks were made on the Island of St. Helena, now more than 25 years ago, by Napoleon. He was speaking with reference to the future prospects of France and said :

“My son will reign if the popular masses are permitted to act without control; the crown will belong to the Duke of Orleans (Louis Philippe) if those who are called Liberals gain the victory over the people; but then sooner or later the people will discover that they have been deceived—that the white are always white, the blue always blue—and that there is no guarantee for their true interests, except under the reign of my dynasty, because it is the work of their creation.”

No remark is necessary to make evident the truth of his prophecy. The son it is true died. The revolution of 1830 verified so much of the prediction as relates to Louis Philippe. The remarkable fact is that it was precisely in the mode indicated by Bonaparte that Louis Philippe attained the throne by a victory of the Liberals over the People.

Lafitte, the Banker, Thiers, Lafayette and some others paused before they reached a republic, checked the movement and, by a coup d'état, made Louis Philippe king. The people in 1848 found themselves deceived and have returned under the reign of Napoleon's dynasty. What event was more improbable than this four or six months ago?

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND, from the Accession of James the Second. By Thomas Babington Macaulay. Vol. I. New York: Harper & Brothers.

The first volume of this long expected work has, in the course of three weeks, run through two editions, and found perhaps a larger circle of readers among a people whom the author has never seen, than it can possibly find at home, even should it be sent out in the cheapest form of publication, that has ever issued from the English press. Written in a style, which may be regarded by some as rather too familiar for history, it is yet full of instruction, derived from an infinite variety of sources, inaccessible to the general reader, and rendered, probably, the more popular by that very absence of dignity which has generally been regarded as one of the incidents essential to historical narrative. Whether it will survive the hundred years, considered by Horace as absolutely necessary to test the true merits of an author,* we regard as questionable; it is a fact not less remarkable for its singularity than for its notoriety that those works which have been thought worthy of preservation by posterity, have not always been most eagerly sought after in the life time of their authors, while, on the contrary, those which have commanded the largest share of contemporary applause, have often been least able to stand the test of Horace. Without undertaking to decide this very delicate question, we can say that we have rarely seen any book so well calculated to take the public by storm as the one now under consideration, and that too from the very circumstance that would seem to forbid it a long period of existence. The very familiarity of the style will be certain to captivate the majority of readers, who will be delighted to see the stern muse of history unbend herself, and condescend to tell her story with all the careless freedom of a friend, when he talks to his friend in his gown and slippers, by his own fireside.

Nearly the whole of the first volume is a preliminary dissertation upon the history of England, and her condition at various stages of her political existence. As the materials of knowledge become more plentiful with the advance of time, the dissertation of course takes a wider range, and acquires a greater compass. We are introduced to the Englishman of the reign of Charles II. precisely as he then was, with all his prejudices, whether Whig or Tory, town or country, fresh about him. Before entering upon the main object of his labors,—the history of England from the accession of James II. down to a period within the recollection of persons now living,—the author wishes to make us as familiar as may be, with the point from which we set out in his company. He depicts the life of the English of those days and gives us an infinite number of facts, historical and statistical, by the consideration of which we become the better prepared for what is to follow. And these facts and these statistics are replete with interest. An Englishman of the present day,—or an American who has almost as much claim in the great men of England in the olden time as the former,—naturally desires to know something of his ancestors, besides what he can read in the narratives of battles and sieges, or the skirmishes in parliament. He desires to know how they lived—how they tilled their fields—what degree of mental or moral culture they enjoyed—what was the state of learning and religion among the masses—how they spent their time—what was the fare, the drink and the amusements of the day—what was the condition of their houses—and a thousand other things, all relating to the domestic life of his ancestors. The knowledge of these matters is important, in one point of view, which is historically the most important of all. It enables us to take a general view of the progress of the world—to say whether or not the condition of man has been advancing,—to decide whether we are better off than our ancestors or the reverse, and thus to know how far we shall persevere in pressing forward, or when it will be wise to think about receding.

As we conceive this to be one of the greatest, if not the very greatest, of the objects of history, we must concede to the work of Mr. Macaulay a very high character. From other works on the same subject, did we not know better, we should imagine that the whole population spent their time in plotting, in debating and in fighting. We should never suppose that there were millions, both in the towns and in the country, who kept the noiseless tenor of their way onward, and that these men unknown and unheard of are the ancestors of the great British nations. Thiers is the history, which we are most anxious to learn, and theirs is precisely the history, of which books called the “History of England” can give us no conception. Yet it is, in truth, the history of England; the history of the rise, progress, and condition of that vast multitude, which, progressing from age to age, constitutes at this moment the powerful kingdom of Great Britain, whose dominions have no setting sun and

Whose flag has braved a thousand years
The battle and the breezes.*

The accounts of parliamentary intrigues—of plots in the palace—of the personal habits of this king or of that—of his quarrels with the Lords and Commons—of his wars foreign or domestic—even of revolutions, make but a small part of the history of a great nation. That can never be written, it is true; but when a historian undertakes to give us an account of the political changes of a country, he ought to give us some idea of the state of the society in which they occur.

In order to affect as much as possible, in this department of his historical labors, Mr. Macaulay has extended his researches into every thing which promised the least degree of light. Nothing has been so minute to escape his observation; nothing too voluminous or obscure to baffle his scrutiny. The letters of Barillon, and the editorials of Roger L'Estrange receive an equal degree of attention from him. The most obscure pamphlets, the least remembered lampoons, the slightest records of the turf, the memoranda of overseers of parishes and of roads have been carefully investigated, whenever he has thought they might shed light upon his subject.

The last chapter alone of the volume before us, can be properly said to be the beginning of his history. The rest is merely preliminary. He relates in this chapter, with many additional circumstances, the invasion of Scotland by Argyle, of England by Monmouth, the death of those two chieftains and the atrocious persecutions which followed.

We look for the second volume with great interest.

The first is for sale by A. Morris.

THE FEMALE POETS OF AMERICA. By Rufus Wilmot Griswold. Philadelphia: Carey & Hart.

This is a large volume, to match "The Poets and Poetry of America," "The Prose Authors of America," and "The Poets and Poetry of England"—previous compilations of Mr. Griswold—all of which have been eminently and justly successful. "Compilations," however, is not precisely the word; for these works have indisputable claims upon public attention as critical summaries, at least, of literary merit and demerit. Their great and most obvious value, as affording data or material for criticism—as mere collections of the best specimens in each department and as records of fact, in relation not more to books than to their authors—has in some measure overshadowed the more important merit of the series: for these works have often, and in fact very generally, the positive merits of discriminative criticism, and of honesty—always the more negative merit of strong common-sense. The best of the series is, beyond all question, "The Prose

* The introduction of this well-known couplet from Mr. Campbell's famous lyric affords us an opportunity of acknowledging a graceful compliment to America, from an English officer, at a recent banquet given by the authorities of Southampton on the occasion of the visit of the U. S. frigate St. Lawrence to that port. It is indeed a gratifying evidence of increasing good-will between the citizens of the two countries. The officer proposed the sentiment,

"Columbia need no bulwarks,
No towers along the steep,
Her march is on the mountain wave,
Her home is on the deep."

Authors of America." This is a book of which any critic in the country might well have been proud, without reference to the mere industry and research manifested in its compilation. These are truly remarkable;—but the vigor of comment and force of style are not less so; while more independence and self-reliance are manifested than in any other of the series. There is not a weak paper in the book; and some of the articles are able in all respects. The truth is that Mr. Griswold's intellect is more at home in Prose than Poetry. He is a better judge of fact than of fancy, not that he has not shown himself quite competent to the task undertaken in "The Poets and Poetry of America," or of England, or in the work now especially before us. In this latter, he has done no less credit to himself than to the numerous lady-poets whom he discusses—and many of whom he now first introduces to the public. We are glad, for Mr. Griswold's sake, as well as for the interests of our literature generally, to perceive that he has been at the pains of doing what Northern critics seem to be at great pains; never to do—that is to say, he has been at the trouble of doing justice, in great measure, to several poetesses who have not had the good fortune to be born in the North. The notices of the Misses Carey, of the Misses Fuller, of the sisters Mrs. Warfield and Mrs. Lee, of Mrs. Nichols, of Miss Welby, and of Miss Susan Archer Talley, reflect credit upon Mr. Griswold and show him to be a man not more of taste than—shall we say it?—of courage. Let our readers be assured that, (as matters are managed among the four or five different cliques who control our whole literature in controlling the larger portion of our critical journals,) it requires no small amount of courage, in an author whose subsistence lies in his pen, to hint, even, that any thing good, in a literary way, can, by any possibility, exist out of the limits of a certain narrow territory. We repeat that Mr. Griswold deserves our thanks, under such circumstances, for the cordiality with which he has recognized the poetical claims of the ladies mentioned above. He has not, however, done one or two of them that full justice which, ere long, the public will take upon itself the task of rendering them. We allude especially to the case of Miss Talley, (the "Susan" of our own Messenger.) Mr. Griswold praises her highly; and we would admit that it would be expecting of him too much, just at present, to hope for his avowing, of Miss Talley, what we think of her, and what one of our best known critics has distinctly avowed—that she ranks already with the best of American poetesses, and in time will surpass them all—that her demerits are those of inexperience and excessive sensibility, (betraying her, unconsciously, into imitation,) while her merits are those of unmistakable genius. We are proud to be able to say, moreover, in respect to another of the ladies referred to above, that one of her poems is decidedly the noblest poem in the collection—although the most distinguished poetesses in the land have here included their most praiseworthy compositions. Our allusion is to Miss Alice Carey's "Pictures of Memory." Let our readers see it and judge for themselves. We speak deliberately:—in all the higher elements of poetry—in true imagination—in the power of exciting the only real poetical effect—elevation of the soul, in contradistinction from mere excitement of the intellect or heart—the poem in question is the noblest in the book.

"The Female Poets of America" includes ninety-five names—commencing with Ann Bradstreet, the contemporary of the once world-renowned Du Bartas—him of the "nonsense-verses"—the poet who was in the habit of styling the sun the "Grand Duke of Candles"—and ending with "Helen Irving"—a nom de plume of Miss Anna H. Phillips. Mr. Griswold gives most space to Mrs. Maria Brooks, (Maria del Occidente), not, we hope and believe, merely because Southey has happened to commend her. The claims of this lady we have not yet examined so thoroughly as we could wish, and we will speak more fully of her hereafter, perhaps. In point of actual merit—that is to say of actual accomplishment, without reference to mere indications of the ability to accomplish—we would rank the first dozen or so in this order—(leaving out Mrs. Brooks for the present.) Mrs. Osgood—very decidedly first—then Mrs. Welby, Miss Carey, (or the Misses Carey,) Miss Talley, Mrs. Whitman, Miss Lynch, Miss Frances Fuller, Miss Lucy Hooper, Mrs. Oakes Smith, Mrs. Ellet, Mrs. Hewitt, Miss Clarke, Mrs. Lewis, Mrs. Nichols, Mrs. Warfield, (with her sister, Mrs. Lee,) Mrs. Eames and Mrs. Sigourney. If Miss Lynch had as much imagination as energy of expression and artistic power, we would place her next to Mrs. Osgood. The next skilful merely, of those just mentioned, are Mrs. Osgood, Miss Lynch and Mrs. Sigourney. The most imaginative are Miss Carey, Mrs. Osgood, Miss Talley and Miss Fuller. The most accomplished are Mrs. Ellet, Mrs. Eames, Mrs. Lewis, Mrs. Whitman and Mrs. Oakes Smith. The most popular are Mrs. Osgood, Mrs. Oakes Smith and Miss Hooper. The most glaring omissions are those of Mrs. C. F. Orne and Miss Mary Wells.

ETIQUETTE AT WASHINGTON, Together with the Customs adopted by Polite Society in the other Cities of the United States. By a Citizen of Washington. Baltimore: J. Murphy. 1848.

This is a modest little volume, purporting to be the oracle of fashion and good-breeding, in which one may learn like Sheridan's heroine, to "start by rule and blush by example"—to take wine with grace—eat with ease—enter a room with dignity—sustain one's self with all possible sang froid under the most trying circumstances—and finally to be buried according to the strictest notions of propriety. This book must be esteemed a valuable acquisition by those who hold a solecism in taste as worse than a crime, and more readily pardon the neglect of a bill, than a failure to answer an invitation to dinner. Nothing escapes the attention of the writer. We have every thing from the "business of a knife," (the duty of a fork, and the office of a spoon?) to the proprieties of a funeral, where we are told "furs, if in season are appropriate"—especially we suppose sable garments. Under the head of funerals we notice an exquisite gradation in grief in the fact that "in Washington those who go in their own carriages accompany the procession until it reaches Capitol Hill, when they leave it, or continue at their option." This reminds us of the mourning houses in London, where different degrees in distress are typified by the color of the garments sold, and the clerk who retails "sober greys" to all who "do not mourn as those without hope," sends on the members of an "inconsolable family" to the darker shades of bombazine and crape.

The author seems to have rather an amusing idea of chasteness. He says "a lady should be particular to select her dress with an eye to chasteness. Silky and pliable materials which show the graceful contours of the female form are more desirable than harsh unyielding ones."

We certainly agree with the writer that a lavish display of jewelry, especially of a cheap kind, is improper. The same objection holds also, we can tell him, against that pinch-back morality with which forms are every thing and kneeling is religion. It was under such a code as this no doubt that a gentleman with pious politeness left his card upon the altar!

It must be peculiarly edifying to the happy owner of one suit of "seedy black" to be told that "there are dresses appropriate for the house, street and carriage," and that "gloves should always be worn at church and other public assemblies." Whether it be true, as this writer affirms, that "the tailor and milliner have less to do with the formation of society than is generally imagined," they certainly have a good deal to do with "the body, form and pressure of the times," and are frequently left by the "opper ten" to take the measure of an unpaid bill. In a technical sense, there are no people who have more to do with the "formation" of society than the tailor and the milliner—for it is their "imagination" which "bodies forth" to beau and belle "the forms of things unknown."

But we must not forget the first part of the title of this volume—Etiquette at Washington. Under this head we are instructed as to the best manner of approaching the great functionaries at the Federal Metropolis; and the humble visitor is warned not to become impatient or irritated at being left to cool his heels in the ante-room of the White House while more important personages are admitted to the presence of the President. An invitation to dine with the President must be treated as Mr. Lowndes said of the office itself, and be "neither sought nor refused"—the latter half of the maxim being more rigidly obeyed than the first. We hope no slur is intended upon the Secretary of the Treasury in the sentence, "there is no place in the United States where less attention is paid to mere money than at the seat of government." Whether this be true or not, we venture to say "there is no place in the United States" more visited for the sake of money, and the author of this work would have accommodated a very large class in the community, and have secured a better sale of his book if he had devoted a chapter to office-seekers.

ORATORS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION. By E. L. Magoon. New York. Baker and Scribner.

PROVERBS FOR THE PEOPLE. By E. L. Magoon. Boston. Gould, Kendall & Lincoln.

Mr. Magoon is fast overstepping his well-acquired fame as a popular and eloquent, though somewhat eccentric divine, in the many literary enterprises with which he has recently been engaged. Nor do we regret that this is the case, for in widening the field of his operations, he will be able to accomplish more in the way of instruction, and surely he can address a greater number through the presses of Boston and New York, than from the desks of all the lecture-rooms in the Atlantic cities. In taking to type, however, Mr. Magoon deserts not, by any means, his ministerial duties; as a belles-lettres clergyman, of less industry than he, would have done long since.

"The Orators of the American Revolution" is a work, comprising among many original sketches several contributions which have appeared from time to time in the best magazines of the country. Those of our readers who purchase the volume (and we hope many will do so) will not fail to recognize one or two of the articles as old acquaintances, introduced to their notice through the Messenger. "Proverbs for the People" his latest production, is an unpretending, though most attractive little volume, consisting, for the most part, of illustrations of practical wisdom drawn from the Sacred Scriptures. The style of Mr. Magoon, in his more sustained and aspiring efforts, is calculated, in an eminent degree, to fix the attention of the reader, though perhaps it might be better were it less ornate, and would certainly conform more strictly to established models with fewer of those mere fripperies of rhetoric, which a writer, so thoughtful as Mr. Magoon, does not at all need for the proper transmission of his meaning.

RHYMES OF TRAVEL, BALLADS AND POEMS BY BAYARD TAYLOR. New York. G. P. Putnam.

There is genuine poetry in this tasteful volume, and this we consider no light praise. The author won for himself the sympathy and estimation of a large class of readers by his "Views-a-Foot." His gallant feats of pedestrianism in Europe, and the powers of just observation manifested in the record of them which he gave to the world, suggest an adventurous and enthusiastic mind. In the poems now collected we have these qualities in a more deliberate and artistic form. We have read most of the volume with great satisfaction. There is a lyric flow, a continuation of tone and expression, and, above all, an earnestness of feeling in Taylor's poetry that we recognize with sincere delight. His sense of beauty is vivid, his insight, as a lover of nature and man, keen and sympathetic; and his tone of sentiment elevated and firm. Thus he possesses both aspiration and tenderness—two of the essential instincts of the poet. We are struck also with the spirited character of his verse. The "Rhymes of Travel" are beautiful memorials of the impressions of a young American on the hallowed ground of Europe. The "California Ballads" meet with eminent success when first published, and will be cordially welcomed in a collected form. We are not surprised to hear that the first edition of this volume is already exhausted.

HISTORY OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT. By Jacob Abbott. With Engravings. New York. Harper & Brothers.

This is another volume of the series of historical compositions, which Mr. Abbott has been engaged in preparing. Though designed for the young, they present a vast deal of information which has slipped away from the memory of many a deep reader of history and may therefore be looked over with profit by all classes. Mr. Abbott's style is very simple and perspicuous, and on that account singularly well adapted to the narration of past events. The handsome appearance which the Harpers have given to these little volumes will commend them to an extensive sale,—good paper, large round type and spirited illustrations, with an illuminated title-page, constituting a most worthy dress for the author's composition.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN: His Autobiography: With a narrative of his Public Life and Services. By Rev. H. Hastings Weld. With numerous designs by J. G. Chapman. To be completed in eight Parts. Part I. New York: Harper & Brothers.

Since the publication of the Pictorial Bible, we have seen no wood engravings at all comparable for softness and finish with those in the present work; and the name of Chapman as the author of the designs furnishes an ample assurance that the subsequent numbers will be quite as exquisitely embellished. The typography is also very luxurious. Of the text itself nearly one half will consist of Franklin's autobiography and the remainder (275 pages) of a narrative of his public life and services from the pen of the Rev. Mr. Weld, at one time editor of the New World, and most favorably known as a man of fine literary taste.

CONSTITUTION OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC. 1848. New York. P. Arpin, Publisher. Office of the Courier des Etats Unis. 1848.

This is a neat publication in pamphlet form, containing French and English versions of the Constitution of the new Republic of France. We have no space here, nor does it belong to our province to submit any reflections of a political nature with regard to this plan of Government, which was brought into existence under the auspices of the enlightened and sagacious De Toqueville; our desire is simply to call attention to the fact that a cheap and convenient edition of the Constitution is within the reach of all who desire to make themselves acquainted with the peculiar features of the French Republic.

In connection with this subject it may not be amiss to say a word with reference to the Courier des Etats Unis, under the spirited management of M. Paul Arpin. We regard it as one of the most agreeable publications that we receive, embodying as it does in the best style of the feuilleton the latest continental gossip and potting forth in the Semaine Littéraire some of the most delightful specimens of French Literature, such as, with all our abhorrence for Dumas and his school, we can generally approve. Comte Alfred De Vigny's novel of Cinq Mars, which suggested to Bulwer the play of Richelieu, was published in this manner and at the present time, the sheets of Chateaubriand's great posthumous work, "Memoires d'outre Tombe," (a fragment of which our Paris correspondent so agreeably translates for the present number of the Messenger) are passing through the same press.

THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE. January 1849.

We receive with very commendable punctuality, through Messrs. Nash and Woodhouse, the Richmond Agents, the Foreign Reviews republished by Messrs. Leonard Scott and Co. of New York. To the enterprise of these latter gentlemen, the American reader is indebted for an arrangement, by which Blackwood is sent out regularly during the early part of the month of its publication in England. To effect this, they have had to pay the most liberal sums for advance sheets by the steamers, so that the mouth of Maga itself is stopped, pro tanto, on the subject of Yankee piracy on the high sea of literature.

The old Reviews fully maintain the high reputation they have acquired under the regime of Lookhart, Brougham, Jeffrey and Mackintosh, although we incline to the opinion that the North British, (the "infant phenomenon" of criticism) is carrying off the honors of the "buff and blue" and fairly outstripping the Tory organ in polish and acumen. The number before us contains a truly delightful article on Charles Lamb, embodying a letter of humorous reminiscences concerning his social character, which is understood to be from the pen of De Quincey. There is also a curious speculation on the vexed question of the authorship of Junius. Blackwood contains, among other attractive articles, a continuation of "The Caxtons," Mr. Bulwer's novel, which has awakened such decided interest everywhere. We do not think a larger supply of excellent reading can be obtained, on the same terms, than is furnished by Messrs. Leonard Scott & Co.

INTERNATIONAL ART-UNION.

We have received a Prospectus of this laudable enterprise, together with a catalogue of the works of art now upon exhibition at their Gallery, No. 289 Broadway, New York. The claims of the institution upon those who would promote the Fine Arts in America are very strong, and when it is generally known that one of the objects which it contemplates, is to send one American Artist annually abroad to improve himself in the continental schools, we are satisfied that the number of subscribers will be very large. The plan otherwise is similar to that of the other excellent institutions of this character already in existence,—a handsome engraving being furnished to each subscriber and a yearly distribution of prizes being made by lot. Among the names of the "Committee of Reference," we find Mr. Washington Irving, Mr. Durand, the great landscape painter, and the poet Willis. Messrs. Goupil, Vibert & Co. are the Managers.

BRITISH PERIODICAL LITERATURE.

REPUBLICATION OF

The London Quarterly Review, The Edinburgh Review, The North British Review, The Westminster Review, and Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine.

The wide spread fame of these splendid Periodicals, renders it needless to say much in their praise. As literary organs, they stand far in advance of any works of a similar stamp now published; while the political complexion of each is marked by a dignity, candor, and forbearance, not often found in works of a party character.

They embrace the views of the three great parties in England—Tory, Whig, and Radical—“Blackwood” and the “London Quarterly” are Tory; the “Edinburgh Review” Whig; and the “Westminster Review” Radical. The “North British Review” is more of a religious character, having been originally edited by Dr. Chalmers, and now, since his death, being conducted by his son-in-law, Dr. Hanna, associated with Sir David Brewster. Its literary character is of the very highest order. The “Westminster,” though reprinted under that title only, is published in England under the title of the “Foreign Quarterly and Westminster,” it being in fact a union of the two Reviews formerly published and reprinted under separate titles. It has, therefore, the advantage by this combination, of uniting in one work the best features of both as heretofore issued.

The above Periodicals are reprinted in New York, immediately on their arrival by the British steamers, in a beautiful clear type, on fine white paper, and are faithful copies of the originals, Blackwood's Magazine being an exact fac-simile of the Edinburgh edition.

THE GERMAN PARLIAMENT.

The Continent of Europe in the moral and intellectual life of its nations has, with few exceptions, been an almost unknown land to the proud, insular Englishman and consequently also to us. It was one of those blessings which short-sighted human philosophy rarely perceives but when looking back upon the Past, that the Continental Wars brought for the first time armies of English soldiers and of English travellers to invade countries which, although within a few hundred miles, had been farther from London than most of the distant colonies. Since then new discoveries have been made from year to year; Italy has been annually overrun by its hundred thousand "Mylords," British Statesmen have spent their vacations in French villas, and German Philosophy and German Science have become known and respected. The History of the Germans, a people so nearly related to the Anglo-Saxon, and yet so different in all its outward forms, was found to be not without its special interest, until the great historian, judging Germany both by her central geographical position and by her historical importance, called her the Heart of Europe.

She is the heart of Europe, and as such has been most lacerated of all the fair countries of the Old World. It is here that in all times have originated those mighty movements which have wayed the destinies of Europe.

Herrman, by his victory over the proud legions of Varus, in the Westphalian forests, was the first to show to the astonished world that Roman fasces and axes were vain when employed to bend men inspired by the inflexible sense of freedom. Germany was the first great camp of those who crushed the colossus of Roman power after its spirit had passed away. From Germany Charlemagne sent forth his armies to prevent the Saracens from destroying European culture and Christianity. In the centre of Germany, on those extensive plains where the Empire of the European world has so often been decided, Henry the First withstood the attack of the Avars and Hungarians, by which, but for him, Europe must have become the prey of fierce barbarians and savage Pagans. On these same ensanguined plains the noble King of Sweden died, not only for the political but for the religious liberty of Europe; and finally, in the glare of Moscow's burning, here also was fought that great battle which liberated Europe from the universality of Napoleon's iron sway.

And once more is Germany called upon to be the great battle-field on which some of the most momentous questions of our day are to be decided. Her plains will again be crimsoned, her cities burnt, her fair fields abandoned and her sons slain, that the great principle of Liberty may rise triumphantly from the midst of the flames, as when centuries ago she paid with the blood of her children for the rich blessings which the Reformation brought to the whole Christian world. The struggle is come once more, fearful are the throes of the sufferer and sad is the prospect before us; but not in vain has the land of the Saxon ever been foremost in the strife against darkness and oppression, and the banner of true Liberty, borne by the gallant sons of Germany, will yet wave victoriously and be loudly cheered by all the nations of the earth that love Freedom and Independence.

For here also the struggle is one for Liberty—the great watch-word that has at last crossed the broad Atlantic, reached the shores of well-guarded Europe and found an echo in the hearts of its noblest nations. Germany, we must not forget, has sent nearly a million of her sons to the Land of the Free, and the enthusiasm of the young has at last aroused the old mother-country.

Germany, once a great and glorious Empire, has been slowly declining ever since the disastrous thirty-years' war. The immediate result of the Westphalian treaty was the dissolution of the national unity and the independence of the German princes of the Empire, which thenceforth presented no longer one great idea, though, in mere form, it continued to exist for nearly a hundred and fifty years after that peace. The extinction of the race of Charlemagne, the fatal effects of the elective principle, then adopted, the selfish and destructive policy of the house of Austria, the rise and independence of Prussia had all gradually reduced the once powerful Empire to such insignificance that the abdication of the last Roman Emperor in 1806 was little more than the final act—a formal recognition of an evident and uncontested fact.

Since then Germany has had but one moment when she might have become once more a united, great Empire; but only one moment, for History grants none of her favors twice, and he whom the favor of the moment finds hesitating and doubtful, loses the opportunity for ever and falls the more rapidly. Such was the case when, after the first German Revolution in 1813, the Emperor Francis entered Paris in triumph, at the head of the allied armies. If he had then placed the crown of Charlemagne in old Notre-Dame on his anointed head, Germany might have once more risen to a splendor equal to that which was hers, when, a thousand years before, her great sovereign crowned himself in St. Peter's, at Rome. Francis was at that time the most popular man in Europe; the German nation honored in him the hero of many a battle and loved in him the father of his people. Even the other sovereigns would then have eagerly consented, for the envy, hatred and jealousy of the smaller princes of Germany—that mean and yet so fearful source of that country's weakness—had been drowned in their common hatred against a common oppressor, while Prussia's modest king would for no price have exchanged for the Roman-German crown his simple foraging-cap or for the purple of the Cæsars his gray camp-cloak, in which he passed through the ranks of his army and his people, silent and unobserved, but beloved and revered as seldom prince has been. Nor would the masters of foreign countries have opposed themselves to such a regeneration of Germany. England formally assented and Alexander of Russia urged it with an enthusiasm not a little heightened by the prospect of thus gaining Poland. But Francis was found wanting when the hour came; he remained what he was, Emperor of Austria, and never became what he had been, Emperor of Germany.

Thus the first German Revolution remained a transient and episodic event, since which Germany has in reality been in a constant state of anarchy, divided as she was into a number of independent, exclusive States, which ought to have been, by their geographical position as well as by their unity of race and language, one Germany—States left without a common head, without common laws, or even a common administration of Justice, and connected by extremely ill-defined and unintelligible relations of alliance under the name of a Germanic Confederation. In a language as general as undefined, the so-called Federal Act of the 8th of June, 1815, speaks of a union of sovereign independent States by means of an international league for the purpose of maintaining the internal (!) and external security of Germany. The only outward form in which this league ever appeared was the Federal Diet, a body of diplomats, appointed by the thirty-four sovereigns and strictly bound by their instructions. It commonly consisted of seventeen representatives as a permanent committee for ordinary matters of business, whilst a "plenum" of sixty-nine was to be called together in cases of extraordinary emergency. This Diet, of which it seems both Sovereigns and people became thoroughly ashamed, was in fact nothing more than a mere machine to register ordinances and to carry out the resolutions of Austria or the strongest portion of the German princes, checking every free movement, disregarded and almost unknown by foreign powers, hated by the people and set aside by the Sovereigns themselves, whenever their interest demanded it, as when Prussia formed her own custom-league, thus taking the earliest step in her career towards a hegemony of Germany.

Both the Federal Act and the nature of the Diet were slightly changed in 1820 in consequence of a general dissatisfaction pervading the whole German nation, and more thoroughly altered, though little improved after the French Revolution of 1830, since which the Diet waged an inexorable warfare against the public press, the right of petition and addresses, against representative chambers and especially against tricolored cockades.

Thus an institution, originally, we think, well intended and certainly capable of being developed and improved, became a disgrace and a curse to the nation. Instead of preserving the internal security of Germany, State was arrayed against State and Austria's solemn veto put upon every liberal measure the King of Prussia might propose in one of his attacks of liberalism. Instead of seeing German interests properly represented and respected abroad, there were Bremen flags crossing the Atlantic and Bavarian diplomats known to the cabinets of France: but who ever heard of a German fleet or of German Politics?

And yet the people as such nourished a sense of their common nationality. For, with the exception of the Slaves in Bohemia and the Wendes in Prussia, were they not all of the same blood, thoroughly, exclusively German, less mixed than any other nation of the earth? Had not their classical language helped to cast the minds of all in one mould and their numerous and efficient universities powerfully aided in developing the national spirit? Had they not all risen like one man when they were called upon to fight for God and Liberty, and why should not they, forty-five millions of Germans, form one people and one family?

This was the question they asked each other at every great crisis in Europe. They never did more, however. For the German's mind, so powerful when once roused and the German's enthusiasm so glowing when once kindled, are both difficult to excite. Thus when the old Ulysses in the Tuileries, the first and probably the last of the merchant-kings of Europe, was first threatened, Germany rejoiced in her heart and castles were built of wonderful hues and forms. And when old, considerate Guizot, who had been so careful in preserving and restoring that he forgot all progress, was overthrown, Germany rejoiced again and even ventured to approve of it in the seclusion of her studies and the sanctuary of her homes. But when the men of progress profited by this change of cabinet and an almost accidental street-revolution, and sent the old Ulysses away, appointing a regency, Germany was in raptures, her papers learnedly discussed the cut of the State robes of the future Regents according to models of antiquity, and incidentally spoke of a possible change in the form of the French government. More, however, was done in Paris. By a most skilful leger-de-main the regency was stolen, and with it monarchy; a small number of conspirators took hold of the central points of Paris, the Chamber of Deputies and the Hôtel de Ville, and proclaimed the Republic so suddenly and unexpectedly that even the National Guards, those genuine children of Paris, stood aghast and the provinces protested aloud against such egregious deception.

With the establishment of a Republic in France the old régime in Germany became impossible. A sudden, silent movement went through all the States of the Empire; then the tocsin sounded from city to city, bonfires sent the joyful news from mountain to mountain, and province after province rose, until Metternich fell almost as a matter of course, and the black, red and gold banner of Germany waved high above the colors of the local governments from Vistula to Rhine and from the Baltic to the Adriatic. It now became the standard of Liberty—for national unity was even then not the first thought of the people, and it was evident that Liberty was more popular than Unity, and Revolution counted more adherents than Reform. From the first, therefore, there were two distinct war-cries raised in Germany; Liberty and Equality, if possible, under a republican form of government, was the watch-word of the Revolutionizers; Liberty and National Unity, if possible, under a monarchical government, was the motto of the Reformers—a party division of vital importance, little heeded abroad and unfortunately but too much disregarded by the German Parliament.

For we must not forget that the question of German Unity had never been raised since 1813. Then, it is true, during the so-called Liberty-wars, kings and people had sworn in solemn oath to maintain a strict unity, and after the victory there had been promised to all Germans, without distinction, equal political rights and privileges in return for the blood spilt for the independence of the crowns of their sovereigns. But the nation soon found that they had freed themselves of a foreign master only to secure the rule of their own masters. Germany was gradually reconquered by her numerous sovereigns and an unremitting warfare waged against all reform and progress. For this purpose all means were considered fair and none was more powerful and none more disgraceful to the parties employing it, than the phantom of Teutonism which the monarchs conjured up to lull the restless people to sleep. A jesuitic reaction was regularly organized in Science and State against the threatening spirit of modern times; the arts were turned aside from their legitimate purpose and made instruments of oppression and the sublimely absurd idea conceived of arresting the human mind by a "romantic" school of painting and the restoration of medieval cathedrals. Whilst Louis of Bavaria thus desecrated the art of Raphael and Phidias, Prussia's fantastic king bent even the severer sciences, theology and philosophy, to the execution of his designs, and assembling the choicest spirits of the nation around his throne, endeavored to make the Past so attractive that his people might forget the Future. And for a while at least they did forget it, for his Prætorians, the élite of German scholars, poets and authors, preached the doctrine that the Law of the Future was to be found in the traditions of the middle ages alone, and that no greater blessing could be bestowed upon the nation than a restoration of the State and of the Church as they were under the action of the Feudal System and the rule of the Holy Empire. With indefatigable perseverance this "historical" school labored to resuscitate the traditions of by-gone times, and stopped not until they had gone back to the darkness of the very first centuries, until Arminius and Totila, Otho and Barbarossa became the idols of a nation which had had a Luther and a Frederick the Great. They succeeded in producing an indescribable confusion of ideas, most favorable for the cause of the princes but fatal to the people, and weakening the minds even of the strongest. Thus secured by the very weakness of their subjects, the sovereigns succeeded in holding the press in absolute subjection, and by the aid of their enormous, admirably organized armies maintained an undisputed sway. But the whole skilful scheme fell in one short month; a few weeks after the flight of Louis Philippe, Berlin, Munich, Stuttgart, Hanover, Baden and Hessen were seen busily engaged in democratic reforms, and as soon as the different states had secured a partial emancipation, their minds for years filled with but one idea, returned to the long cherished plan of forming one Germany, of creating for themselves a powerful authority, a great European Power at home and abroad.

Thus the revolution in Germany, although at first essentially political, soon partook of the character of all European revolutions of the year 1848, and by asking rights and privileges which the German populations derive from their common origin, became eminently a national movement.

It was the privilege of the most liberal State of Germany first of all to raise the banner of Liberty and Unity. In Baden, in the South-west of Germany, where the stubborn peasants discussed the rights of man long before the Republicans of France, and whence, since the time of the peasants' war that followed the Reformation, all republican movements have originated, a Representative in the Legislative Chamber, Bassermann, first moved for the formation of "a body representing the various elective Legislatures of their common country with a view to impart unity to the legislation and the institutions of Germany." This motion, taking all by surprise, was made at an auspicious time, when Bohemia was in revolt, and the Baden Press indignant at a most disgraceful treatment recently inflicted,—when the Turn-Vereins, politico-gymnastic associations dating from the Liberty-wars, claimed the right of assembling, and when Lola Montes drove the Jesuits from their last stronghold and cost Louis the Poet-king his crown. There was a general excitement prevailing through the broad land of Germany and when Heinrich von Gagern had made a similar motion in Hesse-Darmstadt, meetings were held in every city, riots broke out in all directions, Berlin was in revolution, and throughout the German States the right of popular representation and the emancipation of the press were demanded by the revolting people.

It was under such circumstances that there assembled on the first of March fifty-one Germans of high standing in the ancient capital of the Palatinate, the beautiful city of Heidelberg. They met not by appointment from their sovereigns nor by election from the people; nothing but the love of liberty and their country had brought them together. With no other authority they appointed seven of their own number a committee to prepare the draft of a National Assembly and a Constitution for Germany, and to adopt measures for assembling in Frankfurth representatives from all States as a constituent body.

Such was the spirit at that moment prevailing all over Germany, such the force of public opinion and the hold these "men of confidence," as they were called, had on the public mind, that, without a show of resistance, the minor Sovereigns yielded at once, and even Prussia and Austria were compelled to join the movement after a brief hesitation.

This call of the Heidelberg Committee was joyfully responded to by the whole nation, and on the twenty-eighth of March five hundred delegates met in the old Imperial city of Frankfurth. It was an animated scene and a strange sight to see the venerable town which had crowned the Roman Emperors of Germany for centuries, now inaugurate with a different, but not less solemn pomp, the modern era of Unity and Liberty. Once more, as of old, did the black, red and gold banner wave from the lofty steeples and towers; but in the ancient hall of the Roemer, on which a long succession of ages had imprinted lofty lessons, the symbols of a new age filled the place between the portraits of the old Emperors, and its time-honored walls, echoing once more with the voices of a deliberative assembly, saw, for the first time since the Christian era, Jew sit peaceably by Christian and humble citizen by proud nobleman. In the streets all was bustle, joy and excitement. Here stages came, filled to the very roof with old, faithful men, who had left wives and children in distant lands to help in the final realization of the ideal of their youth; fugitives from foreign shores met at the corner of the street, or recognized the care-worn face in a passing carriage and shook hands for the first time after they had parted last in prison, young and full of hope. Hither they came from France, from England, from far-off America; they had grown older and wiser; but they had grown men under a thousand various influences, and doubtfully they asked themselves—are we still the same and can we yet be one? In the streets groups of young men who had come to witness the regeneration of old Germany, stood debating grave questions, or cheering crowds of working men who, arm in arm, and half-joyful, half-threatening, sang revolutionary songs and serenaded the most liberal delegates. There was a mild spring sunshining upon the gay, excited city, in which as yet warm brotherly love was the prevailing sentiment, and but one feeling common to all was in the hearts of all—the great Future of their country.

A preparatory meeting was held on the evening of that day in the large hall of the gigantic Weidenbush-Hotel, for it was considered desirable, before entering upon the great business itself, to see the symptoms of the majority. As yet there were no divisions existing, no parties known,—in fact, nothing determined upon—not even the Diet itself. The meeting began republican enough; a red banner was seen here and there; French phrases frequently interrupted the slower German, and Socialism and Communism were openly preached. With every hour, how-over, the crowd became larger, and the meeting itself assumed a more German aspect: French common-places gradually disappeared, and all allusion to "father Cabet" were received with unequivocal signs of disapprobation. From sunset till late after midnight speech followed speech; the red republicans keeping in the foreground, declaring themselves most openly and most vehemently, while the more moderate reformers quietly listened, waiting for their time. No motions were as yet made, but one idea returned at the conclusion of every speech, and was equally cheered by all—that the government of Germany was bad, thoroughly bad, and that a reform was needed, a thorough reform.

Soon, however, the tournament began. An orator rose, and without any introductory word he declared that he would not admonish his countrymen to revolutionize, "for we are in the midst of the revolution now!" The applause was immense and Hecker's name shook the very house. For it was Hecker, the great champion of Baden, the idol of all republicans. First and foremost among the Apostles of Liberty, he was the representative of the youth of Southern Germany, who adore the goddess poetically and love her, but love her unrestrained and lawless. Although for years a successful advocate and a distinguished member of the Baden Chamber, he looked yet the "student" of Heidelberg, and his careless but kind manner,—his rich hair, which, with a light brown beard, encircled a manly, well-cut face—his simple dress hanging loosely round the full, strong form of the tall, muscular man—the bold and free movements of his arm when speaking, and his independent carriage made him naturally the hero of the young, and gave him, aided as he was by an uncommonly fine, deep barytone-voice, a powerful hold on the undecided. Thus cheers would greet him whenever he rose and, shaking his long hair from his face, proclaimed some of those paradoxes which are almost irresistible to the mass, or spoke with glowing enthusiasm of the greatness and fame of old Germany. There, however, his influence ended; he exhibited neither a peculiar strength of thought nor uncommon talents, much less that superiority of character so indispensable for the great leader of a nation; his ideas of the State were but half matured; his talent of speaking respectable, but not without a certain rudeness, and entirely wanting when he attempted to enter more deeply into any of the important subjects before the meeting. That he was brave, frank and honest, no one could have doubted; but even these advantages lost much by his uncontrollable impetuosity, without genuine enthusiasm or sacred faith. It was this rashness which induced him to withdraw from the Diet, when, after a most passionate discussion, his ultra-measures were rejected: let us hope it was also this rashness alone which caused the death of the old General, who was treacherously murdered at Kamdern by the troops under Hecker's command. His friends absolved him, but the nation waited in vain for his own exculpation: he would not or he could not free himself, and thus he fell forever. May his residence in this country so purify his sincere patriotism as to make him yet what he deserves to be, the honored servant of a great nation.

How different in appearance was his colleague, Struve, who rose with him and failed like him when attempting to revolutionize Germany by the aid of foreign troops and foreign money! An indefatigable journalist and excellent orator, he had often been called the monk of German Republicans, a name which his dry, lean figure, his thin hair and parchment brow, his small, dull eyes and lymphatic complexion, his abstinence from animal food, and his great self-control and utter abhorrence of all luxury, even that of thought, may easily have won for him. Well trained to public speaking, he rose quietly to occupy the tribune, and waited immovable until the storm had abated: then his clear, ringing voice rose high above all other sounds and preached, with more calculation than boldness, the doctrines of Rousseau and Robespierre. Without any mental superiority, poor in thoughts and poor in imagination, he still exercised a powerful influence over the most exalted of the red republicans; his ultra views, however, soon made him no longer admissible to the Diet, and since his mad and lawless insurrectionary movement, he has been almost forgotten, even by his own followers.

These two were the principal orators that evening, and theirs were the doctrines of ultra-republicanism at any price. The more moderate party waited in silence; only two of their leaders spoke. One was Wëlcker, the statesman, one of the first men of Germany, renowned as a scholar, successful as a minister and beloved as a patriot. Few cheers greeted the thin, elderly man with the whitish-gray hair when he first rose, for the masses knew him not; but his large light-blue eye, as brilliant though not as piercing as that of the great Frederick, commanded attention, while his free, independent carriage, and the safe confidence playing round his half-opened lips, gained him the hearts of his audience. The other was Raveaux of Cologne, whose fine limbs and pale, delicate features, with the short, dark hair and black eyes, would have bespoken the Frenchman, but for the mild expression of his eye and the gentle heartiness in his somewhat husky voice, which are not to be found in men of Ro-manic blood. Eloquent as few Germans are, though plain and natural in his language, he won the good opinion of the mass, not less by his amiability than by the consciousness of his intrinsic strength and firm conviction. A most distinguished member of the present Parliament, he has been less successful in his capacity as Imperial Minister, and has recently returned to his parliamentary career.

The conviction with which the assembled delegates went home that night, was one so thoroughly German, that nothing could be more characteristic of their political education at least. The general impression, repeatedly and loudly proclaimed was, that if the revolution already really existed, as they had been repeatedly told, it was perhaps as well as not; at all events they would not be to blame for it!

Many, however, were the speeches yet made that night—it was so new and so delightful to be allowed to speak! From the balconies and from the windows, from roofs and tables men poured out their long pent-up feelings. There was one large bay-window of the Weidenbush-Hotel open and the red light of torches, held by a dozen sturdy men, shone through the dark night upon a sea of eager uplifted faces. Within stood a small, thin man, and with a hoarse voice proclaimed that the Republic was already within and without. All the wealth of the earth was to be poured into the lap of Germany. All the magnificence of worldly splendor was to be hers; nothing but infamy was left to the sovereigns; nothing but glory waiting for the heroes of the day; wages would be high, food abundant, trade brisk and all happy! And in this strain the priest went on—for a priest he was, though he forgot that the Christian's faith is one that first demands obedience before it promises; that his religion is one of resignation and self-sacrifice, that loves to give more than to take, and lets him only win the world who loses himself. It was Johannes Ronge, the reformer of the church, now reforming the State, and this was the last time he was heard in public.

On the following day five hundred deputies met in a self-constituted Diet, without regular powers from their constituents and without official convocation, but so imposing was this manifestation of the will of the nation in its peaceful majesty, that people and sovereigns by acclamation acknowledged their authority, and by silent assent conferred upon them the supreme power in Germany. The princes made a last attempt to save at least the appearance of their authority, and instructed the Federal Diet to resolve that seventeen men who enjoyed the confidence of their fellow-citizens, should be admitted to its councils and have each one vote in the Permanent Committee. They hoped thus to allay the popular ferment, and to leave the power of reform in the hands of the Diet, or at least of a Congress appointed by themselves. But here also those ominous words were heard—It is too late! The Vor-Parliament, as the five hundred were called, declared themselves "morally" permanent; the Diet was de facto powerless, and dethroned by this improvised body, a force far more powerful than bayonets. The Vor-Parliament sat only for a few days in deliberation, but resolved and decided in the name of the German nation, that it belonged to a National Assembly alone to give a constitution to Germany—that this National Assembly was to be elected by universal suffrage, and that every German should be allowed to represent every part of Germany. To this first manifestation of the principle of Unity were added other resolutions, some of which referred to the position of the Federal Diet, and one of the most interesting scenes of those momentous days was the appearance of the President of the Diet of Princes before the men of the nation, handing over his authority to a simple professor, Mittermeier, the President of the Diet of the People!

The Vor-Parliament then dissolved again—delegating their power to a Committee of Fifty, who were to watch over the interests of Germany until the meeting of the National Assembly and to direct the measures for the general election of Delegates. These fifty appointed again seventeen of their own number as an executive board, among whom were found men like Dahmann, one of the seven exiles of Goettingen, now professor at Bonn, and as renowned in the literary world by his historical writings as he is endeared to the hearts of all Germans by his early and constant efforts to advance the progress of constitutional principles in that country. At his side were Gervinus, Professor at Heidelberg, a man of great weight and authority, and Uhland the poet, than whom few are more popular among their enthusiastic countrymen. These seventeen were from March till May the supreme authority ruling all Germany—certainly an honorable trust, well bestowed and well executed.

In the meantime the sovereigns yielded with tolerably good grace, and preferred issuing themselves the orders for the election of Delegates, rather than see their own authority entirely disregarded and superseded by the will of the people. This was, however, not all they gained; following the example of Prussia's crafty politicians, they caused the elections to be made in the terms of their proclamations, "for a Diet, meeting in the name of the people and the sovereigns as a Constituent Assembly." Thus they reserved to themselves the right of seceding from the cause of the people, whenever it would be in their power, or of withholding their consent to what the Assembly might decide—a fruitful source of difficulties and impediments in the way of the Diet.

It was on the eighteenth of May that the first German Parliament ever assembled, met in St. Paul's, with all the solemnity due to such an important event in the history of a great nation. Heinrich von Gagern, one of the noblest sons of Germany, was elected President, and at once resigned his office as Prime Minister of Hesse-Darmstadt to devote himself exclusively to the regeneration of his country. Soon after the first organization of the Diet, Dahlmann arose and laid before them his project of a constitution. One point only seemed at once and unanimously to be agreed upon, that it would be necessary to have a provisional Central Power to regulate the relations of the Constituent Assembly to the various State-governments of the confederation, and to execute the decrees of the new Parliament. The archduke John of Austria was elected the Provisional Executive officer under the name of Vicar of the Empire; seven Delegates were sent to offer him that high but difficult position, which he accepted with the consent of the Austrian government, and in the month of July the Archduke was solemnly installed at Frankfurth, vowing obedience to the authority of the law under which he had been appointed.

He came from the distant province of the great Austrian Empire, where he had led for many years a retired, but most happy life. A good father, an exemplary master, a skilful farmer and a pleasant neighbor was the Archduke, and the people around him loved him. But beyond the mountains of Tyrol few only knew him. The Gotha calendar, it is true, stated his titles and his years, but as he had no hope of succession and sought no influence at court—what cared the world for a quiet, sober prince? But years passed, times changed, and the world changed too. And they did at last care for a quiet, sober, virtuous prince, for they wanted one. There was a festival held at the city of Cologne on the Rhine; a cathedral begun by a people, the people of Europe, was to be finished by a king, the king of Prussia! They laid a new corner-stone and drank toasts, and a dozen monarchs were there. But Austria could not send her real monarch, for Metternich was old and loved not large crowds, and the so-called Emperor was as weak in mind as the other in body; so they thought of the old prince John and he went. And when they drained their cups and drank each other's health, the good old Archduke rose, and from his heart's core he drank to the health of a "One, United Germany!" It was a new word that, and had not been heard for centuries; but it had been lying in man's bosom ready to germinate again, and whilst the princes looked aghast and a shudder crept over them, the lofty hall shook with the applause that followed these words, and they flew over the broad plains of Germany until the Slave and the Frank, the Norman and the Roman were startled by the cry of the "One united Germany."

Nor did they forget him who had sent the magic word abroad. They inquired who is he? History answered from the pages of Napoleon's wars, and spoke of him as a brave soldier and a wise captain. His friends praised his vast knowledge and his moderation, his manly independence, his modest tastes and his liberal opinions. Tyrol, all Tyrol, rose and said—he is our father! And at the word 'father,' old memories awoke. Men whispered to each other, and old papers were searched, and it was heard over all Germany—he is the prince who dared defy the Emperor and his ministers; he is the prince who preferred doing right and living a poor, but a free man, to yielding to prejudices and dwelling in palaces. He it was who, travelling through his future home, was struck by the strange appearance of his postillion. He spoke to him and received no answer. He spoke again and impatiently: the postillion was silent. He commanded, he threatened—and beheld a face blushing, suffused with tears. It was the farmer's fair daughter, who, distressed at the postillion's absence, had quickly put on his dress, and rather than disappoint the beloved prince, performed the servant's task herself. He spoke with her and thought he had found a precious pearl: it was not a romantic love-affair, nor the headlong enthusiasm of a youth; it was the sincere conviction that with her was the happiness of his heart and the peace of his soul. When she had been educated as he wished her to be, he applied to the Emperor for leave to marry her, for he had been a dutiful son and a loyal subject all his life. But the courtiers were amazed and the Imperial family full of indignation. He insisted in spite of all reasoning, prayers and threats, and finally gave up his appanage, his place at court, his right of succession, all, and married her whom he loved better than all the world. That was the secret of his residence in Tyrol; where he lived, not in imperial splendor, but in unalloyed happiness; his beloved wife by his side and his beautiful child on his knee.

And when Germany looked around for a prince in whose hands they might lay the fate of the great Empire, whom they might safely trust with the liberty of a great nation, they bethought themselves of him who had shown such true courage and such independence—of him whom the people, in whose midst he lived a private citizen, loved as their father—of him who had spoken those great, sacred words.

There he stood now before those who had called him to the highest dignity a people can bestow, in plain citizen's dress; simple in manners and yet full of dignity; goodness of heart legibly written in every feature of his true Austrian face, from the peculiar eye to the thick, hanging under lip; but showing no trace of weakness, no want of decision, nothing but strong good sense and manly firmness of character. He pleased everybody, more by his great simplicity and the utter absence of all pretension, than by a striking superiority of mind or other brilliant qualities. He showed himself from the first as a man animated by the warmest zeal to do what he considered right; of sufficient energy to overcome ordinary difficulties, and with a tendency towards liberal institutions. His undoubted sincerity and the firmness he has shown in more than one trying emergency, have gained him the respect of even those who hate him as a prince, or look upon him as an inferior man. That he is not a man capable to govern circumstances and to lead a movement, to give a decided direction to the popular mind, or to create and carry out new ideas, is as true as that Germany has, during that whole eventful year, not produced one such man.

At his side stood Gagern; who would have been Vicar himself, had he not wanted one quality to be Germany's first man—ambition. He looked very much the American, especially in profile and when silent. The dignified calmness of his large, but regular features, the high forehead, the closed lip, the well-rounded chin, full of energy and indomitable will, give him a lofty, imposing appearance; there is the rare breadth of the brow, the German thinker's indelible stamp; there also the clear blue eye, full of faith and deep feeling; nor is the good, hearty smile wanting and the confiding frankness in all features that characterize the German among all other nations of Saxon blood. By birth an aristocrat, he had still, from his first entrance into public life, been a zealous advocate of liberal views, a warm friend of reform and progress; serving his native country with untiring perseverance, he had always been true to Germany, and when the people called him from his post, he willingly forsook all, honors, riches and even his sweet home to serve his beloved fatherland. Refusing all compensation as long as the country was yet suffering, he lived a true republican in the most retired and modest manner, and in the silent, shrinking man at the Vicar's side, few would have sought him whom all hearts called the first man of Germany.

Before them in the spacious church of St. Paul sat the Delegates of the nation. The buildings both in form and size, seemed to be admirably adapted to its present use: it was round and the amphitheatrically-disposed benches allowed each member to see the orator, who spoke from a tribune immediately under the President's chair. Two aisles, diverging from the latter towards the right and left, divided the whole space into three divisions, which, from their position to the chair, have given their names to the three parties into which the Diet soon after its organization divided: the Right representing the Conservative party and advocating the principle of Legitimacy; the Left, where the Republicans are seated, including the admirer of American institutions and him who wishes for a Republic even through blood and anarchy, and the Centre, where the Moderate party unites those who are in favor of a Constitutional Monarchy and those who would be willing, at least as a pis aller, to consent to the establishment of a republic. Around the lower part of the church, separated by pillars from the main body, were seats for some of the members and tribunes assigned to the diplomatic corps, the ladies, stenographers and strangers. The upper gallery was filled with "the people," the strangest motley of gentlemen, jews, boys, old bucksters, red republicans, foreign emissaries and half-starved mechanics that ever graced the halls of a National Assembly. It is true these two thousand spectators infused a certain life into the august body, but their whistles were anything but harmonious, and the signs of contempt with which they regularly received any allusion to kings or monarchical institutions, were such as would not be tolerated in any other public place. They drowned in their yells the orator's voice and the President's bell, whose last resource, the armed force, had more than once to protect the Assembly. That the members of the Left but too frequently provoked the participation of the galleries in the debates and occasionally joined them in their signs of disapprobation, had done much harm to the cause of Republicanism, frightening the timid and disgusting the well-meaning.

But a strange motley also was the Diet itself, and strange neighbors found themselves side by side in the church of St. Paul. Princes sat by simple mechanics, Jews by Catholic priests, Slaves by Germans. Some few only were generally known and attracted much attention. There in the front rank, right under the tribune, a spare, stooping old man listened with difficulty to the words of the Speaker. His white hair hung carelessly around the strangely formed head, the haggard features were deeply furrowed by years and cares and were frequently buried in those trembling hands that had written immortal works. It was the great Jacob Grimm. When he heard the great news that came from Heidelberg, he lifted his hands to heaven and thanked God that he had been allowed to see that day break when Germany would be free. But then he looked round for his brother William, who had been all in all to him, and he found him not; he could not tell him the joyous news—he could not rejoice with him. And his heart was heavy, for his brother had gone before him, and the poor old man was sinking fast under the weight of his years and the burden of his grief. For they loved each other with more than brotherly love, and beautiful was their reciprocal devotion. Once people came and told the two brothers how wrong it was and how selfish it looked, thus to live for themselves alone, and advised them to marry and be happy. Jacob listened and nodded assent; so did his brother. And Jacob turned round and said, "Yes, William, I really think you had better marry." "Ah, Jacob," replied the other, "you know that all my life, I have had to do everything for you!" And he went and married. But he could not live for his brother; God called him home and there sat Jacob, now quite alone, and mourned over his lost William.

Far on the extreme Right sat a man whom few liked and fewer still loved, for he was a strange man in his manners, and a prince. In his youthful days already, when he lived with his father and an austere tutor in his ancient castle in the Bohemian mountains, he had felt the bitterness of the curse of poverty. And bitterer yet was his disappointment when he became sensible in later years that his ambition, the ambition of a prince, was not supported by princely talents. He wished to be an author like his fellow-sufferer, Puckler-Muskau, but few read his book and little renown it brought him. He tried to become a second Talleyrand, but these odious Prussians required real knowledge and three examinations before they would make him an unpaid attaché in some principality of four square miles. So he bought a colonelcy in Don Carlos' army and rose to be a general and a grandee of Spain, but Don Carlos could not pay his salary, and when peace was made he was a poor prince again. Ever on the qui vive for some means to rise to eminence, he had thrown himself into political life, and there he was, of course, on the extreme Right—where else could a prince be, except on the extreme Left?—a member of all committees, and alas! the friend and admirer of all the fair ladies of Frankfurt! For a fine-looking man Prince Lichnowsky certainly was, and such a title and such a moustache, who could resist them in good old Germany? He spoke too and spoke well, for he had courage, and that was a rare virtue in those days on the Continent. They spoke of abolishing titles—the work of abolishing and destroying seemed to be very easy and wonderfully attractive—and he told them in plain words, that they might abolish as much as they chose, and call him Master Lichnowsky as long as they chose, but that a hundred years hence his sons would yet be princes again. It was a bold speech, though not a prudent one, and they liked his boldness. Poor prince! he did not know that in a few months a mother would throw herself upon his mutilated corpse and a father weep bitterly over the last of his race!

By his side sat another prominent member of the Right, Baron Vincke, who gloried in being a Prussian and abhorred Republicans. A short, stout man with a broad German face, spectacles covering his very sharp, prominent eyes, and early gray hair falling over his low, but broad forehead, he spoke most eloquently with every feature and accompanied his words with most extraordinary gestures. He was bitter and sarcastic, not without brilliant wit, but possessing neither dignity nor calmness enough to make deep impressions. When he rose he seldom failed to show an astonishing memory and most acute criticism in reviewing the speeches of his adversaries and literally cutting them to pieces. He cared not if he offended others, and the President constantly called him to-order; more frequently yet the Left, whom he spared not, would interrupt him by whistling and hissing, when he would passionately turn towards them and with a most unmelodious voice cry out—"Why don't you let me speak? what good does it do you to interrupt me? I shan't step for all that; it only delays us. Hold your tongue!" Baron Vincke was the champion of a party, not large, but influential, who were supposed to be in favor of a monarchical reaction, although not opposed to reform. They were, however, thorough Prussians and only waiting for the favorable moment when the house of Hohenzollern was once more—as a hundred years before—to humble the house of Habsburg and rise on its ruins.

The members of the Cabinet were of course little seen; their uncommonly difficult and responsible duties left them little leisure, even if they had not been mostly inexperienced in affairs of State, and however excellent as bankers, judges and barristers, but little prepared for such a task. The members of the Diet were more frequently to be met with; some at the tables d'hôte of the various hotels where they dined; some at the country-house near the Promenade, where they assembled every evening until the different parties chose their own places of meeting; and others, apparently anxious to display their new and ill-fitting dignity, everywhere. This gratification was, however, not without its thorns; if they belonged to the Left and were the usual costume of their party, of which a long uncombed beard covering three-fourths of the face, and a robber-hat with tall feathers formed an indispensable part, they were apt to be carefully avoided by the well-dressed and rather laughed at by the people. If well-dressed themselves and bearing the aristocratic air of the Right, they were in constant danger of being hooted at and pelted by the amiable Frankfurth mob. Even those who had always been on the people's side did not escape ill-treatment if they attracted public curiosity by any singularity of dress. For this none had more to suffer than old father Jahn, as all Germany styles him, the father of German gymnastics, a brave soldier in the liberty-wars, and an ardent, long persecuted friend of liberty. In vain had he lingered many years in cruel imprisonment for the cause of freedom; in vain had he been brought before one court of justice after another for having first proclaimed that most dangerous doctrine of the Unity of Germany—his beard was too long, his costume too fantastic, his speeches too wild, and thus his influence diminished under the relentless scourge of ridicule. He was finally abandoned even by his own party, a party of republicans, because, with more good sense than they even showed, he would not follow them in their absurd schemes to proclaim and establish a republic made by pattern, as he said, and equally well or ill adapted for Hesse-Darmstadt and Texas, Germany and the United States. He insisted upon it that neither German history nor the peculiar defects or merits of the character of the nation ought to be disregarded in such a work.

He was, however, left alone in his creed. For it is a remarkable fact, that the more rudely oppressed a people have been, the greater has been their tendency to abuse their freedom when they at last obtain it. Man must be prepared by education for freedom, and constitutions are not made, they grow with a nation. The republican party of Germany, from the beginning, rejected all organic development of more liberal institutions. They set the Past entirely aside, utterly regardless of what old wise Grimm repeatedly told them, that the people who did not look to a Past did not deserve a Future. Some proposed at once to avail themselves of the heat of excitement, and republican enthusiasm prevailing at the moment, to form a Parliamentary army and with this powerful argument demonstrate the necessity of a new order of things. Quoting Cæsar's famous omnium opinione celerius cum exercitu adfuit, they considered this the basis of all revolution and the language most easily and readily understood by princes and nations. Their efforts, however, were unsuccessful; the only armed movements set on foot by them in Southwestern Germany were easily suppressed; Hocher, who raised first of all the standard of Red Republicanism at Constance, failed at the very outset, losing all and his honor at Kaudern; Struve beginning with better success, was totally defeated at Eberlingen, and the poet Herwegh altogether despaired, after waiting for months in Alsace for allies and subsidies from abroad.

The moderate Republicans, although eagerly bent upon bringing about a thorough change, were apprehensive of a failure from too hasty measures. Forming a very numerous and important party, they counted among their number men of undoubted honesty and sincerity, but men also who knew no higher view than to choose what was most likely to succeed and to prevent a crisis. From their side of the House came words like those of Vogt, who asked the member that had spoken before him, why he talked of a God who did not exist, of a religion that nobody cared for, and of a church that was the greatest enemy of public liberty!

Thus there was nothing done by the Left, and the Centre was, by its very principle, to be a mediator between the two extremes, bound to observe that most equivocal and in this case most pernicious policy of masterly inactivity. Its members were in favor of all temporising laws, carrying the election of a Provisional Vicar and a Provisional Cabinet, and pleading that the people would be mere willing to yield to provisional than to definitive measures. All that the true men of Germany, under the protective influence of a long peace, had secretly thought and planned, all that had been published in disguise or in open defiance, in monthlies and weeklies, folios and pamphlets, lectures and protocols, was by them now slowly brought into the great workshop of German Unity, carefully taken up piece by piece, examined, explained, commented upon and annotated, and finally either quietly laid to sleep for another generation, or generously and courageously preached as the future evangelium of Germany! They were the most zealous in fostering and encouraging the hesitation of the sovereigns who could not decide whether it was better to sacrifice at once a part of their power in favor of one Central Power, and thus to secure at least their independence, or to risk all by a passive resistance, waiting for a favorable moment to declare themselves openly. Thus the Diet was found to be engaged in everything that was least necessary; the question of a flag for the navy was discussed at great length before a single German ship of war existed; whilst Vienna was bombarded and a member of the Parliament ignominiously hung, a minister was almost impeached for having dared to use his official seal on a private letter, and months were spent in discussing minute details before any of the most important questions were decided; until the people knew no longer who governed, and the Reaction had quietly collected all its forces, standing ready for the great crisis that is to decide on the future of Germany.

For the Reaction, represented by the Right, is the only party in Germany that has shown real, useful activity. Whilst the party of Progress lost one opportune moment after another, when Austria and Prussia were so busy at home that the new Diet might have obtained almost any concession from them, when all the various governments vied with each other in acknowledging the Central Power and the thirty-four sovereigns all sought refuge under the Imperial Mantle, the Reactionnaires alone quietly but steadily held together, giving way for the moment, but, nothing daunted, prepared for the final battle. Well and ably represented in the Parliament by old generals, experienced statesmen and able financiers, they failed not to gain a certain respect which the mass always grants, at least on second sober thought, to real worth and discreet energy. Here also were found, either belonging to the Right or at least closely connected with it, some of the members who had gained experience and earned distinction in the new world. There was one of the Secretaries, Moering, who, when quite young, had risen high in the Austrian army, and then on a mission from his government, had spent several years in the United States, where he imbibed a warm admiration for republican institutions and received seeds on a fertile soil that had since produced most valuable fruit. There he stood, a representative of Germany, chosen by the free will of the people in the very heart of absolutism and under the very eye of a Metternich, and eloquent were his words and impressive, like a circlet of precious pearls, well rounded and well strung together. He referred often to the laws and history of America, counselling his fellow-citizens not merely to imitate that free country, but to profit by her dearly bought experience. There was also Tellkamp, for years a professor in the city of New York, afterwards in the Prussian service and highly distinguished as a writer on prisons, but less successful in teaching the peculiar doctrines which he had brought home from the United States. Not a member of the Parliament, but perhaps more useful than he could have been as such, was Professor Lieber of South Carolina, whose early sufferings for the sacred cause of Liberty and well-known works on Ethics and Political Economy, together with his long experience of American public life, made him high authority for the statesmen of the day.

This inactivity of the Parliament has, it cannot be denied, deprived it of its former popularity, and the nation has no longer that enthusiastic trust in it which the "men of confidence" enjoyed. A dissolution and new elections have been proposed, but they would avail little, for all that Germany has of talent, intelligence and patriotism is now assembled in St. Paul's and the dullness of the debates, the slowness of action, the want of parliamentary routine and of statesmanship are not defects of the present members, but the sad consequences of the political history of the people. Germany has no better men. The Parliament as an active united body is a vision, because Germany, as a strong united power is a vision. But even if it were a "One united Germany" for the moment, as it undoubtedly was during the crisis of 1813, it is utterly wanting in that system of centralization which has made France so powerful. There is, on the contrary, a principle of particularization, a spirit of locality prevailing in Germany which has exercised a most fatal effect even on the Diet. These long-cherished habits of provincial or municipal existence have proved insuperable impediments in the way of a strict union, and the different governments were of course not willing, at the mere intimation of a few men, to abdicate or to give up any part of their privileges. And can we fairly expect that a State, like Prussia, with its own traditions, patronage, clientele and national genius, should wish to give up at once the command of its armies, the right of representation abroad, the possession of its fortresses, its revenues, its jurisdiction—in fact its very existence? What equivalent is there offered for such sacrifices or what benefit for the common country to be obtained by it? Do the Germans know themselves whether the majority prefer a republic or a monarchy? They know it not, if we may judge from their representatives; for even among them that spirit of particularization is stronger than their patriotism. The Russian looks with envy upon the Austrian, and the Bavarian receives with distrust all propositions of men from the North. Thus every party is again subdivided into the most minute fractions; thus there is never a real majority to be obtained, however small the minority may be, held together only by the natural instinct of all minorities. Hence the repeated threat of the republicans to leave the Diet; hence the actual withdrawal of all the Austrian delegates.

The situation of the German Parliament must then be considered as an extremely precarious one. Its very nature as a provisional Diet, elected as a constituent body and acting as a legislative assembly, places it, to a certain extent, beyond all protection of law or right. It exposes it, not to speak of more serious questions, to the inconvenience of being suddenly left without support.

In a financial, as in fact in all legislative aspects, it must de jure be considered as the legitimate successor and heir to the defunct Federal Diet. Like this it has hitherto been supported by the voluntary contributions of the several governments, and of late, it is said, by Prussia alone. Should this power follow the example of Austria and withdraw, the Diet would be left without supplies to pay its members or carry out its measures. But if the Parliament is weak in pecuniary resources, it is weaker yet in character. Acting as it does only provisionally and supported, nominally, at least, by an army consisting of the contingents of the different States, commanded by their officers and paid by them, it is entirely dependent on the good will of these governments. Thus left without any visible evidence of real strength, and gradually losing its moral hold on the mind of the nation, unacknowledged by foreign powers and altogether in a most equivocal position, it is opposed by both of the main parties in Germany. Republicans and Monarchists consider it an inconvenient impediment in the way of a thorough revolution or a restoration of the old order of things. The Réactionnaires especially are but too well aware that the people prefer a strong, energetic government of almost any name to an inactive, insufficient Diet, and ask for peace and order above all things. Every attempt made by the opposite party has but strengthened this feeling; the tremendous power of the loyal armies has repeatedly been felt, whilst the Anarchists have been convicted if not of cowardice, at least of incapacity; the state of siege is praised as the state of order and law, and with a little wise management and judicious compliance—as in the last Prussian constitution, octroyée as it is—it may well be expected, that the first red flag, planted on a barricade, will see the last day of German Liberty.

For the German Diet is the representative of German Liberty; if the Parliament falls, little is to be hoped for the cause of freedom. In Austria and Prussia the government triumphs over the people, and foreign powers will be slow, if not unable, to assist their unfortunate neighbor. Strange changes have taken place during the latter months of the past year. France is under a Napoleon; Italy left without any leader; Switzerland condemned to inactivity; Hungary beset by formidable armies on all her frontiers; Denmark preparing for a second war, and Russia ready with a nation in arms. Austria is in the hands of a youth, himself guided by the Archduchess Sophia, the actual chief of the house of Austria, and through her sister, the queen of Prussia, almost of Prussia also. Little then is left of Germany to act by itself, and the only hope of at last ending the provisional state of affairs lies in the combination of the Diet with one of the great powers. At present it seems to lean towards Prussia, which in its admirable administrative genius and its powerful, efficient and well-officered army would appear to offer a strong guarantee that, with its king as Emperor of Germany, the Central Power might once more become, what it must be to be successful, a power full of life and energy, well supported by real strength, and above all by the will of the people.

Description of the Burial-Place at Sidon.

—"The greater part of the thickly-peopled cemetery was in gloom—a gloom which the Orientals love. They do not like to come to the tombs in the glare of day; early morning and evening are their favorite times, especially the latter."

"Go forth at morn!

Ere yet upon the solemn stillness come
The distant echoes of the city's hum,
In the gray dawn,
While yet the lingering mist-wreaths hang around,
Go forth, and bow thyself on holy ground!"

"And go at eve—

Our sadness loveth not the day's broad light,
But, when around us gather shades of night
Our homes we leave,
And wander forth where, 'mid the flowers are laid
In their lone-resting-place the holy dead."

"We have lain down

The best-beloved in earth's cold embrace,
They have passed hence, and left us but the trace
Of footsteps gone
From homes where they of late in beauty sate,
But grown all cheerless now, and desolate."

"Calmly they sleep;

But we call vainly now; no answering voice
Waking glad echoes, bide the heart rejoice,
And we but weep
And watch, until we too, like them may rest Unknown, unloving, in oblivion blest."

Oh, human love!

A holy, yet a fearful thing thou art,
That all unchanged, abiding in the heart,
Canst faithful prove,
And watch uncheered, untranquillized by Faith
Weeping, yet hopeless in the place of death!

A loftier trust

Is ours; we may not make the tomb
A place of nought but deepened shade and gloom,
But where our dust
Sleeps with its own, the fresh spring-flowers that wave
Whisper of life, unsaddened by the grave.

We walk in light

Which showeth to our steps the better way,
That leadeth onward unto perfect day;
It shineth bright,
That radiance, from angel wings erst shed
Where, in the garden, slept and rose the Dead!

MATELDA F. DONA.

SWIFT.

BY H. T. TUCKERMAN.

The obstacle which has interfered with a just appreciation of Swift, by British writers, has been political opinion. Hence the two extremes of laudation and censure manifested in Scott's partial biography and Jeffrey's caustic review. It is, indeed, to be regretted by all lovers of literature, in its broad and artistic relations, when a great writer becomes a violent partisan. The interest of his works is thus rendered temporary and their spirit narrowed. Instead of comprehensive views fitted to charm the thinker of a distant generation, they too often yield but clever instances of special-pleading, and are intended for a day and not for all time. Although a great part of Swift's writings belongs to this class, the fact that they have survived and are still read with zest, is the best proof of his originality. What strikes us, at once, in his literary career, is its remarkable efficiency. It is common to regard the man of letters and the man of action as wholly distinct, but in Swift we have an example of their identity. The results of his pen were actual, tangible and impressive. He wrote seldom for display, occasionally for amusement, but, in general, to produce a decided end, in which he seldom failed. His life is a complete refutation of the utilitarian sneer at the vanity of authorship. Here we have a man of no estate and obscure birth, by the mere force of his diction and the energy of his thought, exercising an influence upon those possessed of executive power to such a degree as to control and direct it. We see him espouse a cause in his study and are assured of its triumph; we hear his repartee at a political dinner silence a concerted opposition; we follow the paragraph which he has indited for a journal, as it circulates through a kingdom, and diverts into a new channel the whole tide of public opinion. Pamphlets were his ammunition. With these he carried on argumentative and satirical war, and waged battles for a party or a whim. A sarcasm, or an epigram often enabled him to attain his social objects; and he inflamed the popular heart with appeals distributed by the ballad-mongers. Thus his single will was continually achieving its ends, and his thought moulding opinion. Like the renowned man-at-arms of the middle ages, his services and allegiance were eagerly sought by those in power, and his pen was to him what the sword was to the brave and skilful of an earlier day—the instrument at once of fortune, vengeance and glory.

Hence his success is to be estimated by the number of his immediate triumphs, rather than by the duration of his fame. He wrote always for a special purpose, and this accomplished, gave himself no farther trouble. His mind was essentially practical, his aims invariably definite. Few English writers have labored to such good purpose, if we deem the realization of individual desire—the impinging of one's way of thinking upon others, as the test of ability. Whether to gratify a caprice, to punish an enemy, to convert an antagonist, or to change the face of public affairs, Swift wrote with a tact, a force and a clearness that almost ensured a satisfactory issue. He selected the best weapon and used it with rare judgment. He did not seem to consider writing as an ideal, but a practical art. It was his unflinching resource. If we would appreciate his efficiency as an author,—without reckoning the influence of his pen when in the service of the English ministry, at which time it is acknowledged that he long controlled the political views of the nation;—let us remember the fact that one of his pamphlets caused the erection of fifty new churches in London; that the "predictions of Isaac Bickerstaff" besides exciting the activity of the Inquisition of Portugal, gave the primary impulse to periodical literature and originated the British essayists; that the pretended confession of Elliston actually checked street-robbery for years; that he made the fortune of Barber the printer, afterwards Lord Mayor, and that the Drapier's letters were the first and may yet be recorded as the most effectual blow ever struck for Ireland. With such fruits the pen-craft of Swift abounded. His life is a wonderful contrast to that of the meditative of the lettered race. Conflict apparently was his delight. Authorship was a single-handed fight. He was a kind of intellectual gladiator, and only in the excitement of a war of opinion, or a skirmish of wit, appears to have been able to render himself oblivious of a morbid physique and corroding passions. He long enjoyed a wide mental dictatorship, such as Boswell's idol aspired to, but only attained in a particular circle. His enterprise of mind has been rarely equalled. He was a bold opinionative adventurer; formidable in grave discussions and ingenious in trifling. No curious speculations, no aspiring visions, no exquisitely elaborated fancies adorn his page; but pungent sense, keen wit, adroit argument and vigorous judgment often lead us to respect where we can neither admire or love. Swift's power lay in his grasp of the actual. He had a clear, but not an exalted vision. He looked more frequently to the strata beneath than the stars above him; and was more anxious for a good foothold on the material present than a clear glimpse into the eternal future. He dealt mainly with the ive, the attainable—the facts and interests of the world and man—and the motives and tendencies of the hour. He was a kind of inspired poet, and wrote very much on the principles which Stuart painted. Refinement, delicacy—all that we intend by the term ideal—was alien to his nature. He possessed eminently the genius of common sense. His insight into that of affairs. Of the able men of his day, as best armed and equipped for the useful literature: He threw the light of genuine influence on many of the questions of the time, addressed the universal mind in a way readily understood. Hence both his usefulness and popularity. To a like cause we attribute that influence to his literary reputation which has been noticed as a peculiarity. He had not the inclination to cherish the highest view of the world cultivated. Its value to him was comparatively material. The objects he sought rendered the means employed secondary. He exercised authorship as an attorney pleads—with logic, ingenuity and eloquence, but when the end was gained, the plea was forgotten. The principles which endure literature, as such, are taste and taste, the former recognizing the substance, the latter the form. Swift was so much occupied with the advocacy of particular ideas that the achievement of temporary projects, that scarcely dreamed of embodying his talents in the production of well-considered elegance and grace. Carelessness is stamped on all his works. Their harmony is incomplete. If he argues on sentiment, it is soon profaned by vulgarity; the brightness of his intelligence is obscured by vulgarity; and the subtlety of his judgment blunted by the coarseness of his expression.

With great mental activity Swift united a singleness of purpose. He was both acute and fearless, and hence admirably fitted to excel as a partisan writer. Much has been said of his inconsistency in this vocation, but when all the circumstances are weighed, it does not appear so singular. He was confessedly a moderate Whig, but carried the same temper to the other standard. Macaulay, in his recent history—after tracing the real origin of the two great English parties to the Long Parliament, justly declares that the country could spare neither, and that mutual action gave birth to and confirmed the equally-balanced principles of constitutional government. He also recognizes a similar distinction in the very nature of society—with reference to art, literature and manners as well as to politics. Such is the opinion of all liberal and enlightened men. Doubtless Swift embarked in the career of a political essayist, in part from motives of self-interest; but his early initiation into comprehensive speculations while secretary to Sir William Temple, his knowledge of the world, and his keen perception of merits and defects both in character and in theories, justify the inference that he belonged to the clear-sighted and right-feeling class indicated by the fluent historian, who occupy the frontier ground, and, therefore, are not to be condemned as insincere for alternate skirmishes on both sides. Candor will not fail often to discern essential principles in the views he advocated however contradictory; and Jeffrey's inference that in the Drapier's Letters, his object was "not to do good to Ireland, but to vex the English ministry," is quite gratuitous. In this, as in most cases, he doubtless acted from blended motives; for throughout his life he seems to have taken a peculiar delight in exercising benevolence morosely, and giving way to malevolence urbanely,—enjoying the zest of retaliation and the consciousness of doing good at the same time. Thus we believe his sympathy with Lord Oxford was as real as his pleasure at the success of his new allies, and therefore it was not inconsistent to prefer to cheer the sad journey of the one to uniting in the triumph of the other. It is not unusual to find bitterness and charity in the same heart. Generous people are not infrequently vindictive—especially through offended pride. Swift was brutal in his satirical persecution of Tighe, Bettesworth and others who were so unfortunate as to cross his path; yet, on this account, we should not, in the least, question the genuine kindness which led him to write stories to increase the half-pay of a worthy old Captain, give the copyright of a popular ballad to a deserving widow, yield so cordially his first benefice to a poor clergyman, loan money steadily to the indigent, and found, by will, a lunatic asylum in Dublin, which yet bears witness to his philanthropy. In fact, to nomenclature character as we do plants and minerals, is absurd, and especially in a case like Swift, who exhibited unusual contradictions. He who uttered a withering sarcasm with the cruelty of an inquisitor, used to pray with meek devotion; the misanthrope who read his coming fate in the withered top of a lofty elm, went through the elaborate joke of waiting on his own servants at supper; and the greatest of libellers was made unhappy, for days, by a cold look from Temple. He was disgraced at college for frolics which he long afterwards declared, instead of originating in exuberant youthful spirits, were entered into purely from the recklessness of thwarted desires. In his dogmatism and morbid irritability Swift resembled Dr. Johnson; in his rough kindness, Abernethy. His economy appears to have originated in a keen sense of early privation and a somewhat uncommon appreciation for a man of letters,—of pecuniary responsibility. His melancholy and fits of temper grew out of disease and baffled hopes. Patronage galled his proud and sensitive nature, and yet it was his life-long doom,—first from relatives, then from government. The prejudice excited in Queen Anne's mind by the Archbishop of York on account of the alleged infidelity in the "Tale of a Tub," is supposed to be the reason of the "long delays" he endured, and the final inadequate appointment of Dean of St. Patrick—a title which, however undesirable in his own estimation, soon became famous enough to satisfy ordinary ambition. This "honorable exile," as he calls it, was attended by an unprecedented local consideration after Swift proved himself a successful champion of Ireland; and the oblation of her people, at his death, after three years of insanity had separated him from the associations of life, has never been surpassed for regretful sentiment and zealous honors.

Swift's most celebrated papers are of an allegorical kind, and though interspersed with judicious remarks and clever hits, to a reader whose taste has been formed on later models, cannot fail to be tedious. Thus "The Tale of a Tub" is an elaborate satire upon popery, ingenious and often correct, yet quite unintelligible without the notes, and spun out to a wearisome degree; the same may be said of the "Battle of the Books" and the "Essay on Polite Conversation." The Dialogues of the latter are an exaggerated take-off of the strained wit that prevailed in the author's day, and parts of them are quite as amusing as a good comedy. We have many specimens of this allegorical and indirect way of enforcing a truth, or illustrating a moral, to which Swift resorted, such as Telemachus, Rasselas and Sartor Resartus, which unite invention with far more earnestness and beauty. Indeed the vulgarity of Swift is sometimes unendurable. He seems to delight in low metaphors and gross allusions. His coarseness is gratuitous and his smut deliberate. He repudiates Pope's axiom, that "want of decency is want of sense," for the two are constantly mingled in his writings. Irony and paradox he develops with a prolonged relish. A very characteristic instance of both is afforded in his defence of madness, founded on the idea that—"he that can with Epicurus, content his ideas with the films and images that fly upon his senses from the superficialities of things; such a man, truly wise, creams off nature, leaving the sour and the dregs for philosophy and reason to lap up. This is the sublime and refined point of felicity, called the possession of being well-deceived; the serene, peaceful state of being a fool among knaves." The acuteness exhibited in this chapter is affecting when we remember that the mind that dallied so boldly with this most awful visitation to which humanity is subject, was destined to become its prey. The metaphors of Swift remind us occasionally of Crabbe. They are of the humblest kind; yet often significant, for instance, "Wisdom is a hen, whose cackling we must value and consider, because it is attended with an egg; but then, lastly, it is a nut, which, unless you choose with judgment, may cost you a tooth, and pay you with nothing but a worm."

Satire has its office in literature and in the affairs of the world, but it is one so liable to abuse and so infrequently in alliance with perfect justice, that its exercise is seldom desirable. Where appeals to the reason and feelings prove insufficient, ridicule is sometimes the only available means left. No one doubts that the keen edge of criticism has lopped away excrescences and caused the sap in the tree of knowledge to evolve in fruits and blossoms. Goldoni's comedies visibly reformed Venetian practices. Again and again, in France the social tone has been modified by polished satirical attacks. In England, the first essayists gracefully laughed away many indigenous follies and the brilliant reviewers of a later day have shamed into deserved obscurity the pretensions of lettered mediocrity. In poetry, in fashion, in art, and even in personal character, we see the most wonderful improvements brought about by a discriminating use of this weapon. It is a reformer that penetrates where gentler ministrants find no admittance; and even in social intercourse its delicate and kindly introduction has a wholesome effect—restraining presumption, exciting the apathetic, and giving point and spirit to conversation. Let this be conceded to satire divorced from malignity; but in the hands of the selfish or arbitrary, there is no more dangerous facility or remorseful gift. Not for a moment can we hesitate in choosing between the gentleness which is power and the power whose only attribute is cruelty. Hazlitt has admirably defined wit as the "eloquence of indifference." There is a certain want of heart in those who possess it as a prevailing trait. It is not surprising that Swift endorsed the maxims of Rochefoucault. The process by which the satirist vanquishes even error, is an indurating one. He must often, as a preparatory step, hush the pleadings of humanity. He wounds it may be to cure, but how seldom is it done "more in sorrow than in anger;" and how constantly does it breed animosity! We cannot lose sight of the great fact that writing is a deliberate act. The cutting word spoken in an ebullition of temper and the fatal blow struck on the instant of provocation, are far more defensible than the carefully penned lampoon or the stab of the assassin's dagger. We envy not the midnight reveries of the man whose pen is habitually employed as an instrument of intellectual revenge; and the meanest threat we ever imagined, was that of an unprincipled man of genius in his quarrel with an honest farmer,—that he would "write him down." The dark side of Swift's career, as a writer, is its malign aspect. We speak not of the keenness of his onsets in honest controversy, when he manfully battled for his party, for the church of England, or for suffering Ireland; sarcasms may be heaped upon theories, acts of public assemblies and projects of government, without involving the peace of any human being; but the personal satire of Swift is often not only merciless, but wholly unjustifiable. His persecution of Steele who had once been his friend, is an instance. The truth is, there are points of honor taken for granted by chivalric natures in all conflicts,—and one is that it is unfair to attack an open enemy with a weapon he cannot sway, and of which his antagonist is master. Swift repeatedly made satirical war upon men utterly incapable of any retaliation except that of the duello, from which the Dean's sacred office protected him.

His hardihood, in this respect, is evinced by his cherished resentments. He detested Trinity College all his life, because it was the scene of his youthful punishment; he continued to hate those of his kindred who had displeased him as a boy; and he never forgave Queen Caroline for not sending the medals she had promised him while princess. He could use facts, the knowledge of which he gained in friendship, to the injury of his adversary after a change of feeling occurred. It is no wonder that one of his victims attempted to cut off his ears. In the intensity of his scorn he reminds the American reader of John Randolph. Literature he seemed to regard as an arena rather than a resource. It was his vantage-ground, whereon he made himself amends for the churlishness of fortune. It was to him an armory, not a bower; he sought its thorns to head arrows of revenge, not its roses to weave garlands for the banquet; its asperities rather than its amenities were his delight. In a word, Swift carried the passions which men of action develop in deeds into his intellectual life. Tasso used his pen to celebrate a holy crusade or the charms of his love, and met his enemies like a brave gentleman with his sword; Swift too often desecrated the sacred office of the one to the butchery of the other.

Even when thwarted by the indifference or incapacity of woman, his annoyance vented itself in satire. It is curious that while few intellectual men ever took more pains to develop the sex, no one more affected to despise them. He takes infinite pains to repel the idea of love as a weakness, extols the lasting happiness of genuine friendship, and describes his intercourse with the youngest of his victims as merely paternal.

His conduct might have made him styled
A father and the nymph his child,
Such innocent delight he took
To see the virgin mind—her book.

One would suppose, however, from the annexed passage, that he would have grown somewhat weary of this charming study.

In a dull stream which moving slow,
You hardly see the current flow;
If a small breeze obstruct the course,
It whirls about for want of force,
And in its narrow circle gathers
Nothing but chaff, and straw, and feathers.
The current of a female mind
Stops thus and turns with every wind;
Thus whirling round together draws
Fools, fops and rakes for chaff and straws.
Hence we conclude no woman's parts
Are won by virtue, wit and parts
Nor are the men of sense to blame
For breasts incapable of flame,

There is something very beautiful in the relation of intellectual men to gifted women—a process of mutual development—the history of which, in many instances, it is delightful to trace; but the order of nature seems to have been reversed in the case before us. The desire to be loved existed chiefly on the part of those to whom he seems to have given his society, while his expressed feelings towards them were objective and independent. It is true in allusion to the death of Stella, he speaks of her as "that person for whose sake only life was worth preserving;" and yet he never recognized, while enjoying the amplest opportunity, the sympathies he constantly evoked. It is true that Vanessa ingenuously avows how much her nature is indebted for its growth and expansion to his influence, but he never inspired her with that confidence which alone renders the affections a source of true happiness.

Still listening to his tuneful tongue
The truths which angels might have sung,
Divine impress their gentle way,
And sweetly stole my soul away,
My guide, instructor, lover, friend,
Dear names, in one idea blend.

Perhaps a latent conviction of the unenviable reputation of a satirist induced him to disavow malevolence, and defend the kind of writing to which he was addicted. "There is very little satire," he says, "which has not something in it untouched before, but the materials of panegyric, being very few in number, have long since been exhausted." Originality, indeed, appears to have been a cardinal point with Swift; and to this quality almost exclusively he owes the continuance of his fame. He boasts that he was never known to steal a hint. The party questions he discussed are comparatively without interest; as an essayist he has been superseded by more graceful and versatile pens; as a rhymster, the higher level of taste condemns him to neglect; but as the author of Gulliver's Travels his renown is firmly based. Though intended as a local satire, the novelty of the conception and the verisimilitude of the execution mark this work as one of true genius, whose standard value is only diminished by the occasional blemishes of a low and perverted taste. It exhibits the same circumstantial felicity in description which Caleb Williams does in events. Besides this capo d' opera of satirical writing, Swift vindicated himself more explicitly elsewhere; facts, however, do not warrant the complacency of his statement.

He spared a bump or crooked nose
Whose owners set not up for beaux,
True genuine dulness moved his pity
Unless it offered to be witty.
Those who their ignorance confessed
He ne'er offended with a jest,
But laughed to hear an idiot quote
A verse from Horace learned by rote.

It is conceded that the most satisfactory part of Swift's life, at least in his own estimation, were his busy years in London, of which, spent in the service of party leaders of this epoch, we have a full account in the "Journal to Stella"—a record which confirms our preconceived notion of his character. It shows his devotion to the actual by its brief chronicle of the events of each day with few comments or fancies to enliven the summary; his egotism by the importance he attaches to the least thing that concerns himself; his want of refinement by the coarseness of the epithets; his arbitrary tendency by its tone, and his deficient ideality by the absence of beautiful sentiment or graceful expression. His relation to Stella is only to be inferred from the familiarity and confidence of its revelations; it implies intimacy rather than tenderness. To know how a man passes his time is, however, no slight assistance to the interpretation of his life and genius. According to this journal, Swift was in a constant whirl of political and social excitement and a rainy or an ill day he, therefore, found quite "apathetic." He dined with ministers, envoys, lords and duchesses,—visited Congreve in his blindness, called for his letters at Steele's office, chatted with Rowe and Prior at one coffee-house and joined Harley in anathematizing the opposition at another, supped often with Addison, wrote an occasional paper for the Tatler and daily jotted down for Stella's enlightenment the state of his health and the weather, the names of new acquaintances and the conduct of old, the dishes he had eaten, the geography of his lodgings, the nick-nacks he had purchased to bring to Ireland and the stage of his progress in a political despatch, in the advocacy of a petition, or the composition of a lampoon. He expresses violent anger towards all whose treatment dissatisfies him and frankly talks of going to bed "rolling resentments in his mind." This diary exhibits the greatest activity of mind and consciousness of ability and an extraordinary mixture of a satirical, inquiring, ambitious and convivial temper, with so little of the enthusiasm of the poet, the tenderness of the lover or the spirituality of the divine, that we can seldom realize that its author ever had any legitimate claim to either title.

Dryden's prediction that Swift would never be a poet seems to us to have been verified; and this opinion we infer not only from his versified but his prose compositions. His facility in the use of language, his "knack of rhyming," and the various odes and other metrical pieces which are found in his collected works, do not invalidate our position. The term poet has now more than a technical meaning. It is used to designate a certain species of character and tone of mind, and is often applied to those who have not written verse and, perhaps, never written at all. A deep sense of the beautiful and intimate relations with the human, the natural and the divine, arising from earnestness of feeling and spirituality of perception, are qualities now regarded as essential to the office of poet. In these Swift was singularly deficient. All that gave point to, or yet redeem his verses are their cleverness of diction and their wit. No poet could habitually write such prose. It is utterly destitute of glow; there are no kindling expressions; the flow of words never accidentally becomes rhythmical from the loftiness of the sentiment, as in Burke, or its pathetic sweetness, as in Dickens. And yet, of its kind, Swift's style is unsurpassed. For perspicuity, directness and freedom from involution or bombast, it is a model. It is exactly such a style as is desirable for the man of affairs, whose object is to address the common sense of mankind, and to be equally understood by the cultivated and the vulgar. Without ornament, and just raised above the colloquial by the arrangement of words, only the worth or the salient points of the thought lend it the least attraction. To this very absence of elegance and fervor in style, may be ascribed Swift's popularity. Queen Anne's reign has been called the age of the wits. Prior circumstances rendered that period the reverse of an earnest one. Sentiment was at a discount and sense at a premium. Social follies prevailed; party feeling ran high. Fanaticism and debauchery had each been carried to extremes; and the reaction caused strength of mind and clearness of thought to be admired. Hence Swift, with his vigor of statement, his universally intelligible language, and, especially, his caustic irony and stinging repartee, was the very writer to effect a public, weary of lackadaisical versewrights and croaking bigots, and alike distrustful of enervating taste and morbid enthusiasm.

Unfortunately Swift was not content with intellectual empire. He sought and keenly enjoyed a sway over hearts; and to this desire, unnaturally aggravated by causes already suggested, we ascribe his conduct toward Stella and Vanessa. There is not a trace of genuine amatory feeling in his poems. Compare his love-verses with those of Petrarch, Barry Cornwall, Mrs. Norton, or any other sincere votary of the tender passion, and this fact will be apparent. Every circumstance related of his intercourse with the unhappy women whose affections he won, his own allusions to them in verse and prose, and their actions and expressions with reference to him indicate that the love of power and not the delights of mutual love actuated him. He sought to wind himself, as it were, into their souls, to become a moral necessity, to call out all the recognition of which they were capable, to be the motive and the arbiter of their inward life, and the consciousness of having attained this appears to have satisfied him, while they, more soulful and human, pined, in vain, for the endearments, the entire confidence and the realized sympathies of love. It is said that Richter sought intimate association with interesting women for the express purpose of discovering materials for romantic art. Swift did the same apparently for the mere gratification of self-love. As far as he was capable of passion it was intellectual, spent itself in words, and a kind of philosophical dalliance with sentiment but torturing to its objects. Doubtless he liked the companionship of both Stella and Vanessa, and from his own peculiar nature could but feebly understand the agonizing uncertainties and wearisome suspense to which his equivocal behaviour subjected them; but these considerations are quite insufficient to excuse the positive inhumanity of his course. That his view of love was rather metaphysical than natural—a thing more of the will than the heart, and inspired by reflection instead of sentiment, is manifest not only by his conduct but in his writings. Thus in his apostrophe to love he says—

In all I wish, how happy I should be Thou grand Deluder, were it not for thee!

So weak thou art that fools my power despise,
And yet so strong thou triumph'st o'er the wise!
Thy nets are laid with such peculiar art
They catch the cautious, let the rash depart;
Most nets are filled for want of thought and care,
But too much thinking brings us to thy snare.

How, by his wit and wisdom, he built up a mental supremacy and thus attached to himself these fresh and devoted hearts, is evident in the case of Stella by the fact that he was the preceptor of her childhood, and the exclusive counsellor of her mature years; while Vanessa says of him—

When men began to call me fair
You interposed your timely care:
You early taught me to despise
The ogling of a coxcomb's eyes,
Showed where my judgment was misplaced,
Refined my fancy and my taste.

It will not do to gloss over the inevitable consequences of obligations like these, voluntarily conferred upon a susceptible and candid girl. He must have instinctively anticipated her confession.

Your lessons found the weakest part,
Aimed at the head, and reached the heart.

It is true, in the celebrated verses descriptive of this unhappy love, he says, that at the discovery, he — felt within him rise

Shame, disappointment, grief, surprise.

Yet, with heartless egotism, he goes on, year after year, fostering a hopeless attachment, concealing from one his relation with the other, until forced into a nominal marriage with Stella, and the bitter truth flashed upon the wretched Vanessa, whom he leaves to wrestle alone with her misery until death gives her a welcome release! The most exacting sentiment which ever inspired a man, could require no more complete self-dedication than these fair beings gave the object of their love. Stella existed only for him; and an humble neighbor of Vanessa describes her as passing all her time in walking in the garden, reading and writing, and never seeming happy except during the visits of Swift. Byron in one of his letters says, with an evident and characteristic appreciation of this waste of feeling: "Swift, when neither young, nor handsome, nor rich, nor even amiable, inspired the two most extraordinary passions upon record, Vanessa's and Stella's."

Vanessa, aged scarce a score,
Sighs for a gown of forty-four.

He requited them bitterly; for he seems to have broken the heart of the one and worn out that of the other; and he had his reward, for he died a solitary idiot in the hands of servants."

The source both of Swift's errors and triumphs was a love of power. We are convinced that this is the key to the puzzle which, at first, seems to baffle inquiry in regard to his anomalous conduct. There is always a vindictory principle at work in life and nature. Where any element is thwarted in one direction it will assert itself elsewhere; the root which meets a rock gnaws itself upward in fibrous convolutions; the stream, impeded in its onward flow, either gushes into a fountain or expands into a lake; the disappointed bard transforms himself into a ferocious critic, and the unsuccessful belle turns devotee. Now, the traits of humanity were incomplete in Swift. He possessed acuteness and vigor of intellect, strong will, remarkable wit and faculty of application, but he seems to have been destitute of passion. It was rarely, therefore, that a genial, homogeneous excitement warmed and fused his nature. Its capabilities acted separately. He wanted the susceptibility and the gentleness that come from an organization alive to harmonious sensations. His body and his soul did not thrill with the same conscious existence. Life was consequently objective to a great degree, and he sought to conquer its visible obstacles rather than enrich and attune its elements within. He lived in a sense of intellectual action inadequately combined with sentient enjoyment. What nature denied him he sought through mental expedients; and his relish of existence seems to have consisted in operating upon others—a process comparatively indifferent to those who are vividly sensible of enjoyable resources. This exclusive love of power is often the heritage of disappointment,—the alternative for sympathy—the chief resort of those cut off by asceticism, disease, or circumstances from any source of natural pleasure. We see it in women unfavorably constituted or ungenially married, in the deformed and in the gifted but low-born. They seem to desire to realize every thing through will. Their great demand from others is subserviency, and they manifest the greatest impatience at the least nonconformity with their caprices. Indeed coalition with them in thought and action is the only test of friendship or love, for the obvious reason that they are incapable of fully experiencing the delights of those sentiments which, to such as are more naturally constituted or situated, are their own exceeding reward. That Swift belonged to this order of character, is evident from every page of his biography and not a few of his writings. He was never satisfied in his political relations until he gained a personal influence with his distinguished allies. He desired to be necessary to them as a companion as well as useful to their cause as a writer. He managed his financial interests with precision and economy from a very clear sense of the value of money as an agent of power. He sent forth his tracts, epigrams and satirical tales anonymously, not heeding reputation, but enjoying keenly the secret pleasure of impressing himself on other minds and leading public opinion by his will. He had a fondness for patronage on the same principle, and boasted that thirty men of note owed their advancement to his personal influence; among whom were Parnell, Berkeley, Congreve, Rowe and Steele. The same disposition is apparent in his training of servants, in his dictation in regard to the household arrangements of families he visited, in the oracular terms in which he pronounced upon literature and character, in the overbearing conditions he proposed with his first offer of marriage, in the ceaseless exactions of his social life, and in the authoritative tone of his conversation and writings. To be admired, loved or feared, he demanded from all but dolts; and he did this without any consideration as to his ability to reciprocate the more sacred feeling. Those whom he failed to bully, or lure into one of these sentiments were thoroughly obnoxious to him. In all this we see the arrogance of a passionless intellectuality, the unhesitating claim of pride, the domination of a will unchecked and unsoftened by any of those noble emotions or lapses of tender feeling and earnest desire, that cause a glad surrender of opinion to truth, of individuality to assimilation, of self to a thought or being more dear, yielding a joy never realized by the love of power, even when its most detested foes or sweetest victims are completely in its remorseless grasp!

CASTLE BY THE SEA.

From the German of Uhland.

I.

Haast seen that castle olden,
That castle by the sea?
The purple clouds and golden,
Above it wander free.

II.

It sinks in gladness bending,
Into the flood below,
It soars in joy ascending,
Into the sunset glow.

III.

"Oft on the shore reclining,
Have I that castle seen,

The moon above it shining
The misty wreaths between."

IV.

Did winds and waters softly,
Their murmurs gay prolong,
And from the hall so lofty,
Heard'st thou the festal song?

V.

"The winds and waves were lying
As if in peaceful sleep,
And from the hall came sighing
A song that made me weep."

VI.

Saw'st thou in splendor glowing,
Walk there the king and queen,
With crimson mantles flowing,
And crowns of lustrous sheen?

VII.

Led they not forth with pleasure,
A youthful daughter fair,
Following with stately measure,
Beaming with golden hair?

VIII.

"Nay, I saw those parents weeping,
Their golden crowns forgot,
Sable robes around them sweeping,—
The maiden saw I not."

THE CRIME OF ANDREW BLAIR.

BY P. P. COOKE.

CHAPTER VII.

Two weeks passed away, and the day appointed for the marriage of Tom Herries and Miss Blair came. It found the bride-groom in wretched condition. A violent fever had seized upon him soon after the dreadful fall; it had abated, leaving him very feeble and not out of danger. So the rising sun of the wedding-day brought no peace or joy to John Herries. He had labored with a stern energy to have the marriage accomplished without delay. He would have given Minny a dying husband; but his son would not permit this extreme measure. Tom retained something of the singular purpose which had urged him into the Deep Cut. On the morning of the wedding-day he mused to the following effect:

"If I die now it will be all the better. If this life is worth any thing, it is only so when we can be happy in it. We like to live because we like to enjoy ourselves; if we find it impossible to enjoy ourselves at any time, ever in the future, the best motive for living is gone. Men often come in this way to be disgusted with life, and yet are afraid of death. It scares them back; it does not scare me. But all this is only one selfish view of the case; I am to front death because I cannot be a happy man. There is the other and greatest reason why I should die; Miss Minny will be very much relieved by my death. Fever burn on."

And supplied with the fuel of such despairing reflections the fever did burn up anew. Tom Herries became delirious then, and raved for several days and nights. On one of these terrible days, the elder Herries and his wife were in a distant apartment, to which only the shrillest of the wild cries penetrated.

"We are ruined—lost—overwhelmed—I am one of the damned," groaned the black-brewed father.

"It is a grievous trial to lose this my only son; but, husband, your despair is a more dreadful blow to me than the death of my first-born child."

"Wife, these cold-blooded Blairs have crushed us. That girl led the boy to his death. May the curse of Almighty God!"—

A low tap at the door arrested the blind malediction of the thwarted and despairing man. The door opened, and Minny Blair entered. At the same time also entered one of those doleful cries of delirium which wandered about the passages, and galleries, and recoiling from the closed doors, rose to the ceilings and even to the hollows of the great roof above.

Herries shuddered; the cry went to his heart like a dagger. In the face of his wife was that dry anguish which craves tears, and sometimes becomes madness for want of them. Minny Blair was calm, resolute, but very pale.

Herries advanced to meet her, saying with an impetuous manner:

"You are here! You are as cold as a pillar of salt. Are these howls, which are two-edged swords to us, nothing to you? Come." He took the girl by the hand with a rude force and led her from the room, along the gloomy passages straight to the chamber of his delirious son.

"Death is nothing," Tom Herries repeated as they came into his chamber. His mind had wandered back to the moments passed in that restrained gallop up to the verge of the Deep Cut, and words then spoken were now on his lips, broken, wanting in continuity, but full of meaning to the pale girl who stood above him.

"Death is nothing," repeated Tom. "Don't take the leap; we may get over. The white queen with a yellow crown round her head com-descends to ride with me. Her hair is like long willows. Lord! how it streams in my face. It blinds me. Death is nothing. Whip—spur—here we thunder. Screech, Major." And Tom Herries yelled. The wild Jager, who is said to traverse the German forests by night, might utter such a yell, in the closing rush of his moonlit chase.

An old servant, looking like some old noble physician of Carthage or Utica, so striking was the fine antique dignity of his face, held poor Tom upon his bed. Dr. Gaunt slept in a chair in a corner of the chamber; the cries of his patient did not rouse him.

"How deep her eyes are!"—the speech of Tom Herries went wandering on. "They are like two blue wells, with a little star glimmering in the bottom of one of them and a horned moon in the other. Take away your eyes—they are distressing because they are so sad. And so you will ride with me, beautiful lady? Flight rushes like an eagle. An eagle has a singular scream; don't you think so? I saw one, a short time ago, come down from the mountains on his way to the sea. As the wind struck him he yelled. I must let you hear how he yelled." Again Tom uttered a cry, as shrill and defiant as the osprey's.

A mind all a-glow with the wild fires of fever is often raised to be of kindred with that of the rapt poet; the "vision" seems to be as palpable, and "the faculty divine" as vigorous: only as a fatal drawback, the vision of delirium goes flitting, shifting, now some bright face, presently a fanged mouth, alternately something angelic and something demoniac; and the faculty divine of delirium, instead of persevering into fair creations, mars its work into the same incongruities of the vision—for instance, when it would finish a delicate hand to its idea of an angel, or beautiful woman, it is taken captive by a fantasy, and makes the arm stream off like a horse-tail, or end with a serpent's open mouth. Tom Herries was a-glow in this way; and his stimulated wits were busy upon such wild work. He had not been sufficiently trained in speech, or fed with the thoughts of others, to talk the delirious eloquence of a mad scholar, but his speech was yet in its way brilliant, and ran into metaphor and simile; the fever-blaze had even brought out upon the tablets of his memory, as heat brings out characters traced in sympathetic ink, certain odds and ends of old verse. Tom certainly, in his ordinary condition of wholesome dulness, could never have recalled them.

I cannot venture to tax the reader with the whole of the wandering talk of this cheerless scene. I must hurry to the end of it. After much of a like kind, Tom said—still recurring to the desperate ride:

"We got upon fast horses. The sun was shining and the ground was all in a white blaze and singing like silver under the clack of the horse-shoes. Lord! what a gait we went at!

'He mounted himself on a coal-black steed,
And her on a freckled grey—
With a bugalet horn hung at his side—
And roundly they rode away.'

"So—so. She rides like a queen of the Tartars when she hears her king's horn. She is strait as a poplar. How her curls fly! I thought one of them was a yellow snake, and snapped at me as the wind whipped it out. But it was not so. The beautiful lady has a delicious mouth with scarlet lips, and eyes cut out of blue jewels. Father, give me some wine. There is a little stream coming down a hill—what a fresh, cool stream!—bring me near it, and put my mouth to it. How careless! You have let me fall to a great depth just as I meant to drink. The fall stuns me, and I cannot look up. Ah, now I can. Reach out a hand, Miss Minny; Lord! what an arm she puts out—long, and white as the wood of a peeled maple. But it lifts me—up—up—up—to life again. You draw me up—you make me live—your merciful eyes give me unspeakable happiness."

The last sentence was spoken calmly; the eyes of the speaker were directed full to the face of Miss Blair; the deeply-moved girl answered it as though it had been the utterance of a sane man.

"Would that I could draw you up—would that I could make you live."

"What price would you pay for his safety?" the elder Herries asked with a manner of harsh scrutiny.

"My life, if necessary. You have misjudged me, sir. I am not cold and indifferent to the condition of your son."

Miss Blair passed to the chair of Dr. Gaunt, and shook him with so much force that he presently looked up with a pair of very red eyes, and said—"bless me, I must have fallen into a doze."

"Doctor—are you quite awake? Is there no means of curing this terrible delirium?"

"The delirium will go off," replied Dr. Gaunt, rubbing his eyes with the corners of his handkerchief;—"but how it will leave him is another question." Then the old gentleman blew his nose explosively; and having done so, proceeded to charge it again with an immense grasp of snuff—not a pinch.

"Now that you are quite awake, promise me this, Doctor; stay faithfully here, and when the delirium is about to subside send a fast rider for me. Whatever the hour may be, night or day, through any weather I will come at once. I have a remedy which I wish to try as soon as your patient can receive it."

So saying Miss Blair came again to the bed—removed the elf-locks from the forehead of poor Tom Herries—looked sadly upon his face whilst her lips moved with unuttered words—and then, turning, left the room. John Herries followed; as she sped along a passage he called to her; looking back she saw him come up slowly and with a meditative countenance. He presently said:

"I have entertained hard, and now I am sure, unjust thoughts of you. Pardon my rudeness—forgive my evil thoughts."

"I do so, Mr. Herries, without reservation."

"We are overwhelmed by this domestic affliction."

"Let us hope, sir."

John Herries fixed a forgiving and even a tender regard upon Minny Blair; the community of feeling avowed in her brief 'let us hope sir,' swept his mind clear of all lingering doubts, and of much of its fear. This gentle and generous girl, partaking his griefs, was not an enemy to darken his future, when the power to do so should pass, by the death of her uncle, into her hands; moreover, a finer chord than this selfish one was touched.

"I confide in you," he said, "for I begin now to know your noble nature. We turn over a bright leaf, Miss Blair, when we discover a true and self-sacrificing friend—and all the brighter when we find the friendship where we looked for a scornful want of sympathy. God bless you."

Minny Blair's eyes became suffused with tears. The gentleness of a stern man is always effective.

Minny sat by her uncle's side, at Lindores, one stormy morning a few days after the visit, some scenes of which I have just given to the reader. The old man quietly enjoyed her presence and discourse. He did not perceive a frequent lapse, from the topic which seemed to engage her, into momentary silence, and thoughts of other things; for the devoted girl would quickly fly back from these broodings, and re-enter with hurried animation upon her suspended task of amusing. Breaking in upon her feverish discourse, came a summons; Dr. Gaunt had despatched the fast rider to say that Tom Herries had recovered his reason. Minny, faithful to her promise, encountered a severe storm, and was soon at the bed-side of her lover. Tom, whose face had become very much like a hatchet, held her hand placidly and welcomed her with intelligence, but without excitement. His cheeks were of an ashy white; his eyes were all the more prominent for the falling away in the adjacent parts, but they were redeemed by a soft and gentle expression; his chin and upper lip had sprouted a neglected beard, crisp, short, and of an auburn colour. This Ænobarbus with the hatchet face was certainly not very winning in his looks, but the eye of pity and generous appreciation which beamed upon him seemed to take no note of his extraordinary want of comeliness.

"You perceive," said Tom lowly, "that I am nearly gone. Have a little patience; I will be out of your way before long."

Minny stooped until her breath stole like a faint south wind over the stubble of Tom's chin, and replied—

"I perceive no such thing. You are strong and will live now. Do you know that you must live for me?"

"Live for you?"

"Certainly. We are to be married—are we not?"

Tom sighed, and looked up sadly and wistfully.

"Why do you sigh?"

"I must not have a wife so much above me. Of course you must always despise me; and be incessantly wretched yourself."

"You are generous, and devoted," the beautiful girl said in low tones, and with a tremor in them which is always of gentle omen. "But you want a just and manly self-appreciation. I think so nobly of you that, upon my word, I am unwilling to forego"—here Minny checked herself with a smile. She presently said—"will you keep my hand, which you hold now, if I give it to you willingly?"

Tom seemed very much surprised.

"I perceive," said Minny, "that you are incorrigible with your humble and delicate fancies; you are a singular lover. But if you are resolved not to speak, I must be so unfeminine as to do so. Mr. Herries, will you remain faithful to your engagement, and permit me to be your wife?"

The truth dawned upon Tom Herries. After a long silence, during which his countenance betrayed many varying emotions, he said:

"You are not a human creature—but one of God's beautiful angels."

"Thank you. You are very much mistaken however; you must perceive that my hand, which you have nearly broken, is substantial. You must also perceive that I have no wings." To prove this last assertion the tall and lithe girl turned her person until the graceful sweep of her shoulders became visible to Tom Herries. There were no celestial pinions; but only such shoulders as the quiver of Diana the huntress doubtless rested upon.

Her modest lover, retaining her hand, answered the speech and the pretty gesture which accompanied it :

"Your hand is substantial and warm, and you have no wings, but you are at least as good and beautiful as if you were an angel. Miss Minny—Miss Minny—do not conceal anything from me. Speak truly, from the bottom of your heart. You are perhaps pretending that you love me, in order to save my good-for-nothing life."

"I said just now, Mr. Herries, that you were incorrigible. How often do you mean to compel me to tell you that I love you? Recollect that you have not once said that you loved me. Do you wish me to explain why it is that I am willing to become your wife? Well, fellowship in high sentiment produces love; and did we not, Mr. Herries, you and I, unite ourselves in gallant fellowship, when we galloped down to that frightful gulf? I felt it possible to become your wife in that swift moment; it was because I did so that I flew back to the hope of life, and used my best means—then when the speed of our horses, on the very verge as we were, could not be restrained—to preserve it. You heard me, in that last moment, call to you to be wary."

"Speak on; your voice is so musical. What a brave heart you must have! Speak on."

"I have positively very little to say, Mr. Herries. It is not often that we find inviolable truth, generosity, extreme devotion of self for the ease of others, courage, tenderness, united in one human being. I think that I have found them in you. Whatever drawbacks you may possess with them, you will, doubtless, cure in time. Your worst faults have sprung from a want of self-respect; there can be little dignity of character where a modest but manly self-respect is wanting. Is not this a strange, grave mode of speaking to you? I repeat that I love you—if you take any pleasure in the avowal. You still hold my hand; it shall be yours forever, when you are well enough to receive it."

"Well enough to receive it? That I will be without much delay," said Tom Herries. "I have entirely given up the idea of dying. God bless you—good—beautiful—generous—lady! Do not go yet. Leave your hand in mine. So you are to be my wife? This hand—how soft, and white, and warm it is!—is to be mine forever?"

Tom drew the hand to his lips. Almost at the same moment he caught a glimpse of himself in a glass across the room. He heaved an immense sigh, and muttered—

"There never was any one so miserably ugly as I am."

Minnie Blair laughed, and said :

"You are certainly not very handsome; but sick people are not generally handsome. You must be well very soon, and then you will be better looking."

—Adding quickly, "I seal our contract," she stooped and kissed his cheek.

When Dr. Gaunt came back to the chamber from which Miss Blair had for an hour banished him, he found his patient in so hopeful a state that he began to entertain sanguine expectations of the fulfilment of Major Wright's promise. This promise, the reader will recollect, was to celebrate the recovery of Tom Herries with a dinner to the "picked gentlemen" of the country; at which dinner the hospitable Major was under an obligation to toast Tom as "a fine, dare-devil, dashing fellow."

"We will get on now, I think," said Dr. Gaunt. "If there is no change for the worse by to-morrow, Wright must have notice."

And Tom Herries shook disease off. Azrael has little to do with bold, hopeful hearts. Minnie Blair had poured oil into his flickering and failing lamp; it began, with the moment in which she did so, to burn up anew, and soon regained a clear and strong lustre.

CHAPTER VIII.

When I began this history it was with the purpose of developing the progress of a nature in some respects well-gifted, from a single crime to which unrestrained passions in an evil hour propelled it, to remorse and eventual ruin. I found myself very early beguiled into a love-story, and thrown quite out from my original design. I must now leave the more pleasant theme, which should have been subordinate, to give in a final scene some necessary explanations, and an appearance of connection between the beginning and ending of my work. In hastening on to this final scene, I pass over the details of a great event—the marriage of Tom Herries with the beautiful Minnie Blair; a lady whose worth, inasmuch as it was infinite—I trust the reader has long ago discovered this—could receive no increase from the splendid dowry which the love of Andrew Blair bestowed with her. It was a brave wedding; and its results have been fortunate. An unequal match can scarcely remain unequal very long, except where mutual dislike exists as a repellent, and prevents assimilation. The coarse and common must yield to the high and refined, or the converse must happen. There must be a lifting up or a pulling down. In the case before us the better result has followed. It will be remembered that the follies which Tom Herries committed in an early part of this history were after-dinner follies; he has since become somewhat marked for a gentlemanly moderation in his cups. His intelligence is not remarkable; but his manners are sufficiently subdued, leaving a fresh, entertaining and natural gayety without coarseness; indeed I find this excellent gentleman a very agreeable companion, in the long evenings which I occasionally spend with him. When we recollect, moreover, how honorable, courageous and devoted he certainly is, we can scarcely pity his magnificent wife for the union, or deem her aristocratic hand and true heart, more than his due. Now let us pass on to a conclusion.

It was a summer evening, six months after the wedding. Death was descending upon the old and weary master of Lindores. His intellect enfeebled but not clouded measured the pace of its approach.

The windows of the chamber, in which he lay dying, were raised; their curtains, hanging before them, shut out a flood of moonlight, but let in the warm breath of an August breeze. The trees, whose long boughs rustled against the walls and eaves of the house, were alive with the sharp cries of katydid and numberless other little musicians of the summer night. Now and then a bat flitted in, as a curtain streamed with the entering breeze, and circled about the ceiling until a succeeding swell of the wind reopened a way for egress. Continually several large beetles droned in their harsh flight, beating the white walls with horry wings. Lights were burning dimly in the chamber.

At the bed-side stood Minny Blair, now Mrs. Herries, and a tall gentleman in the black dress of a clergyman. As we join this group Andrew Blair begins to speak decisively.

"Minny, the time has come for acquainting you with the dreadful secret of my life," he said with a transient energy.

"Any extraordinary communication will move you, sir, and may injure you."

"Go to the walnut cabinet; press the carving at the extreme corner next the window; you will find a drawer—it fastens with a spring. You will see a single paper—bring it to me."

His niece followed these directions—discovered and opened the secret drawer of the cabinet, and presently came back with the paper. It was folded like a law-paper, and labelled simply, "The statement of A. B."

"Bring the lights nearer; and you, Mr. Gibson, read aloud what I have there written. Minny remain and hear."

Presently Mr. Gibson, the clergyman, putting on his spectacles and arranging the lights, opened the paper and read aloud.

"I ask pardon of Almighty God for a grievous crime which I, Andrew Blair, have committed. I fear to make appeal for forgiveness to the less merciful tribunal of man; for my crime man and his laws will not pardon.' I make this confession to be read by my representatives when death shall have removed me from fears of earthly justice. Why do I make it? I know not; except that my secret struggles incessantly to escape, and I imagine that some peace may be gained by providing even for its eventual release. A secret of blood ravages the heart that would utterly confine it.

"On the 20th day of November, in the year 18—, Col. Arthur Pellow, my neighbor, came to my house. I received him kindly, and induced him to remain and dine with me. Some months before, a portion of his lands had been sold under my agency; I had been made trustee in a deed of trust to secure payment of debts due from Pellow to certain persons living at a distance. The debts had slept for several years; demand of payment happened unfortunately to be made shortly after a change in Pellow's political relations with me, and upon the heel of something like a quarrel which his failure to support me in a closely contested election had produced between us. At a time subsequent to the sale of his lands I yielded so far to my desire to appease him, and regain a lost friend, as to explain fully all facts in connection with my trusteeship. He seemed then to yield up his harsh opinion that I had brought his creditors suddenly upon him, and pressed the sale of his lands, in vindictive return for his political desertion of my cause. I fancied that I had convinced him of the truth, i. e. that his creditors had made the demand of their own accord, and had even compelled me against my earnest remonstrances to make the sale. On the occasion of the visit to me I continued for several hours to believe that my guest had been quite satisfied by my explanations; as we dined together, however, I perceived that I had been mistaken. His complaints were renewed, and in exceedingly offensive terms. I endured them with a show of equanimity, but with an intense rage under it. He left my house; I could not remain behind; with a half-formed purpose of vengeance I joined him. My manner continued to be moderate—I uttered certain formulas of regret that my neighbor and old friend should misunderstand and so deeply wrong me. His answer was a direct charge of falsehood, and double-dealing, accompanied by an oath, and a look not only of anger but of contempt. Then the measure was filled to overflowing. Would to God that my nature had been of the common sort which resents wrong or outrage on the spot, and when reflection comes, has no pang but for the passionate blow which laws and the best wisdom of man half excuse. Ira brevis furor est. But the very moderation which I could seem to assume, and which was commonly considered proof of a poised intellect and tutored nature was my terrible curse. Why should I not admit the truth? The moderation of manner under offence which I had always practised was only the result of cowardice. The red blaze of anger in my fellow man paled me into timidity; it was only an art of manner that made the timidity appear a temperate and wise forbearance. I was in fact a craven, with a vile and vindictive temper—more unrestrainable after its subtil sort than the more ordinary passion of a rash choleric man. I continued to walk with Col. Pellew, but now in silence; he gave me, at first, a look of contemptuous surprise, when he found that his insults had not driven me off; then he walked on as if he had been quite alone. I determined to take vengeance for his insults—direct, terrible insults, such as no man had ever before put upon me. What measure or kind of vengeance? If a spark of manly courage had quickened my nature, the course would have been clear and the task easy. What easier than to say in the fields—'turn sir; you have grossly insulted me; give me satisfaction?' But I was a coward; I could not dare so extremely; the choleric giant would have turned upon me as the Bull of the Alpujaras meets the Toreador. I yielded to a wild anger and a base cowardice; I was sold to the evil genius; I yielded to the subtil devil within me; I determined to strike my adversary at advantage—to murder him. When this purpose was matured I found temperate words to utter; if Pellew had shown the least return to kindly feeling my purpose might have been even then suddenly relinquished. But he strode on in sullen silence. We came to the line of the estates—a skirt of woodland lies on this side of it. A disused well was near us; the foundation walls of an old farm-house, and some straggling fruit trees of a great age will guide those who may search for this well, although it has long since been filled up quite to the grassy level.

"As we came within a few steps of the well I drew a sharp and long knife; I stood one step behind my victim; I struck. I repeated the blow—I struck many times—for there was a confounding and desperate struggle. But death came at last; the giant was quite dead at my feet. More in obedience to a predetermination than from any present prompting, I drew with a great effort the body to the edge of the well, and permitted it to fall heavily in. The depth was inconsiderable; I gathered heaps of the dried grass and weeds and threw them in upon the corpse. As I was engaged in this labor a man came running to the spot. I remember in a dull and ghastly way his looks of horror as he caught my arm. I spoke to him—what I do not recollect. We left the field of blood at last.

"The name of this man I will not give. If he has committed an offence it has been merely one of concealment—concealment of my crime. And yet he has not dealt in all things gently by me. I forgive; I have so much to be forgiven.

"The witness of my crime came to me one terrible night—the second night after the fatal evening—and said that men should have burial, and not be cast into pits like dead brutes. How awful was his proposition! It was that the dead body should be taken up and buried in consecrated ground. He seemed to pity me—and if his views have since proved selfish, I am sure that his pity was then genuine. He seemed to be full of superstitious horror—I have no doubt he felt it—at the idea of the brutal neglect of the remains of a fellow man. I gave in to his proposition; I could do no otherwise. The deserted Baptist burial-ground, by the old church in the hills, a mile from the spot of the murder, was chosen as the place of sepulture. We went to work that very night. A horse, snorting under the horrible burthen, bore the corpse. We opened an old grave where the dead tenant had returned to dust, and placed Arthur Pellew in his place. Some forest leaves and a dead thorn tree covered the marks of the fresh burial; there now lie the remains of the murdered man.

"Col. Pellew had no connections in this country. His disappearance excited surprise only until it was discovered that his fortunes were hopelessly involved. Then it was easily conjectured that he had collected his available means, and left the country.

"I ask pardon of Almighty God for my terrible crime. I have besought His pardon for years. I do not despair of it; for His mercy is infinite; and indeed I have suffered the tortures of hell here on earth. In consideration of my poor human weakness; in consideration of endured agonies, and a ruined earthly peace; but above all, upon the blessed basis of the Good Saviour's atonement, I beseech the divine pardon."

This lamentable paper was written in a broken hand; it was also marred and confused, in a part of it, with repetitions, as if the writer dreaded to approach the principal fact. Most of the repetitions I have suppressed; I have suppressed also here and there an interjectional comment, into which feeling seems to have forced him, upon the enormity of his offence. The original narrative is frequently interrupted with such "cries of anguish."

As the good clergyman ended his task of reading, he heard a husky "Amen—Lord pardon me." It came from the lips, and the profound heart of the dying man. Then, as the exclamation reached him, the minister knelt gently by the bed-side, and prayed. His prayers, accompanied by the sobs of woman, and the feeble echoes of his words from the dying, became fervent and eloquent.

It was ended. There was a lull. The breath of Andrew Blair became obstructed. It might scarcely be heard for the wind that filled the chamber with the fresh odours of the summer world out beyond it; for the music of the insects housed in the rustling foliage; for the very beating of the two good hearts so near him. Finally it could not at all be heard. Andrew Blair was dead.

Perhaps the reader will expect a few concluding words concerning the families of Herries and Wright. Major Wright still lives, and has not lost his relish for the chase, or his power of undergoing its fatigues. He has married his daughter with the name of the British queen—a name which I was quite clear upon when I formerly gave it to the reader, but which I have since forgotten from some trick of a bad memory—to a ruddy young fox-hunter with a good property. Miss Araminta Wright is still in a condition of enforced celibacy—her father having dismissed “the young gentleman from town” as too bad a horseman to marry into his family.

John Herries, soon after the death of Andrew Blair, made a bonfire upon a small scale. The pictures of his dining-room were consumed. In the ashes left in the hearth after this conflagration, a servant afterwards found the metallic skeleton of a long-bladed knife, which, as its temper was gone, he threw away, with some ordinary comment to his fellow-servants. This knife had in its time pierced human vitals. The plough has doubtless buried it long since in the fruitful soil, over which springs and summers, as they pass, make the hiding wheat wave in its green, and droop in its russet. The life of John Herries, clouded by doubtful practices but fortunately not stained by crime, became and continues serene. Prosperity has proved wholesome to him. His meek wife is a picture of sedate cheerfulness. Her daughter Georgiana, a sweet girl whom we have too much lost sight of among the crowding forms of this history, is her gentle and affectionate companion. She looks too with pride and love to Tom Herries and his beautiful wife, and is a great deal with them at Lindores.

I bid the reader adieu. Perhaps at some future time I will again impose upon his good will and courtesy.

BOCCACCIO AND HIS WRITINGS.

The fluctuations which may be observed in public taste in matters belonging to the province of literature, are no less unaccountable and remarkable than the variations which it undergoes in other respects. To endeavor to trace the change which has been gradually taking place from age to age, would be to engage in a question the developments of which would undoubtedly produce materials as numerous and varied as interesting. Were we for a few moments to glance over the pages of English literature, restricting our survey solely to the progressive mutations of style, independent of those which influence the language itself, we should find abundant food for reflection in the strange diversity of style which each successive period has given rise to, in the comparison of the literature of any period with the history and manners of the people at the time, and in the reconciling of various theories relating to the advancement of civilization. Or to be more explicit, it may be as well to enter into a more particular explanation of the revolutions to which we have reference, and illustrate them by a few concise details, and a rapid indication, of the more prominent points of this subject that present themselves to our view. At one period we shall remark a style full of conceits, quaint and grotesque humor, and a trifling play upon words, so continuous and so frequently recurring as to form almost the only features of the literature of the time. At another period we are overwhelmed with unwieldy masses of English words entangled and thrown together with all the perplexing inversions so characteristic of the ancient tongues, and which are so effective and appropriate an ornament in their native soil. Again we have writers whose only effort is to dazzle by the polished eloquence which distinguishes them. With one class of authors every thing assumes a hue of austere philosophy; with another there is an artful intermingling of pathos of the most touching and affecting description with strokes of humor occasionally of the broadest kind.

The character of a whole age is sometimes stamped with one or other of these features, and all works issued at these periods bear the impress belonging to the time. But this is not universally so, there are now and then remarkable exceptions. It sometimes happens that a single author of original genius may produce a work whose style and subject are both inimitable and unimitated, and this remark applies most particularly to English literature, containing as it does such productions as the Paradise Lost, Bunyan's

Pilgrim's Progress, Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, and a number of others which will suggest themselves to the recollection of the reader.

Among the valuable relics which have been handed down to us from the "olden time," there are some styles now altogether abandoned, we fear as much by readers as by writers. This we deem should not be altogether so, it is a loss of much refined instruction and agreeable entertainment. Who that has cultivated a taste for letters, at all above the ordinary standard, would not rejoice to see revived among our poets the magnificent versification of Milton, or the classical elegance of Addison? Would it not be infinitely preferable to the absurdities which every passing week produces in the way of mutilating the verse of our language, and might it not afford a consoling contrast for the perpetrations of the school of Carlyle?

The grace and delicacy which are combined with the most refreshing simplicity in the style of Boccaccio present a model every way worthy of imitation; not a servile imitation which reflects the errors as well as the beauties of its original, and too often distorts beauties till they become errors, but an enlightened reproduction of the great principles which regulate and define the limits of style. There is an ingenuousness too about the old Italian story-teller which is quite captivating, and an occasional light morbidzza which, though rendering his Decameron unfit to be placed indiscriminately in the hands of all, possesses, for its masterly management, high artistic value in the eye of the critic of fine writing.

The Decameron is composed of one hundred tales of various lengths and on numerous interesting topics: it is divided into a period of ten days, each of which comprises ten novels. Some are mere anecdotes, brief descriptions, or tales illustrative of traits of character peculiar to the time. Depending for the interest which invests them almost entirely upon the ingenuity of the structures of their plot, they are told by their different narrators, in an easy, graphic style, which still occasionally rises into beauty and pathos, or descends to exquisite drollery. In the brief space allotted to the Italian novella, there is of course a difficulty to overcome, not encountered by the writer who allows himself a wider field for the exercise of his ingenuity or his imagination. The fiction so shortly to be brought to a close cannot contain those multifarious details, which a skilful imagination may with facility intertwine with the main plot, in the larger romance as constructed by late and living writers. Descriptions of localities or of persons—delineations of human nature—the artificial gradation of events, are all contracted and diminished, and must, to be at all perceptible, be executed with a force and brilliancy sufficient to compensate for the lack of space.

Read over those enchanting descriptions given by Boccaccio of Italian scenery and rural pleasures, or those sunrise scenes with which he ushers in each succeeding day, and it cannot but be admitted that there are few things to be found either in painting or descriptive writing to equal them. Review his portraits delle piu belle e delle piu leggiadre che in Firenze fossero; they are in writing, what the most perfect paintings of female beauty that the engraver has hitherto sent into every house, are in a separate branch of art. Recall the adventures of Andreuccio da Perugia and endeavor to find, if possible, in the same space more natural and yet extraordinary occurrences in any tale of the kind extant. Can a lesson in the science of the world be more elegantly and concisely given than in those two witty productions of Cisti Formaid or of Madonna Oretta. And with respect to the invention of character, we may refer to the entertaining frolics and merry humors of Calandrino, Bruno and Buffalmacco; or to the audacious exploit of Ser Ciappelletto, a sort of Italian Falstaff, the anecdote displaying the subtle acumen of Melchisedech the Jew, the touching history of the unfortunate loves of Lorenzo and Lisabetta, or the stern and unrelenting cruelty of Tancredi, Prince of Salerno. But perhaps it may prove acceptable to the lovers of romance, if we present them with one of the least exceptionable of the novels. Which shall it be? for here there is an almost infinite variety;—selection is difficult, but we will attempt

The Falcon of Federigo.

In France there was formerly a young man named, (for Boccaccio is always scrupulously particular in regard to names,) Federigo di Messer Filippo Alberighi, who was universally acknowledged to be superior to all the youth of Tuscany in every genteel and elegant accomplishment. He became enamoured with a fair lady named Monna Giovanna, who was in her time one of the most beautiful and accomplished of her sex in Florence; and that he might obtain the favor of her love, he spent his time in jousts, feats of arms, festivals and the like, and in this course of improvidence he lavished the whole of his fortune. But the lady who was no less virtuous than beautiful, appeared never to waste a care either upon all these things which were occasioned by his devotion to her beauty, or upon him who thus adored her. In this manner Federigo living beyond his means and gaining nothing, as must happen on like occasions, his funds at length failed him and he became poor, having preserved of his all only one small estate, upon the revenue of which he supported himself in his straitened circumstances, and a falcon, one of the best to be found in the world. But more in love than ever, and it not being in his power to reside in the city as he preferred, he went into the country where his estate was, to take up his abode. There as often as he was able, he amused himself with hawking, and without receiving assistance from any one, he supported his poverty in patience. Now it happened one day, that while Federigo was in this extremity the husband of Monna Giovanna fell sick, and at the approach of death made a will, and being very wealthy left all to his eldest son; and then, as he had much loved Monna Giovanna, he appointed her, if it happened that his son should die without legitimate heirs, to enter upon the possession of his property. Then he died. Monna Giovanna being thus left a widow, went, as is customary with our ladies, to spend the year of mourning in the country with her son, at an estate belonging to her in the neighborhood of that of Federigo. So it happened that her boy soon commenced a familiar intercourse with Federigo, and to take great pleasure in hawks and hounds; and having often seen Federigo's falcon fly, he was pleased with it in an extraordinary manner and desired very much to possess it. But still he did not dare to ask him for it, as he saw how highly he prized it. And now, while affairs were in this condition, it happened that the boy fell sick, at which his mother was thrown into a high state of grief and solicitude, as he was her only son, and she loved him as much as ever son was loved. She spent whole days with him; she never ceased doing all in her power to restore him to health, and moreover, she often inquired of him if he was in want of any thing, begging him to tell her what it was, promising him if it could possibly be procured she would take means to get it for him. The boy, after hearing the promise repeated many times, said—"Mother, if you can get me the falcon of Federigo, I believe I shall get well." The lady when she heard this, was silent for a few moments and commenced to think what she ought to do. She knew that Federigo had long loved her, but that he had never received the least favor from her, and so she said, "how shall I send for or ask for this falcon, which is, as I hear, the best that ever flew, and moreover is that attaches him to the world. And how could I be so heartless as to deprive a noble heart, to whom but one solitary enjoyment has remained, of even that." Hesitating as this idea presented itself, although sure of obtaining her request if she should ask, and scarcely knowing what to say, she remained silently gazing at her son. Finally her maternal love gained the victory, and she concluded, to please the boy, that that which was most suitable and proper was, not to send a messenger, but to go herself on her errand and ask for the falcon, and so, said she to her son, "my son, comfort yourself and endeavor to get well, for I promise thee that the first thing that I shall do to-morrow morning will be to go for this bird, and then I shall bring it to you." This so delighted the boy, that the same day he manifested evident improvement. The next day, his mother having invited another lady to accompany her under the pretext of a walk, went to the residence now occupied by Federigo, and sent to ask to see him. Not having that day set out on a hawking expedition, he was in his garden occupied with certain minor arrangements. When he heard that Monna Giovanna was asking for him at the door, he hastened thither much astonished. When she saw him coming she rose with the most gracious air to meet him, and he on his part performed with the utmost reverence a dignified salutation. She then said to him, "good morning, Federigo," and added, "I have come to make reparation for the wrongs you have endured for me, loving me more than was for your good; and the reparation shall be such that I intend, with this lady who has accompanied me, to dine sociably with you to-day." To which Federigo humbly responded, "Madam, I do not recollect to have received any wrong at your hands, but on the contrary, so many benefits, that if I ever enjoyed any consideration, it is through your own estimation, and the love which I have had for you. And most certainly, this gracious visit of yours is much more dear to me than it would be if I had again to spend as much as I have spent, since you visit a poor host." Having thus spoken he received her with evident humiliation within his house, and afterwards conducted her into his garden, and there being unable to find any one else to keep her company, he said, "Madonna, since there is no other person here, this good woman, who is the wife of my farmer, will keep your company while I am gone to have the table set." Although his poverty was extreme, he had not till this day perceived to what want he had reduced himself by having spent improvidently his riches. But this morning finding nothing which might do honor to the lady for whose love he had himself been induced to honor so many other persons, he felt a pang; and in the extremity of his anguish he stood in a corner by himself, cursing his hard fate, and then began to hurry hither and thither, neither finding money nor a pledge by which he could obtain it. The hour was a late one and his desire of doing honor to the lady was exec-sive; and, in his pride, not being willing to ask assistance from another, not even from his farmer, his eyes fell upon his good falcon, which he saw perched upon the bar which traversed his cage.

As he found himself bereft of all other resources, he took down his falcon, and finding him very fat, he thought him worthy to make a dish for such a lady. And so, without giving himself time for reflection, he wrung his neck and gave him to the cook to have him instantly picked, dressed, placed on the spit and roasted; and, having dressed the table with the whitest cloth, of which he had a few remaining, with a smiling countenance he returned to the lady in his garden and told her that such a dinner as he was able to prepare, was now awaiting her. Hearing this the lady, with her companion, arose and went to the table, and without knowing what they ate, together with Federigo, who waited upon them with the utmost gallantry, dined upon the famous falcon.

When the table was cleared, and a short time had been spent in agreeable conversation, the lady, deeming the opportunity favorable for declaring the object of her visit, thus addressed Federigo:

“Federigo, in recalling your former life, and my own indiscretion, which perhaps you regarded as harshness and cruelty, I am not permitted to entertain a doubt, but that you should wonder at my presumption when you hear what has been the principal reason for my visit. But if you know what it is to have a son, or if you ever had known, by which you would be enabled to form a conception of what strength is parental love, it appears to me not improbable that you would hold me excused. But though you have not, I, who have one, cannot for that, free myself from the common laws which are binding upon all those who are mothers, and as I must obey them, I am compelled, much against my own pleasure, and in utter disregard of all propriety and right, to ask of you a gift of an object which I knew to be held dear to you, and well may it be so, since your reduced circumstances have left you no other delight, no other diversion, no other consolation; now this gift is your falcon, with which my boy is so much fascinated, that if I do not take it to him, I fear that it will aggravate his illness so much that his loss may be the consequence. I pray you, therefore, not by the love which you have professed for me, for by that I could pretend to no claim upon you, but by your noble nature, which in such evidences of generosity has displayed itself more than in any other manner, that you will give it to me, that by this gift I may assure myself of having preserved the life of my child, and thereby be eternally obliged to you.”

Federigo, upon hearing what the lady asked of him and being conscious that he could not serve her, because the bird was no more, began in her presence to weep, before he was able to answer a single word. This display of grief the lady at first thought arose from regret at parting with the good falcon, rather than from any other cause, and, actuated by this idea, she was upon the point of saying that she would not receive it; but still, having controlled herself, she waited till, after his fit of weeping had subsided, Federigo should give her his answer, which he at length did in these words:

“Madonna, after it pleased God that I should direct my love to you I have found fortune adverse in many things, and I have had much to lament; but all these have been light in comparison with what she now inflicts upon me, and for which I can never be again reconciled to her, in the thought that you have deigned to come hither to my humble abode, to which, while I was rich, you never would condescend to come, and ask a small gift of me, and you have so timed your request that it is not in my power to grant it; and why it is so I shall briefly inform you.

“When I heard that you had done me the honor to come and dine with me, having regard to your excellency and your worth, I deemed it incumbent upon me that I should do honor to my guest with the choicest viands in my house in preference to those which are ordinarily placed upon my table. So that calling to mind the falcon you ask of me and its excellent qualities, I reputed it a food worthy of you, and this morning you have had it roasted upon the table, all which I had done for the best; but seeing now that you wished to possess it in another manner, I am so dejected at not being able to obey you that I believe I shall never again be at peace with myself.” And having said this, he threw down before her eyes the feathers, feet and beak, that had once belonged to the falcon, in testimony of what he said. When the lady saw and heard this, she at first blamed him for having killed such a noble bird to provide a meal for a woman, and then was lost in admiration within herself at that greatness of heart, which it was beyond the power of poverty ever to overcome. Then as she had no further expectation of obtaining the falcon and thus finding the safety of her son hazarded, she went away in great depression of mind, and returned to her boy, who, either from melancholy at being unable to possess the falcon or from the effects of his sickness, which possibly would of itself have had a similar termination, in the space of not many days, to the inexpressible grief of his mother, passed from this life.

After a period spent in tears and bitterness, the lady having remained immensely wealthy, and being still young, was many times requested by her brothers to contract another marriage. On her part though she would not of her own accord have taken such a step, yet seeing herself in a manner constrained, recollecting the worth of Federigo and the last trait of his magnificence, in not having hesitated in despatching a falcon of such rare value to honor her, she said to her brothers: "I would willingly remain as I am, but if you so earnestly desire me to take another husband, be assured I shall never consent to have one if I am not permitted to have Federigo degli Alberighi." Her brothers wishing to ridicule her out of this resolve, said: "Are you mad, Giovanna, to marry a man that has not a cent in the world?" To this she replied: "my brothers, I well know the truth of what you say; but for my part I prefer a man without money to money without a man." Her brothers, when she had declared her mind, having long known Federigo, notwithstanding his present circumstances, decided to accede to her wish and gave her to him with all her possessions.

Federigo at length seeing himself in possession of a lady of her extraordinary qualities and one whom he had so extravagantly adored, and being at the same time restored to affluence, became a better economist and passed the remainder of his days in happiness with his wife.

SONG.

TRANSLATED FROM JACOBI.

Tell me where's the violet fled,
Late so gaily blowing,
Springing 'neath fair Flora's tread,
Choicest sweets bestowing?
Swain, the vernal scene is o'er
And the violet blooms no more!

Say, where hides the blushing rose,
Pride of fragrant morning,
Garland meet for beauty's brows,
Hill and dale adorning?
Gentle maid, the summer's fled,
And the hopeless rose is dead.

Bear me then to yonder rill,
Late so freely flowing,
Watering many a daffodil
On its margin glowing.
Sun and wind exhaust its store;
Yonder riv'let glides no more!

Lead me to the bowery shade
Late with roses flaunting,—
Loved resort of youth and maid
Amorous ditties chaunting.
Hail and storm with fury shower;
Leafless moorns the rifled bowler!

Say where hides the village maid?
Late you cot adorning,
Oft I've met her in the glade,
Fair and fresh as morning—
Swain, how short is beauty's bloom!
Seek her in the grassy tomb!

Whither roves the tuneful swain,
Who of rural pleasures,
Rose and violet, rill and plain,
Sung in dearest measures?
Maiden, swift life's vision flies,
Death has closed the Poet's eyes.

SKETCHES OF SOUTHERN LIFE.

NO. V.

(CONCLUDED.)

Right merrily went off the expected wedding, and Henry was quite as much pleased, amused and surprised at the scene as Philip and Fanny had supposed he would be; there was, as they had foretold, a real gathering of the clans; aunts, uncles and cousins in the tenth degree. The assembly being almost entirely composed of relatives, friends and neighbors, gave it somewhat the character of a large family party, and all was mirth, fun and cordiality. There were certainly many deviations from fashion and taste in the costume of some of the guests, but the girls were generally very pretty, and with a sort of feminine instinct, seemed to have discovered in most cases how to dress in a manner very becoming to their various styles of appearance.

Amongst these fair girls, Fanny shone like the evening star, "far, far above them all," and met only in Henry's eyes, for the general voice was unanimous in awarding her the palm for grace, beauty and attraction. Most mothers, however, in giving her the preference, made a secret reservation in favor of their own daughters. No waltzes, gallopades or polkas were admitted in the festivities, as both Mr. Seyton and Mrs. Maynard highly disapproved of these modern innovations; sprightly Scotch reels and graceful quadrilles, were the order of the night, and the old looked on with benignant pleasure at the mirth of the young, and delighted to trace in the air, manner and appearance of the youthful dancers, the family peculiarities of their ancestors. Family traditions and legends form a favorite subject of conversation amongst Virginia gentlemen of the old school, and they are frequently most accurate genealogists, though family records where they exist at all, are generally kept in the most imperfect manner. A few of the old gentlemen partook so strongly of the general hilarity as to yield to the earnest solicitations of the youthful part of the community, and join in a dance or two, as moving tableaux of the last generation.

Ice-creams, jellies, cakes, syllabubs, &c., covered the supper-table in sufficient profusion to have supplied a company three times as numerous as those assembled, and these dainties were as usual fully appreciated by the elder portion of the guests. The bride looked fair, modest, pretty, and was unexceptionably dressed, but as she resembled thousands of other brides, she attracted no particular attention, after the general judgment had been pronounced that she was very pretty and very interesting.

Helen Maynard's wedding gave rise to many festivities, and Henry daily felt his heart warm beneath the genial influence of hospitality, frankness and genuine, unostentatious kindness. He became acquainted with a rich and odd variety of character, which not only amused him, but threw new lights on human nature; he saw much also to admire in the manliness, independence of thought, absence of pretension and real delicacy of feeling, which were prevailing characteristics amongst the gentlemen; much likewise to regret in the waste and misapplication of talent, and the indulgence of a sort of slovenliness of mind, which Philip thought ought to be ascribed partly to indolence, and partly to the independent and secluded mode of life led by most of these gentlemen, for each one followed his own fancy in reading, without definite aim or object, unless some political aspiration gave form and consistency to his studies.

Henry Livingstone's feelings became daily more deeply interested in Fanny, as he observed her character in the varying lights, which different circumstances presented. Her lovely singleness of mind and forgetfulness of self became more strikingly apparent, in scenes calculated to call forth any latent love of display, or kindle any smouldering spark of vanity; but it was evident that she partook of the general mirth with the gaiety and simplicity of a child, and she never seemed to act upon design, except that she systematically endeavored to bring into notice those who were neglected from bashfulness or want of attraction. Henry thought he had never seen her look more beautiful and interesting than when engaged in doing the amiable as hostess, to a poor, uncouth Yankee teacher, who was avoided as an especial bore by almost all the company.

"Look at Fanny Seyton," said Frank Forrest to Henry, but he perceived the advice was superfluous as soon as it was given, "see how patiently she is answering Mr. Sandford's interrogatories; after having satisfied his curiosity upon twenty other topics of equal importance and interest to himself, she is now informing him as to the year, month and day in which uncle Philip was born, which is the preliminary step to questioning her as to her own age."

"The martyrdoms of society are seldom sufficiently appreciated," replied Henry, "but when they are voluntarily suffered, as in the case of Miss Seyton, it would be difficult to say what goodness of heart and moral beauty they evince." Then fearing he was speaking with rather too much warmth and earnestness for the occasion, as he caught Frank's penetrating glance resting upon him, he changed the subject instantly, adding: "it is wonderful that a few months sojourn in the 'Old Dominion,' should not cure even the rawest Yankee of his question-asking habits, for I believe it would be impossible to find any people who were more exempt from all propensity to ask impertinent questions than the Virginians. From the highest to the lowest, this appears to be a strongly marked sectional trait, and I have been amused to observe the art and address, which even the servants use, to come at any information they may wish to be possessed of, concerning you or your affairs. I have often been surprised at the real delicacy and skill they evince on such occasions."

"'Like master, like man,' you know is an old proverb which has much truth in it; it is, however, not so generally understood, that the converse of the proposition is equally true. Many of us might trace our slovenly habits of thinking any expedient good enough that will answer the present emergency, and letting the morrow take care for the things of itself, to negro influence. Yet our intercourse with them, is not wholly without its beneficial effects upon ourselves."

"May I ask," said Henry smiling, "what those beneficial effects are?"

"In the first place, we learn, almost from our infancy, to enter into their feelings, and become so imbued with the views and sentiments of our mammies, aunts and playmates, that we learn to attach an importance to their approbation, and to entertain a sympathy with their feelings, which we never shake off. This enables us to know better how to promote their happiness, and the tribunal of public opinion amongst the colored population, thus obtains a considerable and enduring influence over the minds of the whites. The vices which they view with the greatest disapprobation, we learn to regard with especial abhorrence, such as cruelty and niggardliness, and strange as it may appear, our notions of what constitutes the character of a true gentleman, are somewhat derived from them; for no people reject, with greater contempt, the idea that money makes gentility than our blacks do. You are doubtless surprised, yet what I say is literally true, and I could enumerate many more benefits which we derive from our intercourse with them, but I leave these to your sagacity to discover gradually, you will find it a curious and interesting subject of thought."

"I have already observed so many facts, in direct contradiction to my preconceived ideas, that I am prepared to admit the possibility of arriving at many more conclusions of which I never dreamed."

"If," said Mr. Seyton, who had been listening to the conversation between Frank and Henry, "we judged each other in the spirit of candor, and sought to discover truth instead of confirmation of our own views, to what different conclusions we should arrive! The members of our great confederacy would learn to appreciate so truly the beauty and glory of the great temple they have reared, that no Erostratus would be found mad or vain enough to fire the wonderful structure, which once destroyed, would bury beneath its ruins the best hopes of humanity. We should love and feel like brethren and the Northern and Southern people would mutually renounce prejudices, which they have imbibed at so early an age, as to consider them undeniable truths."

To this proposition both Frank and Henry assented, with a secret reservation, however, in favor of many of the prejudices of which Mr. Seyton spoke, yet, to do Henry justice, he possessed a great degree of candor, and he never clung to an error, if proof sufficient for conviction was presented to his understanding. He assented to Mr. Seyton's remark, with an involuntary sigh, for he thought how rapidly the golden days of opportunity were flying away, and how soon the scenes through which he was now passing would have gone with all their images of beauty and feelings of love, into the shadowy land of memory. He thought of those exquisite lines by one of the sweetest of pastoral poets:

"I prized every hour that went by,
Beyond all that had pleased me before;
But now they are past, and I sigh,
And I grieve that I prized them no more."

Henry was pleased when the festivities were fairly over, and the household at Oak Grove settled down in the calm every day routine of life. He felt every hour grow more precious as the time shortened, and he felt too, that the crisis of his fate was at hand, he could no longer abandon himself to that sweet, dream-like existence, in which we passively resign ourselves to delightful impressions, feeling as if any effort of our own would dissolve the spell. The first red leaves were already hanging on the boughs, and he bade farewell to summer with a deeper regret than he had ever before experienced. He had received lately a letter from his mother urging his return, and expressing her uneasiness at his long absence, containing, too, many details of his acquaintance, such as she thought most likely to interest and amuse him. This portion of the letter he passed over with a hasty and indifferent glance, exclaiming half aloud, "What can my mother suppose I care about what Julia Fenwick or Louisa Morris does, or how could she think I could be gratified at their complimentary speeches? As to their getting married, nothing could interest me less, except that I should be rather pleased at such an occurrence, to put an end forever to any silly jokes about either of them as it regards myself."

It was necessary, however, to return some speedy answer to his mother's kind letter, but he had not the courage to fix any time for his departure: he wrote in general terms of returning soon, expatiated on his improved health, described the scenery, the kindness and hospitality of the people, said a good deal for Mr. Seyton and Philip, and not a word about Fanny, for after pondering over a hundred things to say about her, every thing which had occurred to him seemed perfectly unsatisfactory and unsuitable.

Should I succeed, he thought, it will be time enough to tell my mother all, indeed, should she ever see Fanny, she will acknowledge that no description could convey an adequate idea of her.

Having despatched his letter, Henry went into the library, thinking he should probably meet Fanny there, and almost determined to try his fate in desperation, for though Fanny's manner daily grew kinder, and she gave him increasing marks of confidence, still even Hope scarcely whispered that she loved him. Yet any certainty, even the worst was preferable, to his present state of suspense, and in this mood of mind he entered the library, but he found no one there, and for a moment he breathed more freely.

A volume lay open on the table, and some freshly gathered rosebuds near it, which told him who had been reading there, and had just left the apartment. The volume was Undine in the original, and Henry thought no book could have been selected more emblematic of the fair reader; its fresh, graceful, and unique beauty—veiling by its own outward charms the deep and touching moral within so skilfully and so enchantingly, that the more superficial reader dreamed not of the mine of gold over which the fair stream rolled—shadowed forth strongly Fanny's peculiar style of attraction, her witching charm of manner and moral loveliness. He turned over page after page, hoping to meet with some passage she had marked, but his hand was suddenly arrested, as he perceived written on one of the fly leaves—Walter Travers. The print of the naked foot did not cause more dismay to Robinson Crusoe, when he first beheld it on his island, than these two words, for an irresistible conviction came over him, as strong as it appeared to be unreasonable, that with this name was linked the destruction of his fondest hopes. A withered sprig of myrtle, embalmed within the pages of the book, seemed to him strong confirmation of his fears, and suddenly laying the volume down, as if a serpent had stung him, he went quickly out of the library and joined Philip, whom he found standing in the yard.

"Will you walk with me Philip," he said in a low and hurried tone, which at once marked to his companion that he was struggling under the influence of unusual emotion.

"Certainly," said Philip, and the ready smile and jest died away upon his lips as he cast a glance upon Henry's agitated countenance, and instantly surmised that he had received some distressing intelligence from his friends.

Philip led the way to their favorite walk along the banks of the river, and Henry followed him instinctively and in silence, endeavoring so far to master his emotion as to enable him to speak with composure.

At length he said abruptly, "Tell me, I entreat you Philip, who is Walter Travers and whether—whether—he loves your sister?"

He paused, unable to utter another syllable; one glance at his friend was sufficient to tell Philip how deeply his inmost soul was moved, and quicker than lightning his mind combined various circumstances which had hitherto appeared insignificant, looks, words and tones were at once connected and interpreted and the whole truth rushed upon his mind with such painful conviction, that he uttered a deep and involuntary sigh.

Philip took his friend's hand, and pressed it warmly between his own, saying, "I could curse myself for a fool, Livingstone, for never having seen the truth before, owing to my confounded, inconsiderate turn of mind, never looking at any thing which does not lie directly before me."

"Then I am answered, Philip, you know that there is no hope for me. I knew that she did not love me, but I did not know how deeply I had cherished the hope that she might learn to do so, until the dreadful suspicion crossed my mind she loved another. Is this true, Philip? I conjure you by our long friendship to answer me unreservedly, and to tell me whether he is worthy of her." This was the first bitter disappointment Henry had ever experienced, and Philip, who knew how strong his sensibilities were, was greatly grieved, that he should have been the instrument of inflicting so deep a wound upon one for whom he felt a brother's love. He paused for a moment, ere he replied, studying how to frame his answer so as to cause the least possible pain, but Henry said:

"I understand your kind intention and appreciate it fully, but it is in vain, you cannot spare or even lessen the pain, by any manner, in which you can pronounce a sentence, which must be a death warrant to my hopes. Answer me truly, fully, and this will be the kindest course you can pursue."

"Then I will obey you, I know that Walter Travers has loved Fanny from her childhood," and he added, averting his eyes from Henry, "I am sure his love is not unreturned. Her heart was won before you ever saw her, and I cannot sufficiently execrate my own folly in not perceiving your danger, and giving you timely warning to avert it."

"No warning could have been timely, I loved your sister almost from the first day I saw her, nor do I know even now how to regret that I have seen her. You have nothing to reproach yourself with, Philip. But you have not yet answered my second question, tell me all about him," and he turned away as he spoke, as if preparing himself to hear something very painful.

"Walter Travers is a very noble-minded, very intellectual young man; his dignified demeanor and moral elevation have always been such, that even from a boy he was treated by every one as a man. This natural seriousness was increased by the circumstances in which he was placed. Only a month or two was wanting to complete the course of law lectures he was attending, when he was recalled home by the sudden death of his father. He found his mother overwhelmed with grief, and incapable of attending to any thing. Mr. Travers' affairs were discovered after his death to be in a state of extreme embarrassment, a circumstance he had carefully concealed from his family, hoping, perhaps, to retrieve them. Walter showed a degree of dignity, resolution and good sense under these adversities, of which no one had dreamed so young a man, educated in such total ignorance of business, capable. He became at once the head of the family, and applied all the energies of his mind and will to learn what had best be done, and then to carry the measures upon which he resolved into effect. Mrs. Travers did not want sense, but was deficient in resolution, Walter, however, supplied it, and she found relief in trusting to him implicitly. Her affections were as strong as her will was weak, and this enabled her to carry out reforms, and submit to a system of self-denial, which she could never otherwise have done. Walter sat the example of self-denial, and it became so evident to all the family, that he preferred their gratification to his own, wherever any point of self-indulgence was concerned, that it roused a kindred spirit of generosity in the younger members of the family, and they willingly submitted to any retrenchments and privations that their brother thought necessary. Indeed, the gentle, yet grave kindness of his manner, and his firmness of resolution made them regard him rather as a father than an elder brother.

"That large, gray looking old building I was pointing out to your observation a few days ago, as a situation possessing great natural beauty, was then the family residence; to maintain so large an establishment, in the style of hospitality in which they had been wont to live, was impossible in the reduced state of their circumstances, and Walter persuaded his mother to remove to a small house, where they had been accustomed to reside for health, during the summer months. This place is at a short distance from Oak Grove, and has since been sold; there had always been some intimacy between our families, but this change in their circumstances, and Walter's exertions for his family, excited my father's interest very strongly in his favor, and he became his constant adviser in matters of business, or in any exigency that arose. My poor mother, too," and Philip's voice became involuntarily softer and sadder, as he mentioned a name so dearly loved and honored, "was very kind to Mrs. Travers and her daughters, but for Walter she felt an especial fondness and admiration.

"During this time, we saw each other very often, and Walter Travers became strongly attached to Fanny, while yet a child. Though habitually grave to others, he was always playful and gentle in his manner towards her, and exerted all his powers not only to gain her affections, but to exalt her character, and there is you know a sort of strange fascination possessed by grave and lofty natures over gay ones. But to make a long story short," said Philip, anxious to pass over the most painful part of his narration as quickly and lightly as possible, "they loved each other before their friends or themselves were conscious of their attachment.

"Walter struggled on, and stemmed the tide of adversity with a bold heart; by the most absolute self-denial, and by great exertion the most pressing debts were paid, and his younger brothers well educated. His sisters are now both married and residing in Louisiana, his mother died a year or two ago, and his brothers have made an advantageous settlement in the South with their slaves, and Walter is the only one of the race left in the Old Dominion, which he loves with all the enthusiasm and devotion of his nature. He is at present absent on a visit to his friends in the South."

"It would be insincerity," replied Henry in a tone of deep emotion, "to say that I rejoice at any thing, at present, especially at a contrast so humiliating to my own character as the picture which you have just drawn exhibits, yet I can truly say, that it will greatly lessen my own grief, that though my hopes are forever destroyed her happiness is secured. It will be happier, better for you all."

"Nay, my dear Livingstone," said Philip, "there is no man living upon earth whom I would sooner have called brother than yourself, had fate so decreed it, but are we not already brothers in heart? Walter Travers is certainly a noble fellow, and as he has been tried in the school of adversity and action, his powers of mind and energies of character are, of course, more developed than either yours or mine, but no one would pronounce him so well fitted to gain a lady's love as yourself, and to me he is certainly not so dear. I am deeply, truly grieved that you should have met with such a disappointment, when I had so much wished to have given you pleasure, yet when calmer feelings arise and your present impressions become fainter you will acknowledge that you could not have left your parents for a Southern home, and Fanny would never have been herself in a Northern one. It would have been like transplanting a water lily to some dusty thoroughfare. However truly she might have loved you, I do not think she could have been happy in a life so uncongenial to her nature and habits, for whatever lovers and poets may say to the contrary, I am convinced that the love of any one being, however beloved and gifted, is not sufficient for happiness."

Henry grasped Philip's hand and said in a somewhat unsteady tone, "I see and feel your kindness; and your friendship is even now a drop of sweetness in the cup of bitterness, yet I cannot deceive myself. I am sure now, that even without a rival, I could not have won your sister's heart. She could not love a man she did not reverence, and my life has been a summer day all song and sunshine, fitting me for the romance, not the realities of life, and I am now rudely aroused from dreams in which I have too long indulged. I have dreamed of much and performed nothing, and the sweetest of all dreams I shall never dream again, yet I may live for the great ends of life. But I pain you, and now, Philip, I must acknowledge my weakness; I have been so happy at your home, I cannot bear to linger now when every pleasure would be converted into a pang. Tell the whole truth to your sister and father, I would not seem ungrateful but I must leave Virginia at once."

Philip saw how deeply Henry was moved, was silent for a moment, and then said: "I will not urge you to do any thing which may cause you a moment's unnecessary pain. You have only to name the time you wish to leave us and I can say truly to your acquaintances that your mother urged your immediate return, and make your adieux and parting compliments; to my father and sister, if you wish it, I will say the whole truth."

"Yes, tell them all, tell your sister how deeply, how truly I love her, tell her — but no it is vain, do as you judge best, my dear Philip, it can avail me nothing. The steamboat goes to-morrow to Baltimore and then I must leave you."

"I shall accompany you then as far as Philadelphia, at any rate. I wish to purchase some books there, and we shall be together longer. Meanwhile think before you decide. My father will be absent to day on business and you can think the matter over thoroughly."

"My resolution is unalterably fixed, I should only betray my own weakness by staying longer. No words can express, no time can efface my sense of the kindness I have received here, of the happiness I have enjoyed; but, indeed, the kindest thing now, Philip, would be to hurry my departure."

"Be it so then," said Philip sorrowfully, "I will return immediately to the house to make some necessary arrangements for our journey, and you will follow me, when you feel inclined to do so."

"Thank you, I will join you again in an hour or two" and Philip slowly turned his steps homewards, much grieved and mortified at the turn affairs had taken, while Henry being left to his own reflections and feelings, gave himself up to the bitterness of his heart. Sadly he gazed on the objects around him to bid them farewell, for with how many of those inanimate things was the image of Fanny associated! here he had plucked a wild flower for her; there she had shown him some point of view which she peculiarly admired; near this tree he had quoted lines to her from some favorite poet, and on this spot, where he lingered longest, but two evenings since, when Philip had himself been descanting on the North and South, Fanny had assured him that he deserved to be a son of the "Old Dominion," but as this could not be, she hoped to enlist him as a champion in her cause. How had his heart swelled at this speech, to what enchanting hopes had it given rise! But this was all over now. He abandoned himself for hours to that painful sort of reverie so well described by one unrivalled in portraying the dark and painful emotions of our nature,

"Where thousand thoughts begin to end in one,
And seek from all the refuge found in none."

But the lapse of time reminded him that he must linger no longer, he endeavored to call pride to his aid, but grief and disappointment overpowered it. "At least," he thought, "I will bear this stroke like a man. I will deserve her love though she must never be mine, it will be a consolation to feel that she might have loved me if her heart had not been won by another."

He walked onwards slowly, very slowly, pausing at almost every step and looking around, thinking how he should meet Fanny again for the last time, and when he reached Oak Grove, he scarcely knew whether pain or relief predominated. Philip then told him that on his return he had found a note lying on the table from Fanny, informing him that she had gone to Mount Forrest, at Mary's urgent entreaty, to assist her in nursing the baby who was taken extremely ill, and that she should not return that night. "Tell Mr. Livingstone," she added, "I left on the drawing room mantelpiece a bunch of wild flowers in water for him; they belong to a very rare species of orchis, and deserve a place in his Herbarium."

Philip handed the note to Henry, who after reading it over several times, turned away, and telling Philip that he must put up some books and papers, retired to his own room. Philip observed that he retained possession of the note, sighed as Henry left him, and found some relief in rating himself roundly for his own want of penetration.

Mr. Seyton did not return until night, and learned then, with much amazement, that Henry intended to leave them on the following day. He expressed kind and sincere regret at his leaving them so soon, and urged him much to visit Virginia again the following summer; he soon perceived Henry's despondency, and though it appeared deeper than was natural at such a parting, attributed it partly to unusual warmth of feeling, and to severe headache, which Philip kindly threw in to make the cause appear equal to the effect.

When Mr. Seyton retired to his own apartment for the night, Philip followed him, and after acquainting him with the real cause of Henry's sudden departure, said that he had determined on accompanying his friend as far as Philadelphia, as he thought this would in some degree lessen the pain of separation. In another mood, Philip would have laughed at the old gentleman's blank look of amazement and exclamation of concern.

"It must be confessed," said Philip, "that we Seytons are a single-minded race, and never see beyond our own noses; I ought to have seen and prevented all this."

"Bless my soul, I had no idea of it. I am really sorry it should have happened so. He is a fine young man, of rare talents, and what is better, of high moral character. I had hoped to have kept him some time longer with us. I do not, however consider a disappointment in love as a very serious matter; he will soon recover it when he returns to his friends and the bustle of the city."

It would be hard to describe the feelings with which Henry caught the last glimpse of Oak Grove, and more difficult still to depict Fanny's astonishment when she returned home the next evening and found Philip and Henry gone. Her father said nothing on the subject, and after every possible surmise had been exhausted, a complete answer was found to her conjectures, when she opened again her precious Undine. There she found a few lines from Henry to herself, containing a wild, despairing farewell, in which there was so much of grief, of passion, of deep and genuine love, that her tears fell bright and fast over the lines, and yet Walter Travers himself would have loved her better for those tears, could he have seen her heart.

Philip and Henry parted sorrowfully, with promises to write often, and to meet frequently. Though Henry could not now admit of the supposition that he would ever revisit Virginia, yet they might meet on neutral ground, and Philip promised to visit his friend in New York in the course of the next year. He would have promised almost any thing for Henry's satisfaction.

Mr. and Mrs. Livingstone both perceived immediately that Henry's spirits were greatly changed, though he endeavored to appear as usual; but when he was alone with his mother he could not refuse to answer her anxious interrogatories, as to the cause of his altered spirits. He told her all as briefly as he could, but did not dwell upon his feelings. He felt, he said, the weakness and folly of yielding to unavailing regret, and he trusted his disappointment might make him a wiser and a better man. To Fanny, he should always owe the sweetest and brightest recollections of his life, his purest and most exalted ideas of female excellence, and whatever lofty aspirations might elevate his future aims and pursuits.

It must be confessed that Mrs Livingstone, was not so far exalted above the common nature of mothers, as to be quite capable of forgiving Fanny for having so deeply, though innocently wounded the heart of her son; indeed, she was sufficiently unjust to think it would not have been very unnatural or unjustifiable to have forgotten the claims of Walter Travers, for the superior attractions and great devotion of such a young man as Henry Livingstone.

Mr. Livingstone treated the matter much more lightly; indeed, he said he doubted not that this attachment, though the source of present pain, would have an ennobling effect on his son's character, and as Henry's partialities had become so strong for Virginia, it was perhaps quite as well that he did not form an union, which might so far have strengthened them, as to make a residence in New York distasteful to him.

Henry did not again mention Fanny, or even allude to her, and there were so few of the ordinary symptoms of disappointed love about him, that the young ladies declared he had lost all pretension to romance, and had become a mere matter-of-fact man. The young men of his acquaintance soon perceived that Henry's intellect was fairly aroused, and that his character had assumed a firmer and more exalted tone; if he was no longer to be dreaded as a rival in fashionable life, he would become formidable in the political and intellectual arena. He eschewed music, poetry, all that could revive dangerous feelings; and as he was searching in the library for a volume of the Wealth of Nations, and accidentally placed his hand on Undine, he gave a start of horror. Still he treasured up in his heart of hearts, Fanny's looks, words, tones, above all her passing goodness and sweetness, but with the firm conviction that they were as completely separated as if death itself had parted them, and this conviction was scarcely increased, when some months afterwards he read Philip's letter informing him briefly that Fanny had become Mrs. Walter Travers. Philip dwelt upon the kind recollections which his friends and acquaintances in the Old Dominion entertained of him, including, he said, his colored friends, who always made an exception in his favor when they spoke of Northern gentlemen. Philip concluded his letter with strong professions of affection, which sank the more deeply in Henry's heart, as it was so contrary to Philip's usual habits to express such feelings.

Time, employment, and Henry's own efforts, at length removed the despondency which long hung about him, but the recollection of the "Old Dominion" and the fair Fanny were indissolubly connected in his mind and often rose unbidden to his memory: nor did he forget his promise of becoming the champion of Virginia.

Fanny was always his standard of female beauty and excellence; and the young ladies, after many efforts to storm his heart, gave him up as a hopeless case, and pronounced his doom to be that of an old bachelor. Mrs. Livingstone, however, entertains better hopes for him, which she founds on the increasing partiality which he manifests for Ellen Gray, an orphan niece whom she has adopted, whose artless sweetness, playful originality, and peculiar style of beauty forcibly remind Henry of Fanny Seyton.

STANZAS.

In many a strain of grief and joy,
My youthful spirit sang to thee;
But I am now no more a boy,
And there's a gulph 'twixt thee and me.
Time on my brow has set his seal—
I start to find myself a man,
And know that I no more shall feel
As only boyhood's spirit can.
And now I bid a long adieu,
To thoughts that held my heart in thrall,
To cherished dreams of brightest hue,
And thou—the brightest dream of all!
My footsteps rove not where they roved,
My home is changed, and one by one,
The "old familiar" forms I loved,
Are faded from my path—and gone.
I launch into life's stormy main,
And 'tis with tears—but not of sorrow;
That pouring thus my parting strain,
I bid thee, as a Bride, good-morrow.
Full well thou know'st I envy not,
The heart it is thy choice to share;
My soul dwells on thee as a thought,
With which no earthly wishes are.
I love thee as I love the star,
The gentle star that shines at even;
That melts into my heart from far,
And leads my wandering thoughts to heaven.
'Twould break my soul's divinest dream,
With meaner love to mingle thee;
'Twould dim the most unearthly beam,
Thy form sheds o'er my memory,
It is my joy, it is my pride,
To picture thee in bliss divine,
A happy, and an honored bride,—
Blest by a fonder love than mine.
Be thou to me a holy spell,
A bliss by day—a dream by night—
A thought on which his soul may dwell—
A cheering and a guiding light.
This be thy heart;—but, while no other
Disturbs his image at its oore,
Still think of me as of a brother—
I'd not be loved or love thee more.
For thee each feeling of my breast,
So holy—so serene shall be,
That when thy heart to his is prest,
'Twill be no crime to think of me.
I shall not wander forth at night,
To breathe thy name—as lovers would;
Thy form in visions of delight,
Not oft shall break my solitude;
But when my bosom-friends are near,
And happy faces round me press;
The goblet to my lips, I'll rear,
And drain it to thy happiness.
And when at morn or midnight hour,
I commune with my God alone,
Before the throne of peace and power,

I'll blend thy welfare with mine own.
And if with pure and fervent sighs,
I bend before some loved-one's shrine,—
When gazing on her gentle eyes,
I shall not blush to think of thine,—
Then, when thou meet'st thy love's caress,
And when thy children climb thy knee,
In thy calm hour of happiness,
Then, sometimes,—sometimes think of me.
In pain or health—in grief or mirth,
Oh! may it to my prayer be given,
That we may sometimes meet on earth,
And meet to part no more, in Heaven!—Etonian.

BYRON AND BURNS.

We snatched him from the sickle and the plough
To gauge Ale firkins.—Wordsworth.

We have been somewhat offended of late at hearing it asserted that Byron was a greater poet than Burns. We do not believe this to be true, though we are willing enough to say that the Anglo-Grecian bard was a most remarkable man. Few men have had more admirers than this pair of poets. A volume might be written upon each of them,—in addition to the many already published,—but we intend no such elaborate effort; a short essay by way of comparing them, is all that it will be in our power to offer at their shrines. It is not our purpose to treat either with rudeness; but if we can help it, the Ploughboy shall not play second to the Nobleman.

One of these men was born in 1759, and died 1796, and the other in 1788, and died 1825. They lived, of course, about the same number of years. Each had accomplished his noblest achievement for a considerable period previous to his death. Byron's muse had got upon an inclined plane before he started for the stumps of Missolonghi—and Burns never could have written any thing better than his Vision. The poetical mind probably reaches its acme by the time its possessor is forty. This suggestion at least might be fortified by a host of literary facts. An aged poet is looked upon much in the same way in which we regard an aged knight who anticipates achieving nothing in addition to what he has done. For years before his death, Campbell lost ground by every effort he made to augment his popularity, and it would have been well for his reputation if he had died just after the production of Gertrude of Wyoming. We cannot regard it as a calamity of an intellectual kind that our bards died early, for they might have tapered off into something less worthy than what they had already produced. By quality, and not quantity, must poetry ever be weighed. Cowper wrote good verse at sixty; but he did not begin till he had reached more than the meridian of life.

There are some points of resemblance between Byron and Burns which cannot escape the most casual observer. There was about each of them a striking personal independence. This trait properly displayed is to be admired: but in both it was offensive. Where it is obtruded unnecessarily, we suspect its genuineness. The bard need not solicit favors: but then he need not reject what are intended as testimonials of kindness. There is something exceedingly repulsive in several acts of Burns, and that towards his best friends. Dr. Blair gave him good advice and he rewarded the Doctor by saying that he never had a ray of genius. He rejects all attempts to keep him from expressing his Jacobinical politics at a time when the French Revolution threatened the institutions of England. He is indignant when Thompson offers to pay him for his songs, and yet he had taken seven hundred pounds from the sale of his works. Byron quarrelled with his mother and with his guardian—drew himself back upon being introduced to old Dr. Parr, because the Doctor was a pedant—and treats even his prince with incivility. These things to a sensible man are affected puerilities, since nothing can excuse a poet from the obligation of being a gentleman. They both possessed a fiery temperament. It is probable that Burns would have been at the battle of Preston Pans, had he lived in the early part of the eighteenth century, and we know that Byron went to Greece on warlike business, but we have never had much confidence in the personal courage of poets. The most of them have shown the white feather, with the exception of Korner and one or two of the Greek Tragedians. They are valiant enough with the harp, provided they can be placed out of the range of the balls. It would have been ridiculous if Burns had been at Culloden, as it was ridiculous in Byron to have interfered with the affairs of Western Greece. Mars had no laurel for the man who would not ride a spirited horse without five pair of reins. Nature is not apt to place a pen and a sword into the right hand of the same individual, and the sword had doubtless passed into the left hand of the Missolonghi hero, though he had been engaged in several frays at Venice, Pisa and Florence. In military tact and prowess they were about equal—the one answering for an awkward squad in Dumfries, and the other for a parade in a poor town half burnt by the Turks. Xenophon, Cervantes, Gibbon and Steele were soldiers: but neither was born a Poet. *Poeta nascitur—miles fit.

* We cannot permit our correspondent's imputation against the fraternity of poets to go forth without the expression of our dissent. It may be true, indeed, that great

But poetical individuality is the feature in which these remarkable men bore to each other the strongest resemblance. We mean by poetical individuality that their pursuits were insulated, and each spent his life in the service of the muses. It is true that Burns wrote a number of letters in prose, some of which are sufficiently vulgar for Billingsgate, and this grossness we regret to add has in several instances found place in his rhymes. But no man was ever more faithful to his vocation. To be a poet was his ambition: but he kept singularly clear of ambition to be any thing but a poet. His beau ideal of greatness was to travel over Scotland, to step off her battle fields—to measure her mountains and explore her vallies. His muse never crossed the Tweed, or rose above the north battlement of Caledonia's hills. To be a patriot poet was the proud distinction which he eagerly coveted; resigning to others the palm of oratory, and applause derived from successful legislation. It is equally certain that Byron kept himself true to his poetical segregation, though the proposition at first sight is somewhat startling. He made three speeches in the House of Lords, but he had not then ascertained for what he was designed. He wrote a prose letter in opposition to the theory of Bowles: but the letter was about the poetry of Pope. His letters to Murray and Moore are numerous: but they are about Manfred, Don Juan and Sardanapalus. Even after he had entered on his Quixotic expedition, and had reached the wind-mills of Missolonghi, he did not entirely break squares with the muses. The number of his metrical compositions, and the facility with which he wrote them, evinced that he was marked out for the ideal rather than for any thing practical, and that he had become quite a stray sheep when he got into the train of Mars. This individuality is of immense importance in forming a poet. No one ever associates poets have rarely displayed military talent, but to question their personal courage on that account is scarcely less warranted than to deny all musical taste to one who cannot play upon the harpsichord. The position of our ingenious correspondent might be easily refuted by reference to the lives of poets, from Sir Philip Sidney on the field of Zutphen, down to Lamartine rejecting the drapeau rouge in the balcony of the Hotel de Ville. If with the Italian minstrel, as he addresses us through the translation of Lord Byron, we believe that

"Many are poets who have never penned Their inspiration," or adopt the idea that "heroes are but poets in action," we will see at once how unfortunate is this sweeping assertion. There are also some other positions of our gifted correspondent in which we do not accord with him, but we feel assured that his striking parallel between the ploughman and the peer will be read with interest, as well from the attractiveness of the subject as from the spirited manner in which it has been treated.—[*Ed. history with Homer, Virgil and Tasso any further than as tributary to their Poems. Milton, it is admitted, wrote prose: but it was prose that can hardly be distinguished from rhyme. The pursuits of Pope and Cowper were not mixed. The one sung all his life on the Thames, and the other on the Ouse. The same is true of Wordsworth, and for this reason, he has made better verses than Southey or Coleridge. Southey should have been an historian alone, and Coleridge nothing beyond a colloquial or professorial philosopher. With Shakespeare an absorption of all pursuits took place, save the one for which he was intended. It was as perfect as any modification that ever took place in rays of light, and left him like a rejoicing swan among the green fields and the woodlands of poetry. As a statesman he might have been equal perhaps to single-speech Hamilton, or as a soldier, he might have been a sort of Lieutenant Colonel to the Earl of Mar.

There are some points of discrepancy between Byron and Burns which deserve a statement. Adventitious circumstances exercise no slight control over the destinies of men, and the contrast of these men is more striking than the resemblance. The one was born on the banks of the Ayr, in a dilapidated hovel, and heavy work was the lot of his sire. One poor cow was fed at the door of the tenement, and one faithful dog guarded the premises at night. There were no lawns embellished by deer, or fields enlivened by picturesque flocks. There were feudal castles in Scotland, but they held other families than the one from which the poet rose. There were parks, but he was not their possessor. And yet that hovel was a hermitage above which the muses poised themselves when Burns was born, though he was heir to nothing but the sounds of a river—to the hawthorn bush—to clumps of the larch—and to the wild heather with its purple blossom. It is not necessary to say that Byron commenced life under different circumstances. He was of noble and Norman extraction—heir to a title—and owner at least prospectively of Newstead Abbey in the shire of Nottingham. That Abbey had stood for six hundred years, and was surrounded by historical and monkish legends. Burns represented a numerous, hard-working peasantry, and Byron a luxurious nobility. It is in vain to explain away the hardships of the one, or the chartered privileges of the other, because they were realities. Byron turned his heel indeed on the House of Lords, but he was tenacious of his title and he would rather have been born on the lap of Heraldry than in the mines of Peru. Byron had much to make him happy. His woes were of his own creation, for he was invincibly determined to be miserable, notwithstanding his splendid endowments. Burns ardently desired to be happy. He experienced many gleams of cheerfulness and resolved and re-resolved against habits adverse to his interests. But with him nothing seemed to prosper. Fortune seems to have committed him to the cells of her Inquisition. Rays of light fell on him for a time in Edinburgh; and Dugald Stuart, McKenzie and Blair were among those who were held in astonishment by his colloquial powers. But his country retransmitted him to the plough, when he ought to have been invested with some intellectual employment. The rugged toils of a farm were his portion, till his removal to Dumfries, and then he rode over the hills of Nithsdale as an exciseman. Under circumstances so appalling, his muse was still propitious. His poetry was a rich assemblage of blossoms and fruits: but they seemed to gush from the summit of a tree, all the limbs of which were trained in iron rings. The admirers of Byron have been anxious to give him the crown of a poetical martyrdom. They have tried to excite sympathy even for his poverty, though he married an heiress—got immense sums for his works—gave Moore four thousand pounds—received a hundred thousand from Col. Wildman, and supplied the Greeks with money to carry on a war. He went abroad when he pleased. He smoked his Turkish or Belgian pipe—lived in Italian cities, and was regaled by the spices of the Levant.

There were points of difference in the education of these surprising men. Sir Walter Scott has said, that the education of Burns was as good as that of one-half of the Scottish nobility. This may be true, but we look in vain for such a poet among the privileged orders of Scotland. If among them that amount of education has not given rise to any celebrated minstrel, the wonder is not diminished that it should have produced such an one from the peasantry. He received the bare elements of knowledge. He could read and write—had a smattering of French, and understood calculation to a limited extent. Various books fell in his way, which his mind immediately devoured. On such a basis his imagination commenced its operations, nurtured, however, by the external scenery of his country. The fir tree, the haw, the loch, the burn, the brae, the glen, the flood, the mountain, the stars, were his preceptors. Scotland was the hall in which nature read lectures to her fond and admiring pupil, not about the Pyramids of Egypt—the Chinese wall—the siege of Troy—or the adventures of Ulysses, but about her own secluded charms. He has described his own education in his Vision. Scotland, though barren, became to him a kind of Hesperian garden. He slew every dragon that opposed his entrance, and took off the golden fleece of poetry suspended upon the interior of her heather soil. How different was the training of the Newstead Bard. We doubt not that his education was irregular; but then he made it irregular by his own volition. He possessed every advantage which Harrow could afford* and was subsequently sent to one of the colleges in the University of Cambridge. He probably held in contempt the mental discipline to which many submit in that ancient and renowned University. Others besides Byron have spoken slightingly of Oxford and Cambridge. Milton appears never to have liked his college, and Gibbon always spoke coldly of Pembroke, but Dr. Johnson alleges that any youth who goes to either of those Universities must be inspired by the genius of the place. He spends his terms among all the associations which English Literature has it in its power to present from the days of Alfred to the present time. Their gates, and gardens—their groves, their streams and towers, are all haunted. Some cells return sound but once, but these antique grottoes of taste and letters, are always echoing back the names of a thousand illustrious men upon the ear of England. They claim the experiments of Newton—the discoveries of Lord Verulam—the investigations of Locke—the loud notes of Milton—the ethics of Johnson and the pictures of Addison. Byron must have derived advantage from Cambridge, even though he might have left it without being able to construct an equilateral triangle upon a given straight line. He could not have been indifferent to the collision of mind with mind—to the lectures of professors—to libraries, and to the classical reminiscences which rise in throngs by the Cam. A University might have ruined Burns; but it had no slight agency in creating Byron.

In looking over the poetry of the Scot, our attention is immediately struck by the home materials out of which it is wrought. He was appointed by the Muse of Coila and to that Muse his allegiance was undeviating. The vow of Hannibal was one of perpetual hostility to Rome. That of Burns was one of perpetual devotion to Scotland. He seems to have been shut up within her cardinal points—to have gazed on her eastern sun and western star, on her highland snows and her Nithdale flowers. He loved her brown clouds and misty skies, and her surface was to him a chequered floor on which he moved forward to the Mosaic temple of the muses. His subjects and imagery were local. The kirks,

* The contrast here, we must allow, the moors, the bridges, the straths, the traditions, the history, the rustic customs and the harvest moons of his native land were the themes which resounded from his cymbal. Painters have followed in his wake, and engravers have reduced into the captivity of their art every object he has described. But the materials of Byron were foreign and his pictures were remote as possible from being English. He abjured his country not only by withdrawing his person from the number of her peers, but in his poetry. Other bards had depicted the scenery of the Wye, the castles of the Thames, the groves of the Trent, and the downs of the Humber. They had penetrated the dales and stood on the hills of England. They had lingered among her ruins, and watched the foam of her coast. From Forest Hill, in the Shire of Oxford, Milton had sketched one of her rural prospects—the imagination of Shakespeare had revelled among her green saloons—Pope had waked his harp among the flocks and shades of Windsor. Cowper had moralised over her gardens—Southey had mused among her lakes—Crabbe had portrayed her boroughs—Montgomery had exposed her evils—Logan had marshalled barons on her plains, and Thomson had followed round the circle of her seasons, but Byron went abroad. He planted his foot on the soil of Greece—talked with its shepherds—denounced Lord Elgin, and embalmed its classic ruins. He was in all the cities of Italy—on the field of Waterloo—in the Mediterranean and Ægean—by the lake of Geneva—in the vale of Chamouni—at the base of Mont Blanc—along the Jura—among the castled steeps of the Rhine—on the Alps, and by the swift waters of the Rhone. Had England been a valley like the one which Dr. Johnson has stocked so abundantly with the means of happiness, Byron's restiff temperament would have driven him beyond its enclosures to survey those pyramids which nature has reared around Geneva and those cities and villas where humanity appeared to him in new and picturesque forms. There appears to have been something more fascinating to him in an Algerine pirate—or in Albanian robbers—or in Ægean corsairs than in the sedate habits of his countrymen. Scotland owes to Burns a debt which marble monuments cannot repay, for he increased the attachment of every peasant to her soil; but England owes Byron nothing, for the colors of his fine pencil were lavished on the glaciers of the Alps—on the clouds of Florence, and the myrtles of Greece.

The moral sense of Burns was probably superior to that of Byron though in correct moral principle they were both sad delinquents. It is painful to dwell on this part of their history.

Ideality is supposed always to imply a love of the fair and sublime in Nature. Why should its possessors be deficient in the sublime of morals? But both these men abused the finest powers with which two men ever were entrusted. It is disgusting to the last degree to read some of the letters of Byron, in which he deals out vulgar curses upon the quill with which they were written. His impiety was notorious. He recklessly violated many sacred obligations. He branded with opprobrium many men virtuous and enlightened. He lived in habits repulsive to all morals. He received good counsel only where it was mixed up with a due recognition of his talents. He infused scepticism into his Childe Harold, and ribaldry into his Cain. He expressed scorn for old Institutions. He wrote Hebrew Melodies, but their ultimate object was nothing more than the display of versatile talent. Burns, however, was a man comparatively innocent. He had a warm and grateful heart—he was not slow to acknowledge his faults—he is overwhelmed with grief at the death of Glencairn—he is kind as a husband, indulgent as a father, a generous brother and a constant friend. He threatens friendships with dissolution, but has no intention at the time of dissolving his social ties. He felt the charm of home, the pleasures of the fireside, and the endearments of domestic life. It is impossible that the Cotter's Saturday Night could ever have been written by a man who had never felt the propriety of devotion. An easy independence would have corrected most of his faults, and that independence Scotland ought to have bestowed. Poverty acted to him the part of a high pressure engine, and it reduced him to a wreck even on that tide of song which he made to flow on the rivers, and which had enriched the profoundest dells of his country.

As a satirist Byron was equal to Pope, but inferior to Churchill. Criticism was of great advantage to the young aspirant. His Hours of Idleness were probably a production which he had brought with him from Cambridge and having totally mistaken the politics of Byron, the Edinburgh Reviewers gave it a severe dressing. The castigation which he gave them in return was right, because there was real poetry in the work which they had criticised. Lord Brougham, Jeffrey and particularly the Rev. Sidney Smith, had become both presumptuous and conceited. There was something truly admirable in a mere stripling's coming forward to assail these formidable giants. He told them that with the leaves of their Review he should certainly light his Persian pipe, and nothing could better have expressed the depth of his scorn. Burns could not possibly have written so scorching and indignant a satire. He could not have been so dispassionately severe, nor could he so triumphantly have restored the balance of power which had been lost in the literary world. But under like circumstances he could have made his critics more ridiculous. He had a keener sense of the ludicrous than Byron. He discerned all the salient points of human character, and his humor was inimitable. Humor is one of the finest qualities a poet can possess. It was absent from Milton, for Carlyle has said with truth that all his attempts at wit and intellectual playfulness were elephantine.

Had Byron remained in England he could not possibly have done as much for South as Burns has done for North Britain. He would not have endeared the country so perfectly to its inhabitants. To have bought the best cottage in England would have promoted his happiness; but foreign sights were necessary to the enlargement of his genius. His descriptive power was immense, and could not have been confined to the dense beeches of England, its white roses, and its arboreta, nor could he have found there the grotesque objects which Burns found in the other half of the island. He could have had few sympathies in common with her shepherds, hedgers and weavers. It was well for his fame that he early fell in with an old Turkish History which operated on his mind like a talisman, and directed his views to Eastern subjects and gave rise to a succession of brilliant oriental tales. The translation of his mind, away from familiar scenes, threw a romance into his poetry which never fails to bewitch his readers. The lonely goat—the rustling herd—the church covered with moss—each Italian hermitage and each Turkish kiosk assume new hues as he lifts among them his tinted censer. And surely he was a profound ruler of the passions. He saw their operation on a much larger scale than Burns, living, as he did, where despotism was always in the ascendant. He had more breadth in his subjects than Burns, and a wider command of language; but he bordered much more on the rhetorical. The Scotch Bard was always true to Nature and passion. He never strains after words because of a love for the florid. His language is plain but as well suited to a prince as a peasant. He has had imitators; but their efforts have been relinquished as hopeless whilst the imitators of Byron are still warm with hope that they may one day rival their master.

The poems of Burns will probably be more durable than those of Byron, and permanency must always be a touchstone of merit. The Scottish dialect will make some productions of the former less popular abroad, but it cannot effect their popularity at home. The Scotch never can forget their bard so long as their country shall endure. They carry his works to the jungles and mangroves of the East, and bring them along to our own azure vallies: Their author could not help himself, for he was forced by necessity irresistible to be a poet. But Byron seems to have doubted whether mankind would continue to appreciate his writings. He wrote to Moore that Rogers, alone of all his contemporaries, would be remembered by posterity. "We are all Claudian," said he, "except the Banker;" but though Rogers be a banker we beg leave to protest this cheque on the admiration of the world. He is destitute of all invention—his sentiments are all common-place, and there is an absence of all vigor in his composition. Literary fame is very evanescent. The Faery Queen was as popular in its day as Childe Harold, and Goldsmith has now more readers than Milton, but the dramas of Shakespeare—the songs of Burns—the Traveller of Goldsmith—and the Pennsylvania tale of Campbell must live as long as England and Scotland exist—as the Alps shall rise or the Susquehannah roll. We must take men as we find them, but this paper would have been written with far greater pleasure if Byron and Burns had been as distinguished for morals as for intellect. Could they now speak, the one from his sepulchre along the Nith, and the other from his grave at Hucknall, we feel confident they would call on their readers to blot out some expressions which they have used and even to rend whole pictures from the galleries which they opened to the world.

doubt whether the lines above quoted had anything to do with the Epigram on Franklin. It was undoubtedly suggested by a passage in a Roman philosophical poem, the Astronomica of M. Manilius, a writer of doubtful age, but probably, judging by the purity of his language, and several other circumstances not necessary to mention, belonging to the Augustan age. This work was not completed: it is upon Astronomy—the stars and their influence upon human destinies—and is much more likely to have been familiar to a French Philosopher of the last century, than the Latinity of Milton. The passage I allude to is in the first book, and forms part of a description of the triumphs of human genius. I copy a few lines:

Omnia conando docilis sollertia vitit:
Nec prius imposuit rebus finemque manumque,
Quam coelum ascendit ratio, cepitque profundis
Natarum rerum causis, viditque quod usquam est;
Nubila cur tanto quaterentur pulsa fragore;
Hiberna aestiva nix grandine mollior esset,
Arderent terrae, solidusque tremisceret orbis,
Cur imbres ruerent, ventos quae causa moveret,
Pervidit; solvitque animis miracula rerum:
Eripuitque Jovi fulmen, viroque tonandi.

The last line is undoubtedly the original from which Turgot copied.

Yours very respectfully,

A REMONSTRANCE.

How couldst thou, poet, in whose full rich mine
Of lore proverbial, I have often wrought
And been repaid with sparkling gems of thought,
That lit by truth with changeful lustre shine;—
Oft have I paused, upon the glowing line,
Well pleased to see, with living bloom now fraught Blossoms, till then but embryo buds; or brought
A smouldering torch, to kindle at thy shrine—
How couldst thou, with such fancies villify
The Moon? What though scanned with too curious eye
Her face be rude, or marred with signs of pain,
Still on the roughest brow may goodness reign,
And her calm smile hath soothed the weary soul,
Since Eve's first grief, and will, while ages roll.

A LETTER FROM PROFESSOR FELTON.

TURGOT'S EPIGRAM ON FRANKLIN.

Cambridge, Feb. 10, 1849.

To the Editor of the Southern Literary Messenger.

In the very agreeable paper on Epigrams, in your January number, the famous line applied by Turgot to Franklin,

Eripuit coelo fulmen sceptrumque tyrannis, is said to be borrowed from Milton's epigram "in inventorem Bombardae," the last two lines of which are

"At mihi major erit, qui lurida creditur arma,
Et trifidum fulmen surripuisse Jovi."

I doubt whether Turgot had ever read Milton's Latin Poems, and if he had, I should equally

FROM OUR PARIS CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS, 4th January, 1849.

From time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, the week we have just traversed has possessed in Paris a peculiar and invariable physiognomy. It would require a revolution far more radical than that of February, a revolution changing the manners and customs of a people, to deprive the week that is past of the privilege that it enjoys of being the gayest and happiest of the year. The Republic with its frequent political crises, and its permanent financial and commercial embarrassments has left unimpaired the time-hallowed observances of le jour de l'an. New Year's day of 1849, like that of 1848, and like all New Year's days for centuries back, has been hailed with smiles by all ages, sexes and conditions. The universal occupation was the giving and receiving pleasure. Not in Paris only, but over all France, much more especially than with us, this season assumes the character of a great social fête. A beautiful idea seems to pervade and to have originally dictated all its observances—whether by accident or design will perhaps ever remain unknown—but in them may be traced, repeated in various forms, the idea of deference, respect and sympathy of the strong for the weak, of the high for the low, of the superior for the dependent. Power would seem on this occasion to forego the exercise of the privileges accorded to it, to devote itself, throughout all the departments of social life, to the benevolent office of causing weakness to forget, and for one day, even rejoice in its inferiority. It is eminently the day on which the gentler sex receives the homage of ours. Woman, of all classes, from the highest to the lowest, as wife, daughter, sister, mistress, friend, expects the prodigal profession, more or less sincere, of kindness and devotion, accompanied, according to the means and station in life of the donor, with some complimentary offering, the index of his taste, the visible expression of his regard. The gentleman who fails in this, or who fails to make his visits of felicitation, or leave his card for all the ladies of his acquaintance, is writ down as a demi-civilized boor, neglectful of the plainest conveniences, and is punished by rigorous exclusion from the salon during the coming year.

Children, too, even more eagerly than with us welcome the first as the pleasantest day of the year. Bon-bons, and toys, and release from the prison of boarding-schools, to which they are condemned during the rest of the year, visiting home only once a month, though their parents may reside but the distance of a square, await them at this season. Father, mother, and friends of both sexes now contribute zealously to the enjoyment of children. Presents pour in upon them: and if the weather permit, the boulevards, the gardens, and all places of public amusement become radiant with their rosy faces, and noisy with their sports.

All the servants of a family, in addition to their stipulated wages, expect from their master presents upon the arrival of New Year. It is looked upon by both sides as a matter of course. It is taken into consideration before entering upon service: and places are more or less sought after by domestics according as families have reputation for generosity in the matter of periodical étrennes.

Nor must any inferior by whom you have been served during the past year be forgotten. Your facteur, (the penny-post man,) some eight or ten days before the 1st of January, will present himself to you with a printed calendar for the coming year, pasted on both sides of a bit of paste-board. It is perhaps the only time during the year that you have seen the facteur's smiling face; but your letters and papers have always been left by him at the lodge of the portier below. His calendar is worth two or three sous. You are expected to pay for it as many francs. Then follow the persons who daily bring you water and bread and milk, the garçons of the restaurant where you habitually dine, the dame du comptoir of your reading-room, the conducteurs of omnibusses, and last and most important of all, your portier or concierge. This is the domestic functionary, who from his loge, situated usually on the ground floor, near the outer door of your house, exercises a sort of charge over the whole establishment. He watches all the outgoings and incomings, keeps the key of your rooms when you are absent, and receives letters, papers, writing cards and messages that may be left for you. It is he who, if you enter after dark, answers to your rap or ring: and if you have occasion to go out, it is he who promptly, by means of a cord communicating with the lodge, opens the street door to facilitate your egress. That is, he promptly opens the door, if, in passing the lodge, you solicit his ministry, whether he sees you or not, by the words "Cordon! s'il vous plait." But beware of omitting the s'il vous plait, or the jealous Cerberus will punish the incivility by compelling you to wait a minute in the cold, or call in vain till the required appendix shall be added. Woe to the frightful or economical locataire who omits the customary New Year's offering to the portier. He is a power that must be propitiated. One would be tempted to believe the class, portiers, to be under the special protection of the gods, so manifold are the purely accidental mishaps and annoyances which are sure to follow inattention to its members. A smiling face, a courteous phrase, with ten, fifteen or twenty francs for the porteur is one of the most judicious investments a Parisian can make at the commencement of the year. He had better, if need be, dine scantily for a week and thus economize a fund for the discharge of this annual tribute.

Well, in spite of the Republic, of the hard times and of the dolorous faces which all classes have worn, more or less, during the year which has just closed, all customary demands upon the purses and consciences of the Parisians have been duly and satisfactorily paid. I have never seen New Year's day pass more brilliantly. For a month or six weeks previously, industry and ingenuity were taxed for the production of the various articles to serve as presents. This gave great activity to almost every branch, especially of ornamental industry. About the middle of December, the exhibition of the objects began to be noticed. The papers teemed with advertisements, and the shop windows blazed with the tempting articles, of rare beauty and rare price, arranged with a taste and an effect peculiarly French. It is one of the most popular amusements of the capital during the last two weeks of the year, to stroll, especially at night, upon the boulevards, and along the principal streets, stopping every two minutes, to gaze at the beautiful and costly objects exposed in the shop windows. On the 1st January and the three previous days, the side-walks of the boulevards, from the Madeleine to the Porte St. Denis, are occupied with the innumerable portable shops of the petty mar-chands. They are devoted chiefly to the sale of cheap objects for children, containing every imaginable trinket and toy for the amusement of both boys and girls from one to fifteen years of age. During these days, from ten in the morning till ten at night, this portion of Paris exhibits an extremely animated and interesting appearance. It is like an immense fair. Infant France seems all there. Conducted by their fathers, their male friends, or their bonnes, they surround the shops in noisy groups, and select their purchases. There marches a little fellow six years of age, holding his father's hand, and fitted out with a complete uniform of the National Guard; here comes another, or a guard Mobile. You feel something jostle your knee, and looking down, perceive a charmingly attired little girl, her face beaming with delight, tottering along beside her bonne, with a smartly dressed doll under each arm. Here a little trumpeter cracks your ears with his dissonant instrument, and there a little drummer amuses the beholders by the earnestness and industry with which he traverses the boulevards beating the rappel. Nothing gives me more satisfaction than to see happy children: and no where can I be more certain of the enjoyment, than upon the boulevards of Paris during the last three and the first days of each year.

The new President of the Republic, Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, continues the imperial and royal custom of grand state receptions upon New Year's day. But he dispensed upon this occasion with the usual addresses.

Before dismissing the subject of the New Year I must not fail to notice another custom which prevails here, and which for aught I know is peculiar to France. The milk-man, baker, butcher, grocer, and other tradesmen, who have furnished you with necessaries during the year, are bound by custom to make you a present at this season. The one offers butter, or a fine cheese, another a few pounds of flour, the grocer a loaf of sugar perhaps, the butcher something in his line. These presents, in families where there are servants, usually form part of their perquisites; where there are no servants, and among the lower orders, they are accepted, and enter into the family consumption. They are intended in theory as a sort of grateful acknowledgment for the preference shown to themselves over other tradesmen, and as an inducement to continuance. They may in fact be justly considered by the recipients as a partial compensation for the systematic petty cheating to which they have been subjected during the year, and from which the tradesmen have reaped profits much greater in amount than the aggregate value of their presents. I allude to the practice of adulterating coffee and wine, moistening salt, short weights, and heavy paper bags in which articles bought are placed to be weighed. These tricks are not perhaps peculiar to France; but they are practised in Paris, very generally, and to a villainous extent. During my residence here I have paid many a franc, for heavy paper bags, in which custom permits sugar, coffee, tea, &c., to be placed before weighing. Sand is often found artfully insinuated in the pasted bottom; and the abominable stuff is unfit even to kindle the fire—for it will not flame.

One of the most interesting incidents of the 1st January, out of the usual course, was the complimentary visit made to Louis Napoleon Bonaparte by the old soldiers of the Hotel des Invalides. Most of those who have found a retreat and quiet for their remaining days in this grand national establishment are veterans of the Empire, in whose memory the Emperor and the glories of the Empire are cherished with religious veneration. It is curious and interesting to the visitors of the Invalides to notice the thousand ingenious forms by which they have managed, each in his own little dormitory and garden, to perpetuate those souvenirs with which is associated so much of their own past, in the contemplation of which is consumed nearly all their present. They have preserved, in most cases, their old uniforms and weapons; in which they love to appear, the marvel and the gaze of Paris upon one or two remarkable anniversaries connected with the Emperor. The most important of these is that of the day upon which the remains of Napoleon, brought back from St. Helena, were committed to the care of the veterans of the Imperial armies, and deposited beneath the dome of the Invalides. It was not their custom to honor Louis Philippe with a complimentary visit on New Year's day. Perhaps no other than the actual President of the Republic would have been thus honored: but how could these old crippled, mutilated, tottering remnants of Napoleon's glorious armies refrain from welcoming his nephew and heir to the chair of Chief Executive Magistrate of the State; which some believe and many hope will ere long be converted into a throne! It was not to be thought of. Many of them, therefore, uniting with others, their brothers in arms, resident in Paris, but not belonging to the Invalides, clothed in the brilliant, but antiquated uniforms of olden times, met and forming in order their motley ranks, proceeded along the principal thoroughfares with music at their head to the palace in the rue Faubourg St. Honoré, formerly Elysée Bourbon, (now Elysée National,) which by decree of the National Assembly has been assigned as the Presidential mansion in Paris. It caused a melancholy smile and made one moralize in spite of himself to see those shrivelled faces beneath the heavy casque, and those shrunken figures tottering in the gaudy uniforms that loosely flapped about their emaciated limbs. Forty years ago, in the flush of youth and health, how well they filled those uniforms and how proudly they bore those flashing casques over a hundred battle-fields! The veterans carried, to be offered to the President, an immense basket of flowers. A cordial reception awaited them from the President, who accepted with many thanks their New Year's offering. The Presidential mansion is a small palace in comparison with many others belonging to the State, but it is illustrated by some interesting historical souvenirs. It was built about one hundred and twenty years ago and afterwards became the property and residence of Madame de Pompadour. In 1804 it was purchased by Murat, who occupied it till his departure for Naples. It then became a favorite residence of the Emperor himself. It was his residence during the Hundred Days and was the last palace he occupied in France. In 1814 and 1815 it was inhabited by the Emperor of Russia and the Duke of Wellington. But Louis Napoleon is a bachelor, and it has been for some time past an interesting subject of speculation among quidnuncs, to determine who would be selected by him to do the honors of a splendid palace converted into the residence of a Republican President. The most current on dit upon the subject is that provisionally, until the President shall have chosen his companion for life, the favored lady is to be the Grand Duchess of Baden Stephanie, cousin of Queen Hortense, the President's mother. By the way, though we pretend to be in full republic here, it is to be remarked that the new President is never called M. Bonaparte. He is always alluded to in the journals, and in conversation, either simply as Louis Napoleon, or with the rather un-republican adjunct of Prince. In the returns of the elections, published lately by the papers, he was generally called by the single name of Napoleon. I merely mention this as one indication of the tendency which I think politics are taking in France, and which I have sufficiently signalled in previous letters. Before dismissing the Napoleon family, let me note en passant, that Jerome Bonaparte, the sole surviving brother of the Emperor, has just been installed in office as Governor of the Invalides, in place of the illustrious Marshal Molitor, who has been appointed chief of the Legion of Honor, with the title of Grand Chancellor of that Order. The appointment of Jerome was one of the first acts of the new President. It was made at the special instance of the Council of Ministers. Napoleon Bonaparte, a young man of twenty-five, son of Jerome, already a member of the National Assembly, was generally designated as ambassador of the Republic at London, soon to be nominated in place of M. G. de Beaumont resigned. But the intention has been abandoned, and Admiral Cecille is to go. A son of Marshal Ney is to go to Russia in a similar capacity. Another Bonaparte, a mere youth, son of Lucien, and named after him, has arrived in Paris to take his seat in the Assembly as representative just chosen from Corsica. We have now in the Assembly five nephews of the Emperor—a son of Louis, a son of Jerome, two sons of Lucien and a Murat, son of his sister Caroline. The other day large crowds were stationed in front of a tailor's shop in rue Vivienne, where appeared on the sign—"P——, tailor to His Imperial Highness, Prince Louis Napoleon." The sign seemed to excite more amusement than indignation; but it was soon removed.

About two months since the friends of Literature, the Arts and Sciences in France were thrown into utter dismay by the report of the Committee of Finances in the Assembly. It recommended the most sweeping reductions with regard to the appropriations made under the monarchy, the empire, and even under the former Republic, for the support of the National Institutions to which France owes so much of her glory among nations. Nothing escaped the Vandalic sword of the Financial Committee. The fund for the support of promising young artists in Rome, while perfecting themselves by the study of the masterpieces contained in its illustrious museums, a fund already too small, was to be fatally cut down. This school of Rome, dated from Louis XIV. and Colbert. The famous Conservatory of Music, a grand creation of the first Republic, was menaced with a notable diminution of its annual resources. The Republic of 1796 gave 25,000 francs; that of 1848 was to give 15,000. The Public Libraries, the Theatres, the Museums, Literary pensions, various funds for the encouragement of Literature and the Arts, by the distribution of prizes and the purchase for the State of fine paintings and statues, all came in for a share. It was loudly proclaimed that the French Republic, after refusing to imitate the great American Republic in several particulars, which form the glory, the strength, and the wisdom of its political Constitution, was about fatally to imitate that Republic in its debasing devotion to mere material interests. It was about to sacrifice by one fell blow, artists, painters, musicians, savans, poets—in one word, all that constitutes the intellectual glory of France: and set up as a god for exclusive worship—the Dollar! A member of the Mountain in 1793, when signing the death-warrant of an illustrious savant, facetiously remarked, "la Republique n'a pas besoin de savans." It was to be feared that there were too many in the Assembly of 1848 of the same opinion. It was time for the friends of the "Intellectual glory of France" to bestir themselves, for the budget of '49 was under discussion, and the order of the day for the reductions in question was close at hand. The Institute, the Academies, and the numerous associations of men of letters were all on the alert. The lobbies of the National Assembly swarmed with their members, and the journals teemed with their protests and exposés. But don't suppose, though it was a money question which produced all this excitement, a money question too upon the decision of which many of them were dependent for their daily bread, that this fact had the slightest effect in quickening their literary and scientific zeal. Could the generous, patriotic and magnanimous soul of a Frenchman give entrance for an instant to the worship of the Dollar! Was it not American breasts only which were accessible to such ignoble considerations! In the Assembly the proposed reductions were opposed by several of the most distinguished orators, especially by Mons. Dupin and Victor Hugo. The latter made what Frenchmen call un discours magnifique. After Lamartine, he is the finest phrase-maker of the House. "The grand error of late years," says Victor Hugo, "has been to bend men to the search of the material well-being and turn them from the pursuit of the religious and intellectual well-being. The fault is the greater, inasmuch as material well-being can never be possessed but by the few; while intellectual and religious well-being may be imparted to all. It is all important, gentlemen, to remedy this evil. The spirit of man must be made straight again. The spirit of man must be raised up, and must be turned toward God, toward conscience, toward the Beautiful, the Just, the Unselfish, the Grand." A material and practical American would suggest to M. Victor Hugo that the grand misfortune of late and former years in France has been to theorize charmingly and talk magnificently, but to practise very imperfectly. It is doubtless very fine, this raising up the spirit of man and directing it to the Beautiful, the Just, the Unselfish, the Grand—teaching it to despise vile material interests as of the earth, earthy. But a material and practical American would suggest that material well-being must precede religious and intellectual well-being. It is this which fits man to be their recipient. A man whose bowels are pinched with hunger, whose limbs are shivering with cold, is hardly in the fittest state to profit by, or relish the reading of, twenty pages of Burke's essay upon "the Sublime and Beautiful." We may venture a doubt whether a man in such a situation would not prefer a dinner and a blanket, even to an hour's loan of Victor Hugo's "Notre Dame de Paris," or of Chateaubriand's "Martyrs." Now what is this "material well-being" the pursuit of which is so derided by the magniloquent Frenchman, but the possession and the assured possession of dinner and a blanket? Let him assure to the ill-fed and ill-clothed millions of his own countrymen a sufficiency of this despised material well-being to make existence cease to be for them a curse, and then, but not till then, may he hope that after some centuries of amelioration the mass of Frenchmen may perhaps arrive at the degree of "intellectual and religious well-being" actually enjoyed by the masses in the United States. At the conclusion of his harangue, M. V. Hugo, turning to the authors of the proposed reductions, thus addressed them: "I have but one word more to say to you. You have fallen into a most deplorable error. You supposed yourselves to be economizing money. You have economized glory. I reject these economies for the dignity of France, for the honor of the Republic." This was an unanswerable view of the question. The generous Frenchmen cannot hesitate between glory and material well-being. In fine the reductions proposed by the grovelling committee of Finances were rejected, and the whole tribe of lately disquieted worshippers of the Beautiful, the Just, the Unselfish, and the Grand, remain in possession of undiminished salaries, sinecures and pensions.

In the belief doubtless that Louis Philippe's "material well-being" was otherwise sufficiently provided for, or if not, that he ought, as a true Frenchman, to despise it, government has determined to appropriate a portion of the Palais Royal, (now called Palais National, and forming a portion of the private property of the ex-king,) to the exhibition of the works of living artists in painting and sculpture. The necessary changes in the disposition of the apartments are to be immediately effected, so that the exhibition may be opened early in March. Tickets of admission will not be gratuitous, but they will give chances in a lottery for the works exhibited. The receipts are to be applied to the relief of distressed artists.

There are two exhibitions now open at the Palais des Beaux Arts: one is of sculptors contending for the honor of executing for the State a symbolical figure representing the Republic of 1848. There are ten competitors. The works are in plaster, colossal female figures. One only is represented sitting. Nine are standing in various positions, variously attired, with various symbolical adjuncts. My favorite is one which represents the Republic as a female of commanding form in a flowing robe. The head is slightly raised; the Grecian face is of calm, dignified, serene expression. The right hand is extended over a bee-hive and various ripe fruits at her feet, intimating that industry and agriculture are the grand interests of a State, and that the Republic should ever afford them protection. The other exhibition, opened in another part of the same Palace, is for the competitors for the honor and emolument of constructing in Notre Dame a monument in memory of the late Archbishop of Paris, slain upon the barricades of June last while in the execution of a mission of peace, endeavoring to stay the fratricidal strife. I counted forty-three competitors for the melancholy office. Thirty-seven of the models are miniature constructions in plaster—the rest are drawings. Some are servile imitations of monuments which abound in the French and Italian churches. Others evince originality, invention, and taste. Both these exhibitions are daily visited by numerous persons of both sexes.

A remarkable report of M. Malgaigne, and several deplorable cases in which the use of chloroform has been accompanied with fatal consequences, have caused recently serious doubts to arise in the minds of the faculty of Paris as to the propriety of continuing the use of this agent for facilitation of surgical operations. The Academy of Medicine is now formally discussing these questions:

Is there real danger always accompanying the use of chloroform?

What is the amount and character of this danger?

What are the means, if any, by which the danger may be removed or avoided?

I shall not fail to notice and communicate the result of this discussion so important to suffering humanity. The deliberate and formal decision of the French Academy of Medicine may be almost considered as settling the question.

Perhaps the following information extracted from a medical work, just published, upon the actual state of the profession in Paris, will not be uninteresting to your readers. The number of students actually inscribed upon the books of the Faculty in Paris is 950. Of these 272 date their first inscription from 1848: and 230 have undergone their examination for the Doctorate. The number of admissions to practice which annually increased from 1826, when it was 215, to 1837, when it was 431, has since that epoch constantly diminished, till in 1846, it had fallen to 211. This diminution is attributed to the overcharged state of the rolls of the profession.

There are in Paris 1380 doctors—166 health officers—385 midwives. The number of doctors is 53 less than in January 1847. The profession has supplied a notable share of politicians to the Republic. Among its members who have seats in the National Assembly have been found 1 President of the Assembly, M. Buchez, and 3 Ministers, MM. Recurt, Trelat and Bixio.

Among the accidental on-dits of the day is one averring the intended return to Paris of M. Guizot, the illustrious author, and the last Prime Minister of Louis Philippe. The fact would not be at all suprising. It has been determined that there were no grounds to prosecute the impeachment of himself with his colleagues, which to satisfy popular passion was ordered in the first heat of the revolution. His personal safety would not be at all jeopardied by his reappearance in Paris. His return it is said, will be simultaneous with the publication of a new work from his pen entitled Democracy in France. Perhaps he will reopen at the Sorbonne his course of lectures upon the History of Civilization. His name has been constantly published as titular occupant of that chair: though during his premiership he ceased to lecture, the course being continued by a substitute. M. Guizot would not indeed be prevented by any rigidity of principle from giving the aid of his eminent capacity, and the light of his experience, to the actual government of France, or any other, of whatever color, which events may usher in. M. Guizot has no political prudery. During the whole of his long and active career, the promptness with which he has observed the changes of the political vane, and the alacrity with which he has put himself in movement in the direction indicated, are historical. Under the last dynasty he evinced an elasticity of conscience, a wily ability, a leaden immobility of soul and face, in front of proven charges of duplicity and corruption, that eminently qualify him to take a leading part in the political changes which are preparing in this country. The history of the Spanish marriages alone is sufficient to erase M. Guizot's name from the list of loyal, truthful, honest men. This is a severe sentence. But I write it deliberately.

One of the statistical tables published at the commencement of the year, gives the movement of the French press during the last 12 months. The number of works in all languages, dead and living, issued from the press during the year, is 7,234. Lithographic and other engravings 1,055. The most remarkable activity has been noticed in journalism. A perfect swarm of ephemeral newspapers, most pestilent productions, pounced upon and almost devoured society. French talent for caricature, never wanting to the occasion, and to which in truth the occasion is never wanting, has been wonderfully prolific this year. Every day produces its funny lithograph, the success of which is attested by the laughing crowds stationed in front of the print-shops. All parties, all principles, all classes supply the subjects. Nothing is too high, too low, or too sacred for their attacks. Caricaturing, like journalism has been carried to most mischievous excess. The law of libel should be invoked to the aid of society and individuals.

Since the date of my last, I have attended en flaneur several of the democratic and socialist banquets. During the last two months the concurrence of women in these political demonstrations has taken a notable extension. They exceed the men in the violence of their language and the ultraism of their measures. These meetings are usually held just outside one of the barriers or gates of the city, because, I suppose, they are less exposed to the surveillance of the police, and because the wine and other constituents of the banquet are there exempt from the heavy octroi duty levied upon all articles of consumption which pass the city gates. At these banquets every thing passes in perfect order as much, perhaps more so than in the United States. Subscription tickets usually cost from one to three francs. At the appointed hour the company begins to collect. Tickets are asked for at the door. They are examined, one corner torn off, and then they are returned to the bearers. The company, male and female, pass into a long room unfurnished, or supplied only with seats. Here animated conversation occupies the guests for an hour or two, till all who expected have arrived and the table is spread in an adjoining room. Eight or ten functionaries, distinguished by a tri-colored band about the arm, are charged with the disposition of affairs and the maintenance of order. One of them is stationed at the door and receives the tickets of the guests as they pass, when the word is given from the salle of meeting to that of dining. Others assign to guests as they enter the hall their seats at the table. The whole passes quietly, and in due season all are seated at the tables which occupy in three or four rows the whole length of the room. Printed in large characters and pasted up at regular intervals on the walls of the dining room appear the names of the most distinguished leaders, French and foreign, of the universal democratic and social republic—Ledru Rollin, Raspail, Blanqui, Cabet, Barbés, Louis Blanc of France: Blum, Messénhauser of Germany: Smith O'Brien, &c., of Ireland. At one end of the room is erected, about the height of the table, a stage, upon which are placed a table and chairs. This stage serves as tribune for all who speak, or who give toasts, and is occupied by the President and Secretaries of the day. None is allowed to speak or give a toast who has not previously registered his name at the bureau of the President. The President calls each in his order and introduces him to the company. The speeches and toasts are usually read; few trusting to their powers of extempore speaking. The women sit at the table promiscuously with the men and are quite as noisy in their demonstrations of approbation provoked by the speeches or toasts. These commence as soon as the banqueters are seated at the table. As for the tables themselves they are covered with clean white cloths and spread as are tables in our large hotels. The bill of fare is not very various or abundant. A bottle of wine and a loaf of bread is before each plate. In each plate is a slice of cold meat. Plates of cheese are scattered up and down the table. This is all soon disposed of. No new supplies are furnished: and the guests have nothing to do afterwards but listen to the speeches, toasts, &c., which reach them from the tribune. The performances are varied by occasional recitations of poetry written for the occasion, and songs solo, or in society. The guests join heartily in the chorus. But the women of France though they are so manfully asserting their right to a share in the liberty, equality and fraternity proclaimed in February, do not yet feel themselves sufficiently strong to walk quite alone. So they rejoice in the leadership of a priest, one Abbé Chatel. It was this worthy priest under whose special auspices, aided by several other abbés, one of these female banquets took place. One Madame Constant concluded a half sheet of incomprehensible politico-religious jargon with the very comprehensible toast—"Vive la République démocratique et sociale! Vive Raspail! Vive l'abbé Chatel!" and took her seat with loud applause. The worthy abbé Chatel, President, after waiting a moment asked if no one else wished to speak. "Don't be afraid," said he, "don't try to be eloquent—good sentiments come promptly from the heart." After a short apparent struggle, a fine looking young woman, seemingly about twenty-five years of age, rose and by a violent effort of the will proceeded to the tribune. This was Madame Come. Her discourse was short and sweet—you shall judge.

"To the brave and incorruptible Lagrange! To him whom we should all love! To the amnesty which he has demanded and is demanding so generously and perseveringly! He will obtain it! Be sure of it! They must give it to him—they must! If with all his devotion and entreaty Lagrange does not obtain the amnesty, he will demand it musket in hand!" This was a perfectly extempore effort on the part of the oratrix, and she took her seat in the midst of overwhelming applause. The pacific abbé who had provoked this eruption of "good sentiment," thought the specimen un peu trop fort. He therefore said in excuse of the fair speaker, that one did not always mean all one said; in the ardor of speaking Madame Come had doubtless gone a little too far. But the gentle dame did not mean to be misunderstood or misrepresented. So she again mounted the tribune: "I did not mean to say," she explained, "that Lagrange would take his musket, but that we, if after our petitions our brothers were not restored to us, we would act. I am not a man!—but no matter—I maintain, if they pay no attention to our petitions and entreaties, that we ought to resort to grand means! and I promise you that I will not be the last!"

M. Riboulet, described as minister of the French church, gave as a toast, "Universal Fraternity!" The reverend abbé who presided gave as his toast, "To Jesus Christ, the Grand Apostle of Socialism!" Another toast was, "To France, the living Christ of Nations!" But enough, and too much, of this impious blasphemy. I will not shock your readers by its continued recital. Thus much, however, was necessary in order to give an idea of the true character of this unseasonable appearance of women upon the public stage, which is one of the features of the times. The females who frequent and take part in these meetings, who have established newspapers, who have formed and still maintain political and social public clubs, are not as you may well suppose of the higher classes in society; nor are they of the lowest. Such of them as I have seen are well dressed, of good manners, and apparently in easy circumstances. The better portion of the press is unanimous in condemning their course: and the ablest man among the democratic republicans themselves, M. Proudhon, he who has immortalized himself by his famous proposition, "Property is Theft!" condemns these political women in round terms in his journal Le Peuple.

France has at last adopted the low uniform postage system. It went into operation on the first instant. Four sous is now the tax all over France, irrespective of distance. Postage stamps similar to those used in England for prepaying postage are sold by government in any quantity desired, only instead of Victoria's head, they bear the impress of that of Liberty. Why is not this convenient mode of paying postage introduced into the United States?*

Petitions are pressing in upon the National Assembly from all the departments, urging a dissolution of that body and a speedy convocation of the Legislative Assembly contemplated by the Constitution. Sometimes they are addressed to their own representatives and assume almost the form of a peremptory summons to resign. The Assembly will hardly be able to resist this extreme pressure. The committees are examining a resolution submitted by a member to adjourn sine die on the 19th March, and appoint the elections for the Legislature to take place on the 4th March. They will probably be compelled, by public opinion, daily becoming more clamorous, to leave to their successors the elaboration of what they style the organic laws.

In the mean time industry is resuming every where its spring, and confidence is reviving. The red republicans and socialists bluster, but they are no longer dangerous. The bourgeoisie know this and are beginning to wear smiling faces again. The gaiety of the season has commenced with something like former animation. The grand hotels of the Faubourg St. Germain and the splendid modern saloons of the fashionable boulevards are nightly lighted and filled with brilliant company. The opera gives its first masked ball of the season on Saturday night next, or rather on Sunday morning, for the doors are not opened till the clock strikes twelve. I shall make the description of one of these balls form the burden of one of my future letters.

Lola Montes, the famous dancing girl, who of late years has been one of the public characters of Europe, has, it seems, been driven from the continent and taken refuge in England. While her baggage was undergoing the necessary examination in the long room of the custom-house, she entered her name as Marie Comtesse de Landsfeld. She took good care not to touch Paris in her passage. She would doubtless prefer this residence to any other in the world, but circumstances prevent it. She would have some unpleasant accounts to settle here. Marie Comtesse de Landsfeld would have to pay for certain pranks of Lola, which the former no doubt has forgotten, but of which many merchants guard upon their books the sad memorials.

Mr. Hoe has arrived in Paris from New York with one of his new printing presses, the operation of which is anticipated with much interest by the Parisian press. It is being put up and will exhibit its powers the latter part of this month.

* PARIS, January 25, 1849.

One of the most interesting events which have taken place in the literary world since the date of my last, has been the election of a successor to the chair of Chateaubriand in the French Academy. This branch of the Institute of France consists of forty members chosen for life. Vacancies are filled by ballot of the surviving members soon after the death of any of their number. But these nominations, previous to the late revolution, were subject to the approval of the king. The French Academy was instituted by Cardinal Richelieu, minister of Louis XIII. in the year 1635. Its mission was declared to be, to "establish certain rules for the language, and render the French tongue not only elegant, but capable of treating all the arts and all the sciences." Such is still its mission. It is specially charged with

* Owing to the irregularity of the Ocean Steamers, as seen in their recent arrivals, we are compelled in this number to assign our Paris correspondent a larger space than he usually fills, or to postpone the publication of his last letter for a month. We do not hesitate a moment to adopt the former alternative, feeling assured that our readers will be amply compensated for lack of variety in articles, in the abundant variety of agreeable news which our correspondent so pleasantly discuses. We have been gratified to perceive that his letters have excited everywhere a decided sensation, both for the justness of their political reflections and the vivacity with which they present the gossip and glitter of the French metropolis. Hereafter we hope to receive his budget with more punctuality.

the composition of a French Dictionary, called "The Dictionary of the Academy," of which it causes an improved edition to be periodically published.

There were several candidates for the honor of occupying the chair No. 6 in the Academy, just vacated by the death of Chateaubriand.

M. de Balzac, the celebrated writer, aspired to the honor of adding a second of his name to the Academy's learned list. One of the original members elected in 1635 was Jean L. G. de Balzac. But the de Balzac of 1849, who was at it were the republican candidate, was not destined to succeed. He deserves to be, and, perhaps, will be more fortunate upon some future occasion. Several of the papers are very severe upon the soi-disant republican Lamartine for having preferred to the popular Balzac, M. le Duc de Noailles, ex-Peer of France and author of a "History of Madame de Maintenon." This latter personage was elected, having received 25 of the 31 votes given in.

It is threatened in view of this result to apply the democratic principle to the elections of the Academy, to proclaim universal suffrage in Literature as well as Politics, and cause their nominations to be made by the direct vote of all French writers instead of the aristocratic forty, who write themselves members of the Academy.

Le peuple des Lettres!

"C'est une belle idée!" says one.

"But is it practicable?" says a second, who retains a little common sense.

Another branch of the Institute of France, the Academy of Sciences, has recently chosen as one of its eight foreign associates, Dr. David Brewster of Edinburgh. Dr. Brewster well deserved this honor. From 1817, when he invented or revived the Kalidoscope, to the present time, this distinguished Savant has contributed as much as any other man to the march of Science. The title of foreign associate of the French Academy of Sciences, is the highest and most coveted honor that can be conferred upon foreign scientific men. It is only accorded to most eminent merit, upon the recommendation of a committee of five. The eight elected are deemed the eight most distinguished scientific men of the world out of France. M. Arago was upon this occasion chairman of the committee of five: and Dr. Brewster was elected by an overwhelming majority. Among the foreign associates are Mr. Faraday and Mr. Brown. The Academy of Sciences is composed of sixty-five members, ten free academicians, and the eight foreign associates.

The members of all the five Academies composing the Institute, receive a salary of 1,500 francs ($300.)

Certain of the French Savants were disposed to reject the accounts forwarded by M. Matteucci, touching the marvellous effects produced upon the electric telegraph of Pisa by the Aurora Borealis of 17 November last. M. Leverrier has just communicated to the Academy of Sciences the following letter from Mr. Higton, telegraphic engineer of the London and North-western Railway.

"Our telegraph was affected by the Aurora Borealis of the 17 November. A telegraph passing through the Watford tunnel (a tunnel a mile long) and the wires of which are prolonged beyond a quarter of a mile on one side, and a half mile on the other, was rendered unfit for use during three hours. The magnet was constantly rejected from the same side. Such action of the Aurora Borealis is common. It is sometimes observable during the day when the Aurora is not visible: and in one instance, I was able to trace its action from Northampton, through Sheapstone and Peterborough upon the line of the Eastern telegraph to London."

The scientific and commercial world of France has been much interested recently by experiments made in England, proving the possibility of connecting London and Paris by means of an electric telegraph, the wires of which shall be extended across the channel between Dover and Calais, or Folkestone and Boulogne, and lie upon the bottom of the sea. The experiments were made in the harbor of Folkestone, and are of such a nature as to put the question of practicability almost at rest. No reason can be conceived why the same results should not be obtained with a submarine wire thirty miles long, which have been obtained with one two miles long. The chief difficulty apprehended is in guaranteeing the wire against being cut by the teeth of large fish, or displaced and broken by the anchors of vessels. It is proposed to provide against these accidents, which, perhaps, cannot be prevented, by disposing several lines of wires at certain distances from each other. It is not likely that all will be out of order at the same time: and one may be used while another is being repaired.

But science will prove the possibility of placing London and Paris in instant communication with each other, long before the government of France will abandon the unworthy narrow policy of restriction and monopoly, which has characterized the Republic no less than the Monarchy.

The government has systematically opposed the establishment of the electric telegraph on the lines of the rail roads, except upon conditions so burdensome that it would be folly to undertake them. The Rouen Company, however, went to the expense, and put up its telegraph, but has been compelled to abandon the use of it.

It is strange that France, which pretends to be at the head of nations, should be so late to perceive the advantages social and commercial which flow from this invention—advantages which England and the United States are already largely enjoying. But she will have to yield sooner or later, and open to unrestricted electro-telegraphic communication all parts of her territory and all her great national interests, public and private, social, commercial, and political. The electric telegraph is one of the great acquired facts of the nineteenth century: and the next century will only differ from this in its universal and more perfect application.

Several great events—great to the pleasure-seeking population of this capital—have signalized the last ten days.

These events are, the return of Rachel to the boards of the French theatre; the first of the annual concerts of the society of the Conservatoire, the re-opening of the Italian opera, a new ballet, Le Violon du Diable at the French opera, and the grand concert-ball of the Jardin d' Hiver.

This last was a magnificent affair, the most splendid and attractive ball of the season. It was gotten up for the benefit of the poor of Paris, in the admirable local of the Jardin d' Hiver (winter garden) on the Champs Elysées. The Jardin d' Hiver is an immense hot-house, the roof and the sides of which are of glass. It is meant for the deposit and preservation, during the cold season, of rare flowers and plants in Paris and its vicinity. It is high enough for tall trees and spacious enough to contain in infinite number the rare and beautiful exotics, for whose accommodation it is destined. They are there in wonderful profusion, and are arranged with French taste and with magical effect.

And yet there is room.

Grass plats and banks of freshest flowers and gushing fountains, throwing high their crystal columns, gladden the eye and ear.

Wintry winds may howl without and freezing sleet beat against the roof, but within these enchanted grounds perpetual summer reigns, and winding walks conduct the luxurious Parisian amid groves of tropical fruits. Is he weary? cunningly devised seats beneath bowers of Eastern foliage invite him to repose.

And yet there is room.

Light aerial galleries, laden with flowers, stretch along the sides: and below, a large open space, sufficient to contain eight or ten hundred persons, is richly carpeted, hung with magnificent chandeliers, ornamented with classic statues, and canopied with hundreds of the tastefully grouped tri-colored flags of the republic. This space is used for concerts and balls. It is the most elegant, beautiful, tasteful and appropriate local for this purpose that Paris, perhaps I might with justice say, that the world affords.

It was here that on Thursday night all that is musical, gay and pleasure-loving in Paris had rendezvous.

It was a grand concert-bal in honor of the President Louis Napoleon Bonaparte and for the benefit of the poor.

The programme was most attractive. Portions of some half dozen of the most popular operas were to be sung by the most popular artists, Madame Dorus-Gras, Allard, Ponchard, and the Duo from Norma by two young ladies, Mdles. Cinti-Damoreau and Mira, who bid fair to add to the celebrity of names which their mothers have already made famous.

The concert occupied from 10 P. M. till 12 o'clock.

A collection was then taken up for the poor. This ceremony occupied another half hour and was not the least interesting portion of the evening.

Ladies, Madames Cinti-Damoreau, Rachel, Anais Grimm, Dorus-Gras, assisted by the most beautiful, and graceful, and famous dancing girls of the opera, Cerrito, Plunkett and Taglioni (a niece of the world known Taglioni) performed the office of collectors. These ladies, each upon the arm of a gentleman, insinuated themselves among the crowd, holding in their hands large and beautifully wrought purses. It was hard to resist their smile and quite impossible to oppose a denial to their direct personal application, as many an unlucky fellow that night learned to his cost, when the fifth, sixth or seventh of these ladies stopped in front of him and held forth her hand.

At half past 12 the ball commenced. The benches and staging used for the concert had been removed: and the music for the ball issued from a numerous band directed by Duprène and Strauss, and stationed in one of the lofty galleries.

An American friend and myself, taking no part in the dance, amused ourselves by strolling through the crowd making our observations and criticising. We agreed that among the same number of ladies, in any portion of the United States, we would find ten pretty faces where we found one here: and that we found here twenty tastefully dressed and gracefully elegant women, where, in the United States, we would find one.

We remarked, too, the invasion of the republican notion of equality in the fashionable circles of the capital. Under the monarchy, an individual of that brilliant and captivating class of Parisian society, the Lorette, would not have ventured into an assembly of this sort, or if she did, she would have dressed and demeaned herself with such perfect retenu and decorum, that it would have been impossible to distinguish her unfavorably from the rest. Upon this occasion, however, we remarked several, whose freedom of manner evidently showed that they were the summer habituées of Mabilie and Ranelagh.

I mentioned in one of my letters that Rachel, offended with the Director of the Theatre de la Republique (formerly Theatre Francais.) had retired from the stage. But the assurance was expressed that the retirement was only temporary.

She is necessary to the theatre. The theatre is necessary to her.

Rachel was born the 20th March, 1820, and is therefore in her 28th year.

So young!—to stop midway in so brilliant a career!—the harvest of flattery, of fame, of wealth, but half gathered! Oh no! It was not to be thought of. Every strong instinct of sex, profession and race opposed the project.

She would be coaxed—she would be flattered—she would make the want of Rachel felt in Paris. There, where she had seen till she was weary, her presence exciting every form of adulation and flattery, she would now triumph by her absence. It was but a variation of vanity. Such freaks may be pardoned in a young, talented and spoiled woman.

Yet there was, it must be admitted, a little lawsuit to be considered. At the moment of her retirement, Rachel was under an engagement not yet expired.

An engagement of Rachel is not a matter to be fulfilled or not, indifferently, as the lady pleases.

Every night is worth some thousands of francs to the lucky obligee.

"But I am too sick," says Rachel, "my health is wretched. It will kill me out-right to undergo the bodily and mental fatigue which you require of me."

"Ah! c'est différent!" replied the gallant director. He was "extremely sorry, but he would not for the world compromise by untimely persistence a health in which the happiness of Paris and the glory of the republic were so intimately connected."

And he bowed himself out.

The next morning, in elegant deshabillé, the illustrious tragédienne was entertaining, at late breakfast, two of the chosen few of our sex who have the privilege of informal entrance at No. 10, rue Rivoli, when a liveried domestic announced the visit of three of the most distinguished members of the faculty of Paris.

Rachel was at the moment amusing her visitors with an account of the late interview with the director.

She divined instantly the object of the visit of the medical gentlemen.

They came at the instance of the anxious director, who disquieted at the loss with which France was threatened, and perhaps with an eye too to his contract, desired to know, at once, the full extent of the danger with which both were menaced.

Quick as thought the wily invalid took her course. She ordered the domestique to excuse her to the doctors—their unexpected visit had found her in the midst of a pressing engagement—she was desolée—but it was quite impossible for her to receive them then; and she begged that they would call to-morrow at eleven.

The breakfast ended.

In ten minutes after the departure of her guests she touched the curiously wrought sonnette that lay upon her mantle-piece, and handed to the servant, who promptly answered its call, three notes for instant delivery.

They were written upon superfine satin note paper, and inclosed in perfumed envelopes. Each bore the address of one of the three medical gentlemen. They contained very few, and the same number of lines. She again regretted extremely not having been able to see them that morning—but in the hurry of the moment she had named a most inconvenient hour for their interview next day. At this season of the year a lady could hardly be expected to be visible at 11 o'clock—it is said, however, to have been her breakfast hour—would he be so kind as to call at twelve instead of eleven?

The notes only differed in this, that in one twelve o'clock was appointed for the morrow's interview, in another two P. M.—and in the third 4 P. M.

"Have you received notice of the change of hour for the visit to Rachel to-morrow?" said one of the physicians to the other as they accidentally met that afternoon.

"Certainly! I will not fail."

Punctually at 12 the expected visitant was announced at No. 10 rue Rivoli.

Rachel received him in a charming morning négligé. Her air was languid and her intellectual face unusually pale.

The doctor made known the object of the visit. The lady faintly smiled and said she had supposed as much. And it was agreed they would wait awhile for the others, who the doctor said would certainly not fail to come in soon.

The spirituelle actress smiled again and exerted herself with such effect that thirty minutes passed ere the professional gentleman once thought to complain of the tardiness of his colleagues.

"It is very strange!" said the doctor, at last looking at the bronze clock.

"Oui vraiment!" said Rachel. "I wrote to both of them."

"And I saw M—— yesterday afternoon," resumed the doctor, "who told me that he had received your note, and would meet me here without fail."

"Doubtless something unexpected, which will be all explained to-morrow, has prevented their meeting you. But Monsieur le Docteur," continued the wily invalid, "I cannot think of giving you the trouble to call a third time. The assistance of these gentlemen cannot be necessary to you. Pray proceed with your examination, and draw up your report. They may make theirs upon some other occasion, if they should ever remember to honor me with their visit."

The doctor consented.

It was the lungs which were particularly affected. And the lady proceeded with a minute detail of numerous alarming symptoms well calculated to disquiet those who take an interest in the future of the Theatre Francais, and feel concern about the fulfilment of the manager's contract. The doctor listened with much attention and an air of the tenderest concern to this doleful account of his patient's health: interposing occasionally with "ce n'est rien ça," or "Ah, c'est grave cela!"—according to the nature of the symptom which the lady was at the moment describing.

When she had ceased, the doctor felt in his pockets for his stethoscope.

"How provoking!" He had not brought it with him.

He forgot that he had left his instrument in its usual place, the pocket of his coupé, which was waiting for him at the door.

Honi soit qui mal y pense!

But auscultation was absolutely necessary.

So he applied his ear, without the intermediacy of the stethoscope.

What else could he do?

The doctor's look, upon raising his head, would have been assuring to a patient even more despairing than was Rachel. He was evidently not without hope that the case was within the reach of his art.

After a little more conversation he declared himself satisfied, and drew up his report, which while it relieved the anxieties of those who feared to see the French stage speedily deprived of its brightest ornament, was upon the whole satisfactory to the artist herself. He left a copy of it with her and took his leave.

Similar scenes occurred at 2 P. M. and 4 P. M. upon the arrival of the other physicians. Only at 2 o'clock the seat of the disease with which the lady was afflicted had changed from the lungs to the stomach, and at 4 P. M. it had mounted to the throat. She had lost for the moment—she hoped, with care and the doctor's aid, it would prove to be only temporarily—that remarkable power of utterance which forms one of her distinguishing beauties upon the stage.

The doctor said some encouraging things and took his leave, placing in her hands a copy of his report recommending her to abstain for some time to come from exciting declamation.

Rachel congratulating herself upon the success thus far of her stratagem, gaily spent the hour before dinner in the perusal of her three reports. Armed with these she thought with reason that she could anticipate without apprehension the result of the law-suit if they should now proceed with it.

The three medical gentlemen met next day at the director's.

Maternal explanation! universal indignation! and general consent that Rachel had outwitted them, that the law-suit could not succeed, and that for their own reputation's sake the affair must be hushed up and the reappearance of the actress upon the boards of the Theatre Francais effected by an arrangement à l'amiable.

With what success the overtures were made appears from the following notice, taken from the Constitutionnel of the 9th instant.

"Mlle. Rachel hopes, it is said, that her health will permit her reappearance at the French Theatre on Saturday next. She will appear as Camille in the Horace of Corneille."

On Saturday morning the gay colored placards of the Theatre Francais, posted up at the theatre itself, upon the boulevards, and all over the city announced certainly the fact. Immediately the ticket office was besieged by applicants for the places which the rules of the theatre permit to be sold beforehand; and at midday commenced the *queue for the purchase of pit-tickets and such others as can only be had at the doors at half past seven in the evening.

Many a one stood that day for seven mortal hours near the door of the French Theatre, in order to make sure of a seat to witness the reappearance of the illustrious tragédienne. I was myself not among the last: and took my place in the queue a full hour and a half before the opening of the door.

It's very trying to one's patience and one's legs, the being compelled to stand in the same spot for so long a time. I had occasion repeatedly to try the old fashioned expedients of throwing the weight of the body first on one foot and then on the other, and then on both equally. Most of those in advance of me whiled away the time by the reading of newspapers or books, which they had taken the precaution to bring with them. Such as came in parties were engaged in conversation. I had placed a copy of Corneille in my pocket: and amused myself with reading the tragedy which I was not destined to see played that evening.

"One parterre!" said I thrusting my hand with a two-franc piece between the fingers into the small hole through which tickets were bought and passed.

"All sold, Monsieur!" was the reply. My hand was withdrawn and instead of passing in I passed out, and not in the most amiable mood.

It was not without a certain feeling of pleasure—why deny it?

"Homo sum," &c.

that I marked the long line—three or four hundred—of those who, behind me, were slowly making their way to the door and ticket-office. And I chuckled at the idea of how many of them were fated to the same disappointment with myself: for single gentlemen usually prefer a seat in the pit. Ladies are not admitted there.

Camille is one of Rachel's favorite characters. It is that in which she made her debut in the Theatre Francais on the 12th June, 1838.

On that evening no eager crowd thronged the doors in honor of the youthful débutante. It was known that a young Israelite, Rachel, was to make her first appearance: but her genius had not yet revealed itself to the world. Rachel was not yet a magnet of powerful attraction: and many were the unoccupied seats, and sad to see the vacant boxes that night in the French theatre. Not many of the lovers of French tragedy can boast that they were present at the first appearance of the now illustrious actress. Some were certainly there—old habitués of the theatre—who made it a matter of conscience to be present at every representation,—who knew not where else to spend the evening—and were in place every night just as surely as the lamps themselves or any other fixture of the establishment. These groaned in advance over the murder which they supposed was about to be done upon their favorite author. The critics too, mechanically as it were, and by the force of habit, were present. They had written already for the morrow's journals their unfavorable articles, bewailing for the fiftieth time the want of worthy interpreters for the noble pages of Corneille and Racine, and striving to evince in some new form their oft repeated belief in the decline of the French Theatre.

* La queue (the tail) is the term applied to the long line, in rows of two by two, which is formed, under the supervision of police officers, at the doors of the theatres by persons of both sexes awaiting the opening of the doors. When a favorite actor is to appear or a favorite piece to be played, these tails, in winding folds, extend to a hundred or more yards in length. Order is strictly maintained, and the rule, first come first served, rigidly observed. If a late comer presumes to take too advanced a position in the line, all behind him instantly and loudly protest, shouting "à la queue! à la queue!" A policeman comes up, the offender is pointed out and promptly ejected. He goes off, or takes his position at the end of the tail.

But they did not publish their articles.

The curtain rises.

After a short scene between Sabine and Julie, Camille enters.

It is Rachel. The pupil of the heavy, cold, artificial Saint-Aulaire, has commenced her career as the greatest tragic actor of her day.

Her noble, calm, and truly tragic air, her pale and strongly marked oval face, earnest, thoughtful and steeped in grief till it was even painful to behold, arrested at once every gaze and held the audience in breathless suspense.

The confidence and joy inspired by the deceitful words of the oracle had vanished. Camille had passed a restless night, disturbed by frightful dreams. Rome and Alba were at war. After long continued hostilities, with various success, the day had arrived which was to decide the issue of the war. Rome or Alba was now to be finally subjugated. The armies were in presence both eager for the fight. Her brothers, the Horatii were in the Roman army—her lover one of the Curatii in the Alban. Much that she loved as woman, all that she loved as Roman was in one camp—what she loved most as woman was in the other camp. To whichever side victory inclined, for her, unspeakable grief was the certain portion.

Sabine retires, leaving Camille alone with Julie.

She commences :

“Qu' elle a tort de vouloir que je vous entretienne !
Croit elle ma douleur moins vive que la sienne,
Et que, plus insensible à de si grands malheurs,
A mes tristes discours je mêle moins de pleurs ?”

From that moment her success was certain, her triumph complete. She proceeded amid a stillness that was almost unearthly to the close of the scene. Till then—the best proof of her power—the charmed audience forgot to applaud. But then! oh then! there was not a form of extravagance in which it was possible for French enthusiasm to express itself, that was not found inadequate to the occasion!

Talma, Mars, Georges, never provoked the like. She took from that night position as an actress, which, if she still occupies, it is because she has found it impossible to get higher. It was Camille herself—the antique Camille—the very personification of the creation of Corneille.

“Then,” exclaims a French eulogist, “Tragedy burst from the sepulchre in which she lay, and displayed herself triumphant to a generation which had outraged her.”

It has indeed never been my lot to see a tragic actor whom I think the equal of Rachel. Her voice has a power, her tones a thrilling quality, that I have heard no where else. Her declamation is tasteful, elegant, just, unforced, void of all extravagance, but expressive as occasion requires of deepest, fiercest, tenderest passion. Her gestures, few and simple, are more eloquent even than her words, apparently the spontaneous prompting of nature, of which the actress herself is unconscious. She has a perfect conception of her parts and a rare power of identification. Her bearing and manner are replete with grace, decorum and tragic dignity—no exaggeration and foaming rant—no starts except when the occasion so calls for them, that every spectator in pit, box and gallery, is fully prepared to start with her.

Rachel is a native of Switzerland, Canton of Argon. She is born of very obscure Jewish parents. Her family name is Felix. Her early life, till the age of eleven years, was that of a vagabond mendicant singing-girl. There are thousands who remember to have seen her in Lyons, (France,) clothed in rags, strolling over the city, guitar in hand, singing in the Cafés and public squares, and gathering from the street the sous which contemptuous charity threw upon the pavement. This of course no sensible person would remember to her discredit, or impute to her as a disgrace. I mention it simply as a biographical fact. She early evinced an inclination for the stage; and was placed for several years under the tuition of M. Saint-Aulaire. She played in one of the minor and very obscure theatres of the capital with such promise, that several theatrical gentlemen, taking an interest in her, procured for their protégée in October, 1836, admission into the Conservatoire, where she profited by the lectures of the famous Samson, who soon distinguished her from the crowd of médiocre capacities by which she was surrounded.

On leaving the Conservatoire, in 1837, Rachel connected herself with the theatre of the Gymnase of Paris. She soon, however, left that theatre and took an engagement in the Theatre Français, making her debut, as mentioned above, on the 12th June, 1838. There she has won her fame and her fortune. With it she is identified; and will doubtless remain connected, in spite of little differences like that with which we commenced this notice, throughout the whole of her professional career.

The family, Felix, would seem to have devoted itself entirely to the stage since the brilliant success which has crowned the efforts of one of its members. She has a younger brother, Raphael, a member of the company of the French Theatre. He performed with her on Saturday the part of Curiaze, lover of Camille. An elder sister, Sarah, and two younger sisters, Rebecca and Dinah, the last only twelve years of age, are also upon the boards of Paris. There are several more still younger coming on—destined all it is said to the stage. Only one of the family has as yet evinced more than mediocre talent, and will probably never merit higher praise than that of being respectable in their profession.

The Bonaparte family produced but one Napoleon. The Felix family will produce but one Rachel.

France, the world, produced but one Napoleon at a time. Fifty years hence the same will probably be said of Rachel.

Her return to the stage, after this short estrangement, was hailed on Saturday with transports of welcome hardly less enthusiastic than those which signalized her first appearance; and her representation of the various passions which by turns agitate Camille—love, patriotism, grief, despair, fury—were worthy of Rachel. The President of the Republic was present. He occupied the former royal box. His entry was hailed from pit, box and gallery with highly gratifying tokens of respect.

He was present, too, occupying the royal box at the recent opening of the Italian Opera. Various reports had, for the last six weeks, been agitating the music-loving public of Paris, with respect to the opening of the Italian Opera this season. It was asserted, till a very few days before the opening, that the difficulties in the way had been found insuperable, and that Lablache and Alboni were about to take their flight from Paris to London. This was fortunately not all true. Ronconi, the celebrated baryton, has assumed the difficult task of manager; and aided by Lablache and Alboni, he hopes to maintain the ancient reputation of the opera. The house was crowded to excess with all that Paris contains of the beautiful, brilliant and illustrious. La Cenerentola was the opera chosen for the occasion. It was repeated again on Thursday night.

Lablache is astounding in the role of Don Magnifico. The great artiste unites as singer and actor qualities the most opposite and apparently incompatible. His voice, one of the most powerful and terrible that ever thundered in a theatre, can suddenly change its tone and with equal facility emit the plaintive wailings or give utterance to the tender hopes of melting love. Now, it pours forth with overwhelming volume, roaring, rushing, crushing, like Niagara's "hell of waters:" and anon, it charms the sense, like the bubbling brook that solicits its sparkling way through the green and sunlit valley. Comic some of his roles, as Arnal himself, let the occasion be presented, and Lablache promptly becomes dignified, impassioned, tragic, sublime. See him in one of his comic moods, and Cervantes for his Sancho, Shakspeare for his Falstaff, would have envied that jovial face and figure: but see him in Assur, or hear the father of Desdemona vent his fearful malediction, and that comic face is clothed with terror. You tremble, shudder, shrink before his wrath.

Mdlle. Alboni is building worthily and rapidly the reputation of which she laid so broadly the foundation last year. Her stature and person do not accord exactly with our idea of little Cinderella; but the exquisite delicacy of her singing, particularly in the final notes, makes us soon forget that. Her voice is as clear, fresh and silvery as ever; now replete with every feminine quality, and now of almost masculine tone and strength. Her utterance is of the same marvellous facility. She sings like a bird; pouring forth the most various harmony without the slightest effort. She has but to open her mouth, and it gushes forth not as if it were sent out, but as if it would come, as if it could not help coming. She is cold. She does lack animation, feeling, passion, both in face and manner. It was her fault last year. I remark no change in this. There she stands uttering music; delighting, thrilling, astonishing, racking all within the sound of her voice—herself unmoved! I could not help comparing her to some wondrously constructed musical statue. She opens her mouth, (the spring is touched,) and music follows—mechanically.

But her singing is so chaste, so elegant, so classic! Why don't she feel! Why will she not partake, or seem to partake, the emotion she excites in her audience!

Quote Horace to her,

"si vis me fieri dolendum est Primum ipsi tibi; tunc tua me infortunia laedent,"

she mocks at your Latin and defies you to "sleep or to laugh."

La Cenerentola of Rossini is perhaps her favorite opera. She has won in it some of her most glorious triumphs, and not the least on Tuesday and Thursday nights of last week. Her marvellous execution of the difficult rondo in the second act produced thunders of applause. At the conclusion of the opera the theatre rang with bravos and the stage was covered with bouquets showered upon her from the boxes.

She gratified very much her French audience, by volunteering between the acts a couplet commencing with

"Salut, oh noble France!"

from the 2nd Act of "La Fille-du Regiment," which she sang with a remarkably correct accent. The audience were pleased with the compliment, but Alboni lacks the fire, energy and soul necessary to give full effect to that thrilling air.

Apropos de la Cenerentola! It is—a little disguised to be sure by the fashionable dress in which she presents herself—the earliest acquaintance of your own childhood, the earliest acquaintance of your grandmother's childhood, and perhaps of your great grandmother's—it is Cinderella, or the Glass Slipper.

This you probably knew before. But do you know the origin of Cinderella, or the Glass Slipper? and how very, very old is the story, which is known by heart, and whose repetition has so often excited the imagination and sympathies of every child in the land?

I'll tell you.

Once upon a time—but I am writing history and must specify the date—two thousand four hundred and forty years ago, there lived a young Grecian woman, a fellow slave with Æsop, (him of the fables.) at the court of the king of Samos. Her name was Rhodope.

I have said Rhodope was young. She was also gay, wild, adventurous, pleasure-loving and exceedingly beautiful. But what she was most proud of was her tiny foot. It was the marvel of Samos.

It is not surprising that Rhodope should soon cease to be the fellow slave of Æsop at the Samian Court; or that after a few years and a series of adventures the lovely and spirited girl should find herself in the capital of the distant, wealthy and luxurious kingdom of Egypt. She was very probably just such another as the Lola Montes, or Countess of Landsfeld of the present day, she who a year or two ago was playing so distinguished a part at the court of the king of Bavaria. At any rate, their histories are not altogether dissimilar. The chronicle avers that Rhodope was one day bathing in the Nile, when an eagle stooped in his flight and bore off in his talons one of her sandals which were lying on the bank. He dropped it, says the story, (one would be almost tempted to believe that her old friend Æsop were the writer of the story,) at the feet of the king Psammetichus, who was enjoying the evening breeze upon the terraces of his palace in Memphis.

The astonished king picked up the slipper, gazed, admired, loved. It was impossible that so small a slipper could fit more than one foot. He ordered instant search to be made for the owner, and caused it to be proclaimed that she whose foot that sandal would fit should become his wife and the crowned queen of Egypt. The mysterious slipper was deposited in an ante-room of the palace, where all the young women of Egypt were free to examine, envy and try it. For weeks it was the amusement of the courtiers to watch the numerous young women who daily left the palace veiled and limping. At last Rhodope was discovered. The friendly historian does not assert that she facilitated the discovery. She easily put on the tiny slipper and proved that she was the owner of it by producing its fellow.

The king kept his word, and Rhodope became his wife and the crowned queen of Egypt.

If any of your readers should be incredulous, or should desire to learn more minutely the history of Rhodope, I refer them to the works of Ælian, and to Strabo. It is recorded in the 17th book of his Geography.

But how happens it—methinks you ask—that in the lapse of ages, Rhodope's slipper has been converted into glass? That Rhodope is the prototype of Cinderella may perhaps be admitted; but only the wondering credulity of childhood can believe that either Rhodope or Cinderella ever wore a real glass slipper.

At the risk of destroying half the charm which, in the mind of children, invests the veritable but mysterious glass slipper, I will venture the following explanation.

Suppose, which is not at all improbable, that the story of Cinderella, or the Glass Slipper, was introduced into the nurseries of England, through France. The French for glass slipper, is "pantoufle de verre."

So far as pronunciation and the ear are concerned, "pantoufle de verre" and "pantoufle de vair" are the same.

Suppose that the latter is the correct mode of writing it, but that in process of time, partly from ignorance and partly to render the story more captivating to children, verre came to be generally substituted for vair in the popular mind and language. At this point of corruption, La pantoufle de verre crossed the channel and was translated of course by the word glass slipper.

The term vair in heraldry signifies one of the furs employed in blazonry. It represents the skin of a small squirrel.

Now the skin of a squirrel, properly prepared, is no very unfit thing to make a slipper of, and until some better proof than nursery traditions shall be adduced to the contrary, I must persist in believing that the proper name of the story, is Rhodope, or the Squirrel-Skin Slipper.

After all, if I ever have a son, I dare say, as soon as he shall be old enough to understand me, I shall be often caught with my boy upon my knee, teaching him the marvellous old story of Cinderella, or the Glass Slipper.

The Hospitals and Theatres of Paris, in situations which at the first blush you would hardly suppose to meet upon the same ground and to possess clashing interests, have been since the revolution and are still at daggers' points.

It happens in this wise :

During the late reign, the various theatres were bound to pay over weekly, if not nightly, from 9 to 11 per cent. of their gross receipts for the benefit of the hospitals. The tax was cheerfully submitted to, for their receipts were then ample. The good people of Paris in those days had no processions, émeutes, clubs and banquets to amuse them of evenings, and were compelled to seek emotion and banish ennui in the moving scenes of the theatre. The French have no idea of domestic enjoyment as we and the English understand it. An evening at home is universally voted a horrible bore.

But the revolution of February came; and the farces, comedies and tragedies which were now daily and nightly enacted in the streets, public clubs, &c., established a ruinous rivalry with the regular theatres,—to the effect that their benches were completely deserted. In the course of the three months following February, nearly all the theatres were compelled to close their doors; the receipts frequently not paying one fourth of the expenses.

They promptly took advantage of the anarchy succeeding the proclamation of the Republic and refused payment of the onerous and now intolerable tribute levied by the hospitals. The managers and hospital committees were at open war. Violent seizures were repeatedly made. The result was a compromise by which one party agreed to pay and the other to receive 1 per cent. till 1st November last. From November to January 3 per cent. was received. Under the rule of Cavaignac, the usual street amusements and club scenes were severely restricted and the theatres began to be re-peopled. Order and law seemed still more likely to have sway under Louis Napoleon. The hospital committees consequently rose in their demands and had the boldness to demand from the 1st of this month 5 of the 10 per cent. to which they were legally entitled: and expressed their determination to invoke if necessary the arm of the law to obtain payment of the same. The managers have been compelled to succumb. They now nightly pay over to the hospital-receivers the 5 per cent., but they protest and appeal to the public against their oppressors, declaring that their receipts cannot yet bear so heavy a charge.

Yet one would hardly believe that with the state of theatrical affairs indicated above, co-existed the following facts, which the Theatrical Review of 1848 proves to be true. It shows an activity among dramatic authors amid the stirring scenes of political revolution which I could not have anticipated. During the last year there were produced upon the Parisian boards 178 new Vaudevilles, 35 new Dramas, 26 Comedies, 13 Operas, 2 Tragedies, 11 Pantomimes, 1 Mystere, and 1 Etude—in all 267 new pieces. In the production of these concurred 180 authors and 15 composers. Among the authors M. Clairville figures as the most fruitful. He attaches his name to 20 Vaudevilles. But one novelty was produced by the Italian Opera. It was Andremo a Parigi, by Rossini. The French Opera gave 1 ballet-pantomime by Ad. Adam; 1 opera and 1 ballet by Benoit; Eden, a mystery, by Felicien David; and 1 opera by Clapisson. Scribe, Lafont and others wrote 15 new pieces for the Theatre de la Republique (French Theatre.) The Odeon, the Vaudeville, the Variétés, the Gymnase, the Theatre Montansier, (ci-devant Palais Royal), and the Beaumarchais produced from 22 to 26 new pieces each.

LETTERS FROM NEW-YORK.

NEW-YORK, Feb., 1849.

I design to send you each month from this metropolis of commerce, literature and the arts, a letter, not precisely de omnibus rebus et quibusdam aliis, but still "various that the mind of desultory man, studious of change and pleased with novelty, may be indulged." I hope that I shall succeed at least in gratifying the curiosity and pleasing the tastes of your readers, though I may not, as certain of your correspondents do, inform their understandings and captivate their imaginations. I am an ancient correspondent of the Messenger and have ever taken a sincere interest in its success. I rejoice that it is now conducted under auspices so favorable to its permanent welfare, and I say "macte virtute," with a cordial goodwill and a desire to assist you according to my ability. You see that I am but poor at a preface, and you may find me somewhat awkward at the beginning of my epistles, but I shall improve, sir—I shall improve as I fall into a more familiar acquaintance with those who feel both a pride and a pleasure in sustaining worthily a periodical which is admired in the North and cherished by the South.

Before this letter shall reach you, you will have received and noticed the first two volumes of Macaulay's History of England, published by the Harpers in a neat, and I might add, handsome manner, were it not that each page is sadly disfigured by being set in a frame of "column rules," as printers call those formal lines that frame each printed area. No standard book should affect the fashion of illustrated volumes. This attempt at ornament is very much out of taste. But it is better that the externals of a book should be so marred than that the matter should be deformed by such phonographic orthography, as these publishers, Noah Webster duce, have seen fit to adopt. It is difficult to imagine by what right an author is forced to spell according to the whims of printers, proof-readers or booksellers. It is just as impertinent to alter Mr. Macaulay's orthography, as it would have been to change his language or invert his style. If Mr. Macaulay prefers to spell traveller with two 'l's, and to put the letter 'e' in theatre after the 'r' instead of before it, is it not a piece of presumption to compel him to give sanction to such spelling as travcler and theater? Perhaps this correct and classic author abominates all innovations on the purity of his mother-tongue, how then must he be shocked at seeing the absurd perversions which he is made to father by his American sponsors!

In my judgment it is high time these unwarrantable liberties were frowned down by the critics. They are most offensive to the eye of taste. They are mutilations of "Chatham's language." They put one in mind of those cuts and scratches, rude carvings of names and initials, which are seen on the benches and statues and fountain-urns in our public squares. They ought to be repressed and punished by a literary and artistic police.

Phonography or the art of writing by sounds, or according to aural impressions, is a great and valuable discovery in reporting—in every way superior to stenography: no one can deny that, who has seen the wonderful velocity and strict accuracy with which the most rapid speaker's words may be transferred to paper. It may be called the daguerreotype of sound. But to undertake by a new alphabet and constant elisions of letters to substitute it for our beautiful and symmetrical language, as it is now written and printed, is even a greater absurdity than it would be to throw away all drawing and sketching in oil or water colors and engraving, and make exclusive use of those instruments which by the aid of the sun fix faces and landscapes on a surface of polished metal. Or to make use of a better illustration, we might as well build square pine boxes, or plain brick walls, instead of using frieze and architrave, column and arch, on the outside of our dwellings. In fact, the orthography of a language may be esteemed its ornamental architecture. As our English is now spelled, it is harmonious, elegant, classical, springing from just elements founded on reason, erected with taste: strip it, cut it down, mutilate it, and it becomes a shapeless, ugly mass of incongruities. Moreover it will be at the mercy of every fresh innovator; the very materials will soon be cast aside, and in the lapse of time it will be resolved back into barbarism, and exist only as a language of signs, a mere system of hieroglyphics. The advocates of progress in this matter seem to desire to progress backward and to reduce our present letters to the diagrams and figures of the Egyptians.

But to return to Harper's edition of Macaulay. The typography and paper are highly creditable; the eye reposes luxuriously upon them, and middle-aged gentlemen are not reminded of spectacles. Of the book itself I could not speak fittingly without going into an extended review. It is very fine and spirited in its style, original and impressive in its opinions. It abounds with frequent passages that teem with eloquence. It is more chaste and subdued than its author's miscellaneous papers, but is still vivacious and entertaining. The narrative has the interest of a most skilfully managed romance. That mind must be duller than the fat weed which grows on Lethe's bank, which could not follow this river-like flow of thoughts and words through all their grand or graceful windings.

To the young the study of history is often an irksome task. Recounters of facts think not enough of induing with the charms of a cultivated style the results of their researches. Hume, with all his clearness, is often dry—to say nothing of his one-sidedness and skepticism. Gibbon is too lofty and ornate; the movements of his style have too much grandeur and precision to be attractive. He is another infidel too, whose views it is impossible to contemplate without a sentiment of distrust. Macaulay has all the lucidity of the one and enough of the ornaments of the other. He has too a keen and polished wit, a quick and apprehensive insight, a felicitous fancy, a deep faith in whatsoever is pure and lovely and of good report. By the young, therefore, he will be loved as well as admired; he will win their confidence no less than their homage; they will, moreover, be attracted by his example and revelations to the study of ancient and contemporaneous histories. For the latter reason, even if his intrinsic merits were less eminent than they are, I would cordially commend this book to those whose charge it is to train and elevate the minds of youth.

Mr. Richard Hildreth, a gentleman of learning and abilities—a counsellor at law and once editor of a leading daily journal in Boston, has been for five years past engaged in writing out from a great variety of materials, derived from numerous sources, a history of the United States. He has completed his work from the first age of the country to the adoption of the Federal Constitution. This part will be comprised in three volumes, which are now in the hands of publishers. The second part, which will occupy three volumes more, will begin with the government under the Federal Constitution and conclude with General Taylor's administration. I have not a doubt that the task will be faithfully and skilfully executed. Mr. Hildreth's mind is void of all sectional prejudices. He will treat all the institutions of the country with fairness and honesty. As he is a scholar, reliance may be felt in the style and manner in which he will accomplish his important and difficult undertaking.

Is it not a singular fact, that, in consideration of the mighty advancement of our country in the science of government, in mechanics, in the arts, in literature, that there is really no good, thorough, comprehensive history written as such a history ought to be written? Bancroft is in parts excellent; but he wants proportion. He is very full on certain points and slurs over others, which are equally important. Besides he gives undue prominence to topics, which do not seem to have a legitimate connection with events here. We sometimes suspect him of a desire rather to display the minuteness, extent and variety of his own attainments than to perform accurately his incumbent duties as a historian. Should Mr. Hildreth supply any considerable portion of that want which Mr. Bancroft leaves as he found it, he will deserve well of the Republic.

Mr. Putnam's new editions of the works of Washington Irving have met with satisfactory success. These works are now scarcely obtainable in any other accessible shape, certainly in none so desirable. Mr. Putnam publishes them in two editions—one with Mr. Darley's illustrations, another without. I prefer the latter. I have a high respect for Mr. Darley's genius in some things: but I do not think he enters into or rightly judges the genius of Mr. Irving. There is a lack of delicacy in the illustrations; they are broad and too real and sometimes show a singular disproportion between the figures and the space they fill in the picture.

It strikes me—I may be mistaken—but it seems to me that the public are getting tired of these pictorial publications. The thing has been overdone and badly done on this side of the water. Our attempts of the kind are imitations, and of that kind which gods, men or columns find it difficult to tolerate. Those artists among us who try to make original drawings, are so few that, even if they possessed more aptness than they do, they would fail from hurry and accumulation of work. There is no discovery as yet, by the use of which one hand can be trained to do the labor of a hundred hands. In England, where etchers and sketchers are as many as the works they embellish, beautiful or facetious books are produced that can truly pretend to artistic praise. Look, for example, at the doings of the Etching Club,—worthy of Italian art in its best days. Look, as examples of humor, to the caricatures of H. B. or the linnings of Cattermole. In the department of wit and caricature, we are lamentably deficient. Each of our efforts in that direction has been a failure. Was there ever any thing more paltry than the wood-cut designs in those abortive imitations of Punch, called "Yankee Doodle" and "John Donkey"? Could aught more despicable be imagined than the political lithographed caricatures with which a person by the name of Robinson disgusts the not too fastidious citizens of Gotham? We abound in topics, but we lack artists. The Yankee peculiarities both of character and manners have yet to be described both by pen and pencil.

"The Literary World," edited by Evert A. Duyckinck, one of our ripest scholars, best critics and happiest writers,—a man of fine taste, a real lover of, and an able commentator on old English letters, has paid you recently a very high compliment. From such a source it is, let me assure you, worth having. Pray do not let your modesty prevent you from publishing it, but rather show your neighbors what our most distinguished Northern editors think of your efforts in the common cause of American literature.

(From the Literary World of January 27.)

"The Southern Literary Messenger which, under the care of Mr. White, gained so high and wide a reputation, has been growing in attractiveness and value during the past year. Several of its former popular contributors have resumed their labors in its pages. The volume just closed contains numerous masterly essays. The editor, John R. Thompson, Esq., is a man of education and promptitude, and is engaged heartily in rendering the Messenger a reliable exponent of the literature of the day, and an honor to the South. The new volume appears in an entirely new and beautiful typographical dress, and contains some articles of unusual interest carefully elaborated and characterized by the best skill of some of our ablest writers. It is due to the gentleman who is devoting his time and abilities so energetically to this work, to tender him our cordial congratulations upon the eminent success which has thus far attended his efforts, and our earnest wishes for the permanent recognition of the Messenger as one of the leading periodicals of the Union. The South needs an organ of the kind. Richmond is a central locality; and while we cannot doubt that the Southern public will take pride and satisfaction in promoting the interests of the Messenger, we hope that our Eastern men of letters, and especially the press, will encourage by their literary aid and deserved praise, a Journal so honorable and necessary to the advancement of the region where it chiefly circulates, and the welfare of American literature."

You will agree with me that I could hardly close the first of my letters more agreeably than by presenting a delightful jeu d'esprit, embodied in certain lines by a lady, of whose genius and accomplishments we feel very proud, on a Southern lady, highly celebrated at our places of fashionable resort for her wit and humor.

Do not think the verses a fair exponent of what their fair author can accomplish. She is capable of the loftiest ascents as well as of such graceful little flights as the following :

TO MRS. O. W. L.*

BY MRS. E. C. KINNEY.

Surely thou art no bird of night—
Thy face thy name denies;
Save, that as stars make evening bright,
So do thy starlit eyes.

Oh, no! Thou'rt not a moping OWL
Of solitary mood—
Upon life's sunny joys to scowl,
And o'er its evils brood!

Save that the Owl—Minerva's bird—
Hath wisdom in his thought,
And he that hears thee speak, hath heard
What wisdom's goddess taught.

But none that listen to thy songs,
Ear-raptured, will allow
That screech-owl's name or voice belongs
To songstress such as thou!

No! If a bird of night at all,
We must for thee disclaim
What thine initials say, and call
The NIGHTINGALE thy name.

* Mrs. Octavia Walton Le Vert.

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS.

A FABLE FOR THE CRITICS. NEW-YORK: GEORGE P. PUTNAM.

What have we Americans accomplished in the way of Satire? "The Vision of Rubeta," by Laughton Osborn, is probably our best composition of the kind: but, in saying this, we intend no excessive commendation. Trumbull's slummy and imitative work is scarcely worth mention—and then we have Halleck's "Croakers," local and ephemeral—but what is there besides? Park Benjamin has written a clever address, with the title "Infatuation," and Holmes has an occasional scrap, piquant enough in its way—but we can think of nothing more that can be fairly called "satire." Some matters we have produced, to be sure, which were excellent in the way of burlesque—(the Poems of William Ellery Channing, for example)—without meaning a syllable that was not utterly solemn and serious. Odes, ballads, songs, sonnets, epics and epigrams, possessed of this unintentional excellence, we should have no difficulty in designating by the dozen; but in the particular of direct and obvious satire, it cannot be denied that we are unaccountably deficient.

It has been suggested that this deficiency arises from the want of a suitable field for satirical display. In England, it is said, satire abounds, because the people there find a proper target in the aristocracy, whom they (the people) regard as a distinct race with whom they have little in common; relishing even the most virulent abuse of the upper classes with a gusto undiminished by any feeling that they (the people) have any concern in it. In Russia, or Austria, on the other hand, it is urged, satire is unknown; because there is danger in touching the aristocracy, and self-satire would be odious to the mass. In America, also, the people who write are, it is maintained, the people who read:—thus in satirizing the people we satirize only ourselves and are never in condition to sympathize with the satire.

All this is more verisimilar than true. It is forgotten that no individual considers himself as one of the mass. Each person, in his own estimate, is the pivot on which all the rest of the world spins round. We may abuse the people by wholesale, and yet with a clear conscience so far as regards any compunction for offending any one from among the multitude of which that "people" is composed. Every one of the crowd will cry "Encore!—give it to them, the vagabonds!—it serves them right." It seems to us that, in America, we have refused to encourage satire—not because what we have had touches us too nearly—but because it has been too pointless to touch us at all. Its namby-pambyism has arisen, in part, from the general want, among our men of letters, of that minute polish—of that skill in details—which, in combination with natural sarcastic power, satire, more than any other form of literature, so imperatively demands. In part, also, we may attribute our failure to the colonial sin of imitation. We content ourselves—at this point not less supinely than at all others—with doing what not only has been done before, but what, however well done, has yet been done ad nauseam. We should not be able to endure infinite repetitions of even absolute excellence; but what is "McFingal" more than a faint echo from "Hudibras"?—and what is "The Vision of Rubeta" more than a vast gilded swill-trough overflowing with Dunciad and water? Although we are not all Archilochuses, however—although we have few pretensions to the ἄριστος αἰσῆσι—although, in short, we are no satirists ourselves—there can be no question that we answer sufficiently well as subjects for satire.

"The Vision" is bold enough—if we leave out of sight its anonymous issue—and bitter enough, and witty enough, if we forget its pitiable punning on names—and long enough (Heaven knows) and well constructed and decently versified; but it fails in the principal element of all satire—sarcasm—because the intention to be sarcastic (as in the "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," and in all the more classical satires) is permitted to render itself manifest. The malevolence appears. The author is never very severe, because he is at no time particularly cool. We laugh not so much at his victims as at himself for letting them put him in such a passion. And where a deeper sentiment than mirth is excited—where it is pity or contempt that we are made to feel—the feeling is too often reflected, in its object, from the satirized to the satirist—with whom we sympathize in the discomfort of his animosity. Mr. Osborn has not many superiors in downright invective; but this is the awkward left arm of the satiric Muse. That satire alone is worth talking about which at least appears to be the genial, good-humored outpouring of irrepressible merriment.

"The Fable for the Critics," just issued, has not the name of its author on the title-page; and but for some slight fore-knowledge of the literary opinions, likes, dislikes, whims, prejudices and crochets of Mr. James Russell Lowell, we should have had much difficulty in attributing so very loose a brochure to him. The "Fable" is essentially "loose"—ill conceived and feebly executed, as well in detail as in general. Some good hits and some sparkling witisms do not serve to compensate us for its rambling plot (if plot it can be called) and for the want of artistic finish so particularly noticeable throughout the work—especially in its versification. In Mr. Lowell's prose efforts we have before observed a certain disjointedness, but never, until now, in his verse—and we confess some surprise at his putting forth so unpolished a performance. The author of "The Legend of Brittany" (which is decidedly the noblest poem, of the same length, written by an American) could not do a better thing than to take the advice of those who mean him well, in spite of his fanaticism, and leave prose, with satiric verse, to those who are better able to manage them; while he contents himself with that class of poetry for which, and for which alone, he seems to have an especial vocation—the poetry of sentiment. This, to be sure, is not the very loftiest order of verse; for it is far inferior to either that of the imagination or that of the passions—but it is the loftiest region in which Mr. Lowell can get his breath without difficulty.

Our primary objection to this "Fable for the Critics" has reference to a point which we have already touched in a general way. "The malevolence appears." We laugh not so much at the author's victims as at himself for letting them put him in such a passion. The very title of the book shows the want of a due sense in respect to the satiric essence, sarcasm. This "fable"—this severe lesson—is meant "for the Critics." "Ah!" we say to ourselves at once—"we see how it is. Mr. L. is a poor-devil poet, and some critic has been reviewing him, and making him feel very uncomfortable; whereupon, bearing in mind that Lord Byron, when similarly assailed, avenged his wrongs in a satire which he called 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers,' he (Mr. Lowell) imitative as usual has been endeavoring to get redress in a parallel manner—by a satire with a parallel title—'A Fable for the Critics.'"

All this the reader says to himself; and all this tells against Mr. L. in two ways—first, by suggesting unlucky comparisons between Byron and Lowell, and, secondly, by reminding us of the various criticisms, in which we have been amused (rather ill-naturedly) at seeing Mr. Lowell "used up."

The title starts us on this train of thought and the satire sustains us in it. Every reader versed in our literary gossip, is at once put dessous des cartes as to the particular provocation which engendered the "Fable." Miss Margaret Fuller, some time ago, in a silly and conceited piece of Transcendentalism which she called an "Essay on American Literature," or something of that kind, had the consummate pleasantry, after selecting from the list of American poets, Cornelius Mathews and William Ellery Channing, for especial commendation, to speak of Longfellow as a booby and of Lowell as so wretched a poetaster "as to be disgusting even to his best friends." All this Miss Fuller said, if not in our precise words, still in words quite as much to the purpose. Why she said it, Heaven only knows—unless it was because she was Margaret Fuller, and wished to be taken for nobody else. Messrs. Longfellow and Lowell, so pointedly picked out for abuse as the worst of our poets, are, upon the whole, perhaps, our best—although Bryant, and one or two others are scarcely inferior. As for the two favorites, selected just as pointedly for laudation, by Miss F.—it is really difficult to think of them, in connexion with poetry, without laughing. Mr. Mathews once wrote some sonnets "On Man," and Mr.

Channing some lines on "A Tin Can," or something of that kind—and if the former gentleman be not the very worst poet that ever existed on the face of the earth, it is only because he is not quite so bad as the latter. To speak algebraically:—Mr. M. is execrable, but Mr. C. is x plus 1-ecrable.

Mr. Lowell has obviously aimed his "Fable" at Miss Fuller's head, in the first instance, with an eye to its ricochét-ing so as to knock down Mr. Mathews in the second. Miss F. is first introduced as Miss F—, rhyming to "cooler," and afterwards as "Miranda;" while poor Mr. M. is brought in upon all occasions, head and shoulders; and now and then a sharp thing, although never very original, is said of them or at them; but all the true satiric effect wrought, is that produced by the satirist against himself. The reader is all the time smiling to think that so unpassable a—(what shall we call her?—we wish to be civil,) a transcendentalist as Miss Fuller, should, by such a criticism, have had the power to put a respectable poet in such a passion.

As for the plot or conduct of this Fable, the less we say of it the better. It is so weak—so flimsy—so ill put together—as to be not worth the trouble of understanding:—something, as usual, about Apollo and Daphne. Is there no originality on the face of the earth? Mr. Lowell's total want of it is shown at all points—very especially in his Preface of rhyming verse written without distinction by lines or initial capitals, (a hackneyed matter, originating, we believe, with Frazer's Magazine):—very especially also, in his long continuations of some particular rhyme—a fashion introduced, if we remember aright, by Leigh Hunt, more than twenty-five years ago, in his "Feast of the Poets"—which, by the way, has been Mr. L.'s model in many respects.

Although ill-temper has evidently engendered this "Fable," it is by no means a satire throughout. Much of it is devoted to panegyric—but our readers would be quite puzzled to know the grounds of the author's laudations, in many cases, unless made acquainted with a fact which we think it as well they should be informed of at once. Mr. Lowell is one of the most rabid of the Abolition fanatics; and no Southerner who does not wish to be insulted, and at the same time revolted by a bigotry the most obstinately blind and deaf, should ever touch a volume by this author.* His fanaticism about slavery is a mere local outbreak of the same innate wrong-headedness which, if he owned slaves, would manifest itself in atrocious ill-treatment of them, with murder of any abolitionist who should endeavor to set them free. A fanatic of Mr. L.'s species, is simply a fanatic for the sake of fanaticism, and must be a fanatic in whatever circumstances you place him.

His prejudices on the topic of slavery break out every where in his present book. Mr. L. has not the common honesty to speak well, even in a literary sense, of any man who is not a ranting abolitionist. With the exception of Mr. Poe, (who has written some commendatory criticisms on his poems,) no Southerner is mentioned at all in this "Fable." It is a fashion among Mr. Lowell's set to affect a belief that there is no such thing as Southern Literature. Northerners—people who have really nothing to speak of as men of letters,—are cited by the dozen and lauded by this candid critic without stint, while Legaré, Simms, Long-

* This "Fable for the Critics"—this literary satire—this benevolent jeu d'esprit is disgraced by such passages as the following:

Forty fathers of Freedom, of whom twenty bred
Their sons for the rice swamps at so much a head,
And their daughters for—faugh!

street, and others of equal note are passed by in contemptuous silence. Mr. L. cannot carry his frail honesty of opinion even so far South as New York. All whom he praises are Bostonians. Other writers are barbarians and satirized accordingly—if mentioned at all.

To show the general manner of the Fable, we quote a portion of what he says about Mr. Poe :

Here comes Poe with his Raven, like Barnaby Rudge—
Three-fifths of him genius, and two-fifths sheer fudge ;
Who talks like a book of iambs and pentameters,
In a way to make all men of common sense d—n metres ;
Who has written some things far the best of their kind ;
But somehow the heart seems squeezed out by the mind.*

We may observe here that profound ignorance on any particular topic is always sure to manifest itself by some allusion to "common sense" as an all-sufficient instructor. So far from Mr. P's talking "like a book" on the topic at issue, his chief purpose has been to demonstrate that there exists no book on the subject worth talking about ; and "common sense," after all, has been the basis on which he relied, in contradistinction from the uncommon nonsense of Mr. L. and the small pedants.

And now let us see how far the unusual "common sense" of our satirist has availed him in the structure of his verse. First, by way of showing what his intention was, we quote three accidentally accurate lines :

But a boy | he could ne | ver be right | ly defined.
As I said | he was ne | ver precise | ly unkind.
But as Ci | cero says | he won't say | this or that.

Here it is clearly seen that Mr. L. intends a line of four anapaests. (An anapaest is a foot composed of two short syllables followed by a long.) With this observation, we will now simply copy a few of the lines which constitute the body of the poem ; asking any of our readers to read them if they can ; that is to say, we place the question, without argument, on the broad basis of the very commonest "common sense."

They're all from one source, monthly, weekly, diurnal...
Disparae all one's good and condense all one's poor traits...
The one's two-thirds Norseman, the other half Greek...
He has imitators in scores who omit...
Should suck milk, strong will-giving brave, such as runs...
Along the far rail-road the steam-snake glide white...
From the same runic type-fount and alphabet...
Earth has six truest patriots, four discoverers of ether...
Every cockboat that swims clears its fierce (pop) gundeck at him...
Is some of it pr—no, 'tis not even prose...
O'er his principles when something else turns up trumps...
But a few silly (sylo I mean) gisms that squat 'em...
Nee, we don't want extra freezing in winter...
Plough, dig, sail, forge, build, carve, paint, make all things new...

But enough :—we have given a fair specimen of the general versification. It might have been better—but we are quite sure that it could not have been worse. So much for "common sense," in Mr. Lowell's understanding of the term. Mr. L. should not have meddled with the anapaestic rhythm : it is exceedingly awkward in the hands of one who knows nothing about it and who will persist in fancying that he can write it by ear. Very especially, he should have avoided this rhythm in satire, which, more than any other branch of Letters, is dependent upon seeming trifles for its effect. Two-thirds of the force of the "Dunciad" may be referred to its exquisite finish ; and had "The Fable for the Critics" been, (what it is not,) the quintessence of the satiric spirit itself, it would nevertheless, in so slovenly a form, have failed. As it is, no failure was ever more complete or more pitiable. By the publication of a book at once so ambitious and so feeble—so malevolent in design and so harmless in execution—a work so roughly and clumsily yet so weakly constructed—so very different, in body and spirit, from anything that he has written before—Mr. Lowell has committed an irrevocable faux pas and lowered himself at least fifty per cent in the literary public opinion.

* We must do Mr. L. the justice to say that his book was in press before he could have seen Mr. Poe's "Remarks of Verses" published in this Magazine for November and December last.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND, from the Accession of James the Second. By Thomas Babington Macaulay. Volume Second. New-York. Harper & Brothers.

Since the sanguinary struggle, of which Captain Lemuel Gulliver has given us an account, between the Lilliputians and the Blefuscudians touching the proper manner of breaking eggs, we do not recollect anything so exterminating in its way as the warfare waged against the Harpers on account of the Websterian orthography, which they have seen fit to adopt in their edition of Macaulay's History. As we have already expressed an opinion of the general style of the work, we shall now confine ourselves to a few remarks on this Battle of the Spelling-books. It has been a very pretty little fight indeed. First came the Bostonians, crying out in Cliff Street for the missing consonant in traveler, and hitting the firm a very professional blow ; but as the Bostonians meditated another edition of the History, the attack was not perhaps as disinterested as it might have been. The hinc illas lacrymas was apparent enough. Then came the newspaper editors of Gotham, some of them excellent scholars and critics, letting fly their arrows in very spirited style. Then the Literary World opened its fire, the only fire that promised to do much damage to the enemy. Last of all, our New York correspondent brings to bear upon the unfortunate brothers Harper his effective piece of light artillery and gives them a little more grape with very commendable precision. Now, we do not hold the Harpers altogether excused for their alterations of the Longmans' text, but we think a good deal might be said in their defence, (or as they would have it, defense) and we regard the clamor that has been raised against them as so much misplaced indignation. Whether a play-house should be spelt theater or theatre we regard as a matter of too little consequence to cause such a terrible hubbub. The old dispute between ex and per was indeed something more than a mere syllabic contest, and yet we can not help thinking it was a silly business that men should fight for the difference,

"And Christians like Southey who stickle for oi, Cut the throats of all Christians who stickle for ou."

For ourselves we agree with our correspondent, that the alterations should not have been made, but we think the offence a venial one and we are not disposed to be fretted at it. At any rate we shall soon see what Macaulay himself thinks about it, for Harper & Brothers have written to ask his opinion. Let the public judgment be suspended at least till the great author speaks out.

We wish we had room to discuss the Websterian orthography, with its innovations, some of which we are disposed to approve, but such a task would require a much larger space than we can here devote to it. We like some of Dr. Webster's suggestions because we conceive that they will tend to bring the language to a point, at which it may continue for centuries without farther change. This may sound strangely in the ears of some who regard him as in league with those miscreants, the Phonotypists, to destroy the symmetry and beauty of the language; but we think the position a tenable one, and we shall perhaps endeavor at some future time to enforce it.

To go back to the Harpers, however, we think they deserve the thanks of every scholar, (let him spell as he may,) for their beautiful edition of Macaulay's History and we trust they will reap an abundant reward for their enterprize in securing early sheets by paying to the author a liberal compensation therefor.

The second volume of the history may be found at the store of A. Morris.

THE UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE: Conducted by the Students of the University of Virginia. Vol. I. No. 1. Charlottesville, January, 1849.

Eleven years ago, the students of our State University put forth a modest little brochure under the title of "The Collegian." The design of it was similar to that of the Eton boys in Mr. Canning's time as exhibited in the Etonian,—to furnish the undergraduates with an opportunity for practice in the art of English composition. The Collegian was born under the fairest auspices and continued for the space of four years to publish, every month during term time, 32 pages of printed matter, wherein the young gentlemen of the institution were encouraged to write didactic essays, sentimental love-tales and verses such as Horace and the Edinburgh Review have united in condemning. At the end of the fourth year, however, without any premonition of approaching death and without one word by way of valedictory, the Collegian suddenly expired, regretted by a very small circle of friends.

As we were among those friends, we are rejoiced to see its resuscitation in the neat publication before us, although its spirit has passed by some metempsychosis into another form and appears as the "University Magazine." We hail it with pleasure, for we believe it will prove an agent for effecting a high literary purpose within the shades of the University. Besides the severer discipline of the lecture-room, there should also be instruction and exercise in belles lettres, such as can only be acquired by practice in writing and such as the Professor, however able he may be, cannot wholly effect. The degree of "Master of Arts" will prove after all but a sad misnomer, if its recipient cannot write flexible and even elegant English.

The first number of the "University Magazine" presents an interesting variety of contents. There is a most readable sketch of the Swedish novelist, Fredrika Bremer, from an accomplished hand. The "Editorial Remarks" are well conceived and handsomely expressed. We wish the "University Magazine" the most abundant success and we call upon the Alumni of the University to lend it their patronage. To the Editors we tender most cordially the compliments of the quill, assuring them that one day they will feel the full force of the little scrap of Latinity which they have chosen for their motto, Hæc olim meminisse juvabit.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND from the Peace of Utrecht to the Peace of Paris. By Lord Mahon. Edited by Henry Reed, Professor of English Literature in the University of Pennsylvania. In two volumes. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1849.

The claims of Lord Mahon to be considered an impartial and able historian have been very decidedly acknowledged by the best English critics, and by none more so than the great reviewer Macaulay. We trust that the widespread popularity and rapid sale of the latter's great work will not interfere with the success of the Appletons' edition of Lord Mahon, although it must be confessed that it makes its appearance at a rather unfavorable moment. The events discussed by Lord Mahon, embracing a period of fifty years, must necessarily be treated by Macaulay in a more general manner to be in character with the other portions of his work, and we apprehend that a careful reading of both histories, collating them with one another, would conduce to a far more perfect understanding of the times than the perusal of only one of them. The present edition of Lord Mahon's book is beautifully printed and is rendered additionally valuable by the insertion of American notes from the pen of Professor Reed of the University of Pennsylvania.

Messrs. Nash & Woodhouse have it for sale.

A DICTIONARY OF THE GERMAN AND ENGLISH LANGUAGES, &c. Compiled from the works of Hilpert, Ffiegel, Grieb, Heyse and others. By G. J. Adler, A. M. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 200 Broadway. 1849.

Those who would become well versed in the noble language in which Faust and the Song of the Bell were written, will derive great assistance from this admirable dictionary. Indeed it may be regarded as the gateway which introduces us to the great domain of German literature, a domain rich in intellectual wealth, a vast El Dorado of mind. To say that the work before us is the best dictionary of the German and English languages that we have ever seen, is but justice to Professor Adler, whose labors in the New York University are well known and whose industry cannot be too highly commended. Besides the mere purposes of a lexicon, in giving the definition and accentuation of words, this work subverts to some extent the office of a grammar in presenting a list of German synonyms together with a classification of the irregular verbs. The beautiful typography and excellent paper of this dictionary, render it especially fitted for the shelf of the student's library.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE NEW YORK HISTORICAL SOCIETY. December, 1848. New York. William Van Norden, Printer, No. 39 William Street.

This is a neat monthly, chronicling the proceedings of a most useful and zealous Society, whose researches have done much towards shedding light upon the past history of Nieuw Amsterdam, the State of New York, and America in general. The present number contains, among other things, a curious and interesting paper, read before the Society in December, 1848, by Robert Greenhow, Esq., of Washington, D. C., tending to prove that Fénélon once resided in America as a missionary among the Iroquois. The evidences adduced are certainly very cogent, amounting almost to demonstration. It is a remarkable fact in the annals of biography, that it has been reserved for an American, one hundred and fifty years remote from the times described, to point out this strange and forgotten episode in the life of him whom Telemachus has immortalised.

THE LOMBARDO-VENETO KINGDOM.

Among the ten thousand gorgeous rooms in the proud palace on the Vatican Hill, there is one so quiet and retired, that neither the busy hum of the plodding world, nor the swelling cadences of St. Peter's gigantic organ ever reach its silent walls. The solitary window gazes upon the mournful Campagna, alive with ruins and eloquent in its majestic silence. Slowly wanders the eye over the desolate plain along the broken colonnades of ancient aqueducts, amid huge, gray tombs and ivy-covered monuments, until the blue ocean greets it far in the distance. The only sound heard is that of the homeless wind which sweeps by in gusts and wildly wails amid the fearful desolation. What lessons has that solemn scene taught man?

Within are assembled thirty-six of the Great on earth,—the youngest already bearing the silvery crown of venerable age—all clad in the purple of royalty. For they are the Princes of the Church—of that Church which claims to be the only true Church of the Christian's God. But care is on each brow and fear in each heart, for the Vicar of the Lord on earth has been called to lay down his triple crown at the foot of the throne of the king of kings, and who is there worthy among them to hold the keys of St. Peter? Days had passed by and nights had been spent in fervent prayer: they were slow to see the finger of God pointing at His elect. At last the decision came.

Before them stood one of the youngest of their number, whom Fate herself seemed to have marked as hers. A fearful disease had lowered the curtain of the eyelid over his right eye and given a ghastly hue to that side of his face, whilst his head was gently inclined towards his shoulder. But on that broad, lofty brow sat throned an intellect that had loved to muse on man's destiny, and on his full, eloquent lips played a winning smile which had charmed the hearts of all that had known him. His broad chest and tall, muscular figure gave him an air of imposing grandeur, well supported by the prominent, finely cut nose, and the large, brilliant eye. A few gray hairs peeped forth from under his white silk cap; while rich, silvery locks overshadowed his temples and added to the almost irresistible charm of an expression happily blending the lofty character of a profound thinker with the mild benevolence of a warm, sympathizing heart.

There was a feverish flush on his face and a nervous trembling on his upper lip, as he took vote after vote from the urn, and with a faltering voice read the name it contained. Eighteen times had he opened the mysterious scroll and eighteen times had the name of Mastai been proclaimed by him who bore it. The excitement was too great for him; breathless he sank into a chair and stammered a request that another cardinal might take his place, unmindful that this would have invalidated the whole proceeding and lost for him the unexpected triumph. Some of the younger fathers crowded around him, encouraging him with kind words, all the while exchanging significant glances with each other,—and after a pause he rose once again, and eighteen times more did his name appear in the urn. The modest, unknown bishop of Imola was Pope of Rome! Meekly did the new Chief of all Christendom bow his head in submission to the will of God, and choosing his new name, Pius IX., was proclaimed to the world as the successor of St. Peter!

The news was received with astonishment and consternation. Who was this young bishop, the least known of all cardinals, but a few days ago living in the retirement of a distant, obscure province? Would he follow the example of his predecessor, the hated Gregory, and be, like him, maintained on his throne only by the force of Austrian bayonets? Would he share with him the deep abhorrence which of late Rome had felt for the Head of the Church, both in his temporal and his spiritual capacity, and which nothing but a slight remnant of old reverence and the hope of God's speedy interference had prevented from breaking out in open rebellion? Would he, like Gregory, bend the energies of his mind and the resources of his States only to ward off for a few years longer the impending storm, and say like him in whose chair he was now seated, "after me the deluge!" With gloom in their features, and doubt in their hearts, did the distrustful Romans receive their new sovereign, and chilling silence was the welcome offered to him, who was ready to sacrifice all for their sake. But how the fickle people changed when his first proclamation appeared! The shades of night had already fallen on the Eternal City and restless, agitated masses filled the streets of old Rome, when suddenly torches were seen at the corners and joyous cries were heard passing from crowd to crowd. Huge placards were posted against the walls, lamps and fires were lighted around them, and with unbounded exultation did priests and lawyers read to the astonished people the Edict of full amnesty for all political prisoners. Six thousand sufferers, that Gregory, the priest of the God of Mercy, had left at his death in the dungeons of Rome, were thus at once set free! From parish to parish, from hill to hill spread the great news. All Rome assembled, and in the flickering light of the torches tears were seen streaming down the cheeks of brave men, who heard the words of grace and fell into each other's arms, thanking God and praising their new master.

There was a touching charm in the very words of the Father of the Church; the amnesty was full, unconditional; the Pope once more trusted to the honor of his beloved Romans! Who could resist such confidence?

House after house soon blazed in bright illumination, music resounded in every street, torches and bonfires lighted up the public squares, and when a voice rose above the tumult and cried out—"To the Monte Cavallo!" all Rome went to offer their heartfelt thanks to their forgiving father. This was the first token of sympathy for their new master, the spontaneous expression of their gratitude, and it was a proud moment indeed when Pius showed himself from the great balcony, and the hundred thousands sank down on their knees in the stillness of the night and he invoked the blessing of the Lord upon them and all their Christian brethren! Again and again did they crowd round his palace and listen to his words—words of strange sound and wonderful import, for they spoke of the morning dawn of liberty that was rising over Italy—over free, young, regenerated Italy! Shouts rent the air, and their hearts expanded, and a new light was given to them.

But the ninth Pius was not a man of words alone, and what he had promised he kept; he gave even more. Reforms in the administration, liberty of the press, the establishment of national guards, and the convocation of a National Assembly—all were granted in rapid succession.

That he granted too much and too rapidly, we cannot doubt—of this his expulsion from Rome furnishes incontestible evidence. Yet it was not weakness in him, for he knew how to refuse as well as to give, nor was it want of foresight. But, a courageous man, an upright ruler, he said, Fiat justitia, ruat coelum! Whether in this fall he himself would be buried, he did not stop to enquire. He has been crushed—Heaven itself seems to have declared against him and severely punished him for the mistake he committed in endeavoring to reconcile the liberal institutions which the spirit of the age calls for, with the pretensions of absolutism in an infallible ruler, imperatively demanded by the church. For thus he himself arrayed Church against State, and in the results of the struggle proved that the union of royalty and priesthood is impracticable in our age. As a sovereign he wished to do what the Head of the Church could not consent to, and unable to reconcile the claim of his two dignities he lost both.

He, however, had done his work and left his impress on the history of our century. A great potentate, the father of his people, the Head of the Roman Catholic religion, he could not proclaim himself favorable to political changes without raising a storm over all the lands where the crucified is worshipped. His words, a few magic words, kindled a fire that soon spread over Europe, and the ancient mother of civilization, awakened by their sound, once more rose from her long dreams, and the shouts from her seven hills once more stirred the still atmosphere from the Alps to Calabria. An impulse was given to the whole of Italy; the profound sensation which his first steps had excited, was soon followed by an open rising, and public, unanimous adhesion to his views and measures.

For the cry of liberty has rarely been heard in Italy, and from the day when great Cæsar fell at the foot of Pompey's statue, near two thousand years of slavery have passed over the Niobe of nations. Now, however, they were called upon by one of their own race, not a passionate monk like Savonarola, nor an ambitious patriot like Rienzi, but a wise, old father of the church, who fought under the banner of the Lord himself and proved his sincerity by his own sacrifice. So they rose, first, now as ever, in the volcanic South where the turbulent children of the Greek and Arab of old were always most ready and least prepared to break out in lawless rebellion. But in Palermo, in Messina and Catania, where the fiery blood of the Sicilian struck the first blow, the struggle was mainly between the oppressed and oppressor, a mere political struggle, for it was against their own native government that they turned their arms.

Far different was it in the North of Italy, where the iron yoke of the foreigner had for centuries borne heavily on the children of the soil. Here it was no mere question of political rights and social liberty; here we meet again with the combined causes of all the revolutions of 1848: the struggle for liberty and for nationality. When Lombardy rose and all Italy hastened to its aid, the banners under which their armies fought bore the inspired words of Independence and Unity! Here also, as in Germany, the people wanted to be themselves once more; how, under what form of government, they as yet but little cared. To be, to be what their history, their language, their national character justified them in claiming, was their one, common aim; "give us the Khan of Tartary as master," they said, "and we will accept him if he will make us free Italians again."

For eight centuries had the rough but strong German crossed the snow-covered Alps and come, an unbidden guest, to the fertile plains and luxurious gardens of the refined Lombard. Since the days of Charlemagne Germany's connection with Italy had continued only in the shape of mastery, and the easy indolence of the Southerner had ever made him a ready victim to the vigorous and intrepid Northman. Can we wonder that the son of the Roman, as he proudly called himself, hated the Teuton? And so, when after the great Emperor's downfall, the ministers of the Allies met in Vienna, and by the right of the conqueror gave to one of their number a hundred square miles and to the other a thousand souls, it was in vain that Italy pleaded the difference in language, race, religion and national character, which made an amalgamation with Germany forever impossible. The double-headed eagle of Austria was once more seen soaring over the rich lands of Lombardy, seventeen provinces with more than four millions of inhabitants were annexed to the imperial crown and even proud Venice hid her head in shame and saw the hated, despised Teuton revel in the palaces of her Dandolo and Foscari.

But Austria remembered that the world had once greeted her master as the great Roman Emperor, and tried to rule Italy as of old. Sedulously fanning and entertaining those fatal divisions and jealousies between the different parts of the ill-fated peninsula, she arrayed province against province and prince against people. With paternal care were her beloved children lulled to sleep; did not Austria watch for them? Thus, from Milan to Naples, from the Adriatic to the Mediterranean, her will was law and her word command. No step could be taken, no movement made, that the cabinet of Vienna had not approved. Parma, Lucca and Modena were governed by princes of the blood of Habsburg, or little more than lieutenants of Austria. Tuscany was hers, as long as a prince of the house of Lorraine reigned over her; the Bourbon in Naples was her ally by common blood and common interest, and even in the conclave at Rome her vote decided the choice of the Pope. Secret articles of treaties, made in the year 1816 and later, bound the sovereigns not to change their constitution without her consent, and her bayonets and her dungeons punished the unhappy patriot who, like Silvio Pellico and Maroncelli (the latter of whom died on our own free shores) loved their country more than the foreign tyrant. Thus, by habit, corruption or fear, Austrian agents were everywhere the true lords of the land, and the whole of Italy was held in absolute servitude. Not that Austria was a bad master as well as a cruel one; she cared well for her slaves. With good right could she boast that she spent millions for improvements, had built rail-roads, had opened a free port at Venice and had protected the material interests of the Lombardo-Veneto kingdom with great success; truly could her advocates say that in Lombardy, under her sceptre, property had become secure, commerce had regained confidence, the natural advantages of the soil had been improved, that a new and vigorous prosperity showed itself everywhere, whilst the population was rapidly increasing and the products of the soil even yielded an abundance for exportation. But did not the cannon planted before the Cathedral of Milan and the artillery with his burning match, speak of the brutal force of military despotism by which that peace and prosperity were alone secured? Were not the countless troops of fierce Croats and bold Husars, that thronged the market places, filled the taverns and rudely insulted the peaceful citizens a sore to their eyes from morn till night, year after year? Did they love to be judged by those who knew not their tongue nor the customs of their forefathers? Rail-roads did not restore to them the civil rights they had lost, nor did the police of Austria secure their property against the arbitrary will and the base injustice of her spies and subservient magistrates. And did not, above all, the grieving Lombard, already so firmly held in the trammels of superstition, feel that with the foreign usurpation there had come the curse of utter prostration of all moral vigor over his unhappy brothers? The Austrian did not care to interfere with the boundless profligacy of Italian manners; he was glad to see the nobility trying to drown all remembrance of their glorious ancestry in debauchery and dissipation, and the people sinking lower and lower until they had lost all faith in their neighbors and themselves.

But the whole fabric fell, as by magic, when the first faint cry of Liberty and Independence was heard on the banks of the Po. What the heaven-towering Alps could not exclude from Italy, that neither custom-houses nor guards could keep from entering Lombardy, and what power on earth could prevent the echo of the Appenines from repeating from mountain to mountain the cry of Emancipation which the Eternal City sent over all the lands where the sweet language of Italy is heard? It caused to vibrate in their hearts a chord that gave but one and the same note from Sicily to Genoa, and in palace and hut, on the sandy sea-shore and high on mountain-top, the terrified Austrian heard the ominous words: *Fuori gli stranieri!*⁴

Leaders, too, were not wanting; they arose from among their own countrymen, they hurried home from distant lands; for most of those that loved their country had sought an asylum abroad. There was Gioberti, the prophet, as his admiring countrymen love to call him, who, many years ago, when to dream of Italy was an offence, and to speak of liberty a crime, had dared to utter opinions touched with the romance of Italian independence. He was chaplain then to the king of Sardinia, and the court was struck with terror that such a viper should have been cherished in their midst, at the palace of the most absolute monarch in Europe. The Jesuits demanded his head and the poor abbé had to fly across the Alps and seek refuge in liberal Belgium. Poor, unknown and unobserved he there wrote pamphlet after pamphlet, all on his beloved native land; he wrote from necessity, but with all the force of genuine enthusiasm and the vigor of burning revenge. These feelings gave an irresistible power to his works; unprotected and uninvited, they found their way up the old father Rhine, through the carefully watched passes of the Alps into the palaces of the rich, the cell of the monk and the lowly hut of the peasant. They kept the fire of pure patriotism burning; they told the poor oppressed race of the glory of their forefathers and with the emphasis of firm conviction predicted the regeneration of Italy through a pope. That pope, they said, will be a liberal pope—the world had never heard of such a combination—and the princes of the land will be his children, and Charles Albert of Savoy the brave and triumphant champion of this great pontifical revolution!

This was written, printed and read by thousands in the year 1843, when Gregory XVI. still reigned, a genuine monk of the old school, who hated all change, and thought rail-roads the work of the Evil Spirit! Then followed a silence of several years—a silence, mysterious, impressive and touching. What were the sufferings of the poor patriotic exile? How he longed for his sweet home! How he pined away in mute grief! He dared not write to his friends, for his letter would have been their death-warrant, and what Italian would have dared to confide his letter to the fugitive to any Austrian post-office? But there was no true-hearted Italian, who, when he went abroad, did not travel from land to land and shore to shore until he had found the friend of his people, the hope of his country, in Paris, in Lausanne, in Brussels, or in London, and the words he brought home with him were dearer to all than precious pearls, and they flew from lip to lip, rousing the courage of those who heard them, and giving them confidence in their own strength and faith in the future. Then, after long silence, when Italy dared to hope once more, every year brought again a new work, every work brought new hope to Italy, and the very distance from whence they came and the mystery connected with them gave them additional force and authority. His theme was but one and ever the same: liberty and unity! He represented it, however, under two forms, as a religious idea, placing the pope at the head of the future confederacy and thus reconciling the greater portion of the clergy and winning favor with the mass of the people who were yet more than is credible under the influence of their priests, and as a national idea, claiming for the people independence from foreign usurpation and a federal union as the only form possible with the traditions and usages of Italy, finding its true centre again in the pope, although, perhaps, necessarily and at first, under the hegemony of one of the States of Upper Italy. He is of course the friend as he is the advocate of the King of Savoy and leads the numerous and powerful party of constitutional monarchists. His rival and violent political enemy is Guerazzi, one of the most popular prose authors of modern times, whose eloquent voice knew how to evoke the memory of the past and to inspire with hopes for the future. He also is an enthusiastic republican, anxious for the liberty and independence of his country, but seeking it by different means. If Gioberti sees in the pope a new Messiah and expects the salvation of Italy from him, Guerazzi considers him on the contrary the eternal cause of all the sufferings and humiliations which his countrymen have had to endure for centuries. Nothing but the establishment of republican forms of government he thinks can rescue Italy from longer slavery, nothing but a thorough convulsion, an entire overthrow of all that exists can permanently save her. His warm enthusiasm and his brilliant talents have rapidly raised him to high distinction and earned for him the admiration of all who think with him, but his violence and doubtful morals make him appear rather a dangerous friend of his country. Such no doubt is Mazzini, who shares his opinions but hesitates not to sacrifice every consideration of honor and faith to his favorite idea. He also advocates unity; not a union of princes and states but the unity of the whole Italian nation. Full of generous intentions and lofty aspirations his beautiful dreams intoxicate the youth of Italy, and they crowd around the man who, after long years of bitter exile, has come once more among them to triumph or to die with them. It was Mazzini, at the head of a legion of Italian Residents in Paris to whom Lamartine, at the Hotel de Ville, addressed some of those eloquent words that will live in history; it was Mazzini, who in his proclamation to the Lombards, told them that "every Italian must kill at least one Austrian, by night or by day, openly or secretly, in town or country, by a stone from the window, the stiletto in his sleeve, the rifle from the bush, the knife, the scythe or the airgun; that they must destroy all bridges, fell trees in the highroads, take up the rails of rail-ways; that every Italian must be a warrior, every woman a sister of charity for the wounded, and every child made to know how to roll a cartridge and how to use it against the accursed German."

At the head of the moderate party at last we find Matteucci, the learned Professor of Pisa, the well-known friend of the great Arago. He also is anxious to see his fatherland once more free and independent: he also wishes to see Italy one and united; but he prefers a confederacy of States according to their difference of race and historical development to a unity of the whole Peninsula under a common head and with the same institutions; he thinks the civilized citizen of Lombardy as little likely to benefit by the same laws and the same administration with the untutored shepherd of the Abruzzi as the refined, gentle Venetian with the fiery, ignorant Sicilian. He hopes that Austria may find it her interest to allow Lombardy to join a federal union of the Italian States with a self-elected sovereign, after having regulated her commercial relations and her common debt with her former master. These views, shared by a large and most influential portion of his countrymen and entertained by many a high-placed Austrian, he maintains and spreads with great tact and eminent success, both at home through the press and abroad in his capacity as minister to the Vicar of the German Empire. A worthy friend and active co-adjutor is Massimo d'Azeglio, a powerful writer and distinguished author, full of noble disinterestedness and the indefatigable champion of the national cause. If he differs from his friend in anything it is in his view that the political condition of a country is not the result of the arbitrary will of a few men, but depends on the social condition, the degree of moral and intellectual development of the people. The condition of the Italian nation as a whole, he thinks, would not give a Republic as result and therefore the establishment of too liberal institutions would only lead back again to absolute monarchy or to anarchy; a moderate, gradual development of political institutions in proportion to the capacities of the nation he considers the only true and sound policy of those who really love their country.

Men like these had, each in his way, for years devoted their talents, their means and their experience to a common cause and with indefatigable perseverance pursued the same plan: to excite in the people a feeling of their nationality, to disseminate among all classes liberal ideas and even to appeal to the governments for measures of progress and reform, as the only means to protect themselves against constant rebellions and the unceasing encroachment of the power of Austria.

In Piedmont their efforts were first and most successful, owing, no doubt, to the intense hatred the Piedmontese bears the German, and to the ardent desire of both the sovereign and his subjects, to see the House of Savoy raised high above the other princes of Italy.

In Tuscany, there had long reigned a spirit of toleration and a degree of civil liberty which made it quite an anomaly among the monarchies of Europe. Here, under the mild sceptre of a prince without talents, but also without striking defects, loved and respected by his people, neither noble nor priest had undue influence, neither military nor police were felt; here capital punishment was first abolished, personal liberty respected; commerce, arts and sciences flourished; the excellent soil in a superb state of cultivation secured its owners inexhaustible wealth and undeserved poverty was almost unknown within the grand-duchy. Thus there was an open field given to the patriotic exertions of Young Italy and the success which they obtained here surprised even their own party when the people at last rose and showed themselves in their true strength.

In the Papal States at last, the classic land of insurrections, they found powerful aids in the recollections which the people cherished of the liberty they had enjoyed under France's tri-color, and in the truly fearful government of the Popes in the so-called Legations. These were, since 1832, ruled by permanent military commissions which virtually decimated the unhappy population by death, hard labor in chains, imprisonment or banishment. Here, where anarchy seemed to be organized, Massimo d'Azeglio, as early as 1844, travelled for seven months from town to town and hamlet to hamlet speaking to the people with irresistible eloquence of their former greatness, equalled only by their present disgrace, until their cries of indignation pierced even the walls of the Vatican and made the fearless orator an exile from his own country.

Thus the people were not unprepared when the Pope's magic words suddenly inspired them with new hope and new courage. Wherever the word of liberty had been heard—and where had it not been?—the masses rose, and in rapid succession Florence, Pisa and Genoa obtained the same rights as Rome and rejoicings were heard all over Italy. Naples gave vent to its long pent-up agony, Sicily demanded its new constitution, Tuscany and Piedmont saw their princes grant readily all their demands, Milan was forsaken by her governor and viceroy, and the first step towards uniting the interests of all was taken by a treaty between Rome, Tuscany and Sardinia, commercial in its form, but in reality the basis of a political union, of which Pius IX. was the head and the heart, and Charles Albert the sword and the shield. Thus united by common aspirations and common danger, the nation rose against her oppressors, and for the first time in the history of Italy, princes were found on the people's side.

It was a noble sight, well worthy of admiration, when the whole population thus awoke from long alumber, under the influence of the same inspiring thought of war and devotion to their sacred cause. All Italy seemed to pour down like a torrent into the Julian Alps; from the North and the South there came troops and ammunition—Rome and Naples sent their 12,000, Tuscany her 5,000, and even Sicily herself, threatened and bleeding, sent men and arms against the hated Austrian. The famous princess Belgiojoso landed at Genoa with a band of Calabrian volunteers, equipped and maintained at her expense; priests and monks threw off their gowns and girded on the sword; the sons of the noblest of the land secretly left their homes and entered the ranks; officers threw up their commissions or ran the risk of being punished as deserters to carry the musket against the foreign tyrant, and fathers, gray-haired men, left their wives and children to enlist under the banner of Italian liberty. In March, (1848,) all Lombardy was in open rebellion and seemed but one enormous camp covering the whole land between the Po and the Alps.

The news of the French revolution had fallen like a bomb-shell into the Carnival at Rome, and hardly had the people recovered from their surprise when Metternich, the great, the feared Metternich, fell, and the Emperor was driven from his beloved city! Now the enthusiasm of the Italian knew no bounds. The crusade against the accursed Austrian was openly preached, the banner of the red cross was unfurled and the whole people swore to shake off the yoke of the foreigner.

City after city rose in arms; in vain did the brave Radetzky declare the whole of Lombardy under martial law and call in his thirty thousand fierce Croats—the Austrian troops were compelled to leave the cities where they had so long played the rude master, and driven from every asylum, fleeing before an unarmed but heroic population, they sought refuge in the strong citadels which Austrian foresight and a tyrant's fear had long since prepared and armed for such an emergency.

Among them was the citadel of Milan, a proud and stately pile of buildings, full of grim, old palaces and well-stored arsenals; its walls and turrets bristling with cannon, its barracks crowded with Austria's bravest soldiers, and at their head the Sclavonian, whose bronzed features and grizzly hair spoke of a life of battles and sieges. A stern master he had ever been to his soldiers, but he was a brave captain, and many were the victories he had won and numberless the towns he had taken in the service of his venerated lord and master, the chief of the House of Habsburg. Amid the crash of falling thrones and the roar of revolutions the grim old hero stood unmoved; in vain did they point out to him the rising nations and the exiled kings—in vain did they argue, beg, pray,—he knew but one law, his duty, and that he was determined to fulfil, even should he and his armies perish in the attempt. For around him a people had risen to fight for their liberty and their independence; troops poured in from North and South; city after city was lost to the cause of loyalty, and the waves rose higher and higher until they threatened to swallow up even the proud citadel that held out longest and the firm old chieftain with his faithful band of tried soldiers.

And the storm did rise, suddenly, fearfully. Many had been the encounters between the haughty Austrian and the revengeful Lombard. Sixty unarmed citizens had fallen on one day under the sword of the ruthless soldiery and in the evening the officers gave a brilliant supper in honor of the disgraceful victory! Milan rose. Dense, excited, but silent crowds filled the public squares and streets, women stood anxiously watching at window and door, and children, awe-struck, sought refuge in the sanctuary of their homes. For without they were at work; barricades had risen over night; hundreds were armed and uniformed—no one knew how and when; weapons were displayed and cannon planted, and past the palaces of governor and viceroy they marched in thousands—their white-haired podesta, Count Casiti, at their head, to implore the blessing of God at the old cathedral. There before the high altar stood the venerable archbishop, surrounded by his clergy, and with trembling voice and tearful eye he recommended them to the mercy of the Almighty and prayed His aid in the sacred cause for which they were about to lay down their lives.

Then came the dreadful struggle. For five days they fought from street to street—from barricade to barricade; for five days uninterruptedly cannon balls poured down the beautiful streets of Milan; file after file sank never to rise again, but as they fell others stepped in their places. Fair women were seen on the flat roofs of houses, and from carved balconies, throwing down upon the enemy whatever their feeble hands could raise, and encouraging their husbands, brothers and friends as they waded through the blood that covered the marble slabs on the great square. Most gallant were the efforts made by those men and brilliantly did the spirit of the people prove itself equal to the sacred cause for which they fought. Hundreds fell, thousands were wounded, but they died, the name of their country on their lips and liberty on their last breath. At last victory was theirs and Radetzky, even Radetzky himself, had to leave Milan at the head of sixteen-thousand men!

Great was the rejoicing in the city of the iron crown, and once more did the red, green and white banner of free Italy wave over the ill-fated capital, the most luckless town on earth, that had been forty times besieged, twenty times burnt, four times almost levelled with the ground, and had still ever risen again to magnificence! Great was her triumph, but short her liberty, for the curse of the defeated chieftain brought bitter fruit for her citizens!

Twenty millions of Italians applauded the heroic deed and all Lombardy united in a common league against the enemy, formidable even in his defeat. Florence, Genoa, Pisa, even proud Venice followed the glorious example of the capital of Lombardy; a bloodless revolution changed the government of Parma, where Charles Louis of Bourbon had reigned; the sovereign of Modena, Francis V., sought safety in flight and the remaining provinces were at once and by acclamation annexed to Tuscany. Soon, however, the necessity of a leader became evident and all eyes were turned to the only national prince that Italy had, to Charles Albert of the royal house of Savoy. His was the prestige of a long lineage of noble ancestors; for whilst the sovereigns of Italy were feeble men and weak instruments in the hands of foreign powers, his illustrious house had exhibited a long and almost unbroken line of princes remarkable for political sagacity as well as for gallantry in the field. Theirs had been for centuries the perilous, but honorable task to guard the passes that lead over the Mt. Cenis and the Mt. Génèvre into Italy. Thus constantly in arms, ever watchful and ever ready to repel invasion, they had been the brave leaders of a warlike people; but they had been wise regents also, and Charles Albert had well prepared for the future. His army, amounting to nearly 150,000 men, was well known in Europe as one of the best in every respect, commanded by officers grown gray in the Neapolitan wars, or by the well-bred and well-taught nobles of Piedmont and Savoy; his navy was, if not formidable, at least the best of any Southern power, and his finances were the admiration and envy of all princes. He himself was a man of strong frame and hardy constitution; active and abstemious—a stranger to the pleasures of the world, faithful to his duties and had given good proof of his bravery and skill as a General when commanding a division of French troops in the Spanish wars. For many years had he made active preparations for the great crisis which his unsurpassed foresight and sleepless ambition foresaw with comparative certainty, and but one element had been wanting to endear him to his people and to make him the hero of all Italy. He knew, with a rare wisdom that older heads might well envy him, how to create even this, by giving a liberal constitution to his people, when yet the whole continent was praising Absolutism. The reward came sooner than even he had hoped, for he thus secured his kingdom in the midst of the general trembling of Europe and laid the first foundation for the future grandeur of Italy. And when France offered her young, uncontrollable troops to young, rising Italy, and Charles Albert with simple dignity replied to her offers, "Italy will take care of herself;"* the patriotic words kindled a fire of enthusiasm in the breast of every Lombard, and they chose him for their common head and chieftain. For they wanted to unite all Italy, at least for the uncertain times of war, under the rule of one of their own sovereigns, and whom could they choose but him of the only Italian royal house? What state was better fitted to form a nucleus for the concentration of all the scattered and divided strength of Italy than old, royal, constitutional Piedmont with its brave army, its flourishing exchequer, its contented people, and the command of those passes which might be the open door for the generous friend, or the mountain-grave for the daring invader? So they tried to forget the past—for there are dark days and grievous wrongs in the early life of the Prince of Carignan—and gave their destiny into his hands. All was fortunately prepared; the order was given, and three days afterwards the King of Italy, as flattering Italians called him, crossed the frontiers of Austrian Lombardy and marched his troops to the walls of Milan. Thousands and thousands of volunteers increased his army; Rome sent fourteen thousand under the brave and modest Durando; the Count Caccia furnished alone a regiment of dragoons and the Visconti armed and equipped a brigade at his own expense; from Pisa and Padua students came under the command of their professors, and even distant Calabria and the gorges of the Abruzzi sent their wild sons to fight under the banner of the Piedmontese.

It was high time too that succor should come to Lombardy, for Austria had sworn to reconquer her rebellious provinces, and Radetzky had not rested. In Verona, the friends of Austria, mostly noblemen, had appealed to the people to let the fugitive army, who asked only permission to leave the scene of their disgrace, pass through their city—and when the compassionate Veronese assented, the imperial army entered with flying colors and in triumph, thus possessing themselves of one of the strongest places in Northern Italy. What the nobility had done in Verona, a bishop did not disdain attempting in Mantua. In his priest's robes he wandered as a messenger of the God of Mercy from group to group, persuading his beloved children to let him arrange all with the commander of the Austrian troops, who threatened to besiege their town. They trusted in his white hair, they confided their lives and their homes to the sacred minister of the Lord—and then saw a fierce army, burning with the desire of revenge and filled with intense hatred, enter their city and treat Mantua as a conquered fortress! Thus, by base treachery, the imperial army held once more four of the strongest cities of Lombardy, and Radetzky occupied the famous triangle of Mantua, Verona and Peschiera, with its basis on the Adige, which from the times of Brune and Napoleon to Eugene in 1814, all great Generals had occupied, whilst General Nugent with a formidable army descended from Udine and threatened Venice, already blockaded by a large fleet of several frigates and twenty war-steamers.

Then the struggle began once more. Radetzky approached nearer and nearer; his powerful army burning with the desire to wipe out the disgrace of Milan and to reduce the rebellious subjects of their Emperor. A vague fear crept over the Milanese, and with a shudder did they see long columns of black smoke rise all around the distant horizon, the fearful signal of the common enemy. Where was the Sword of Italy, where was Charles Albert who had promised to protect and to save them? The thunder of the Austrian cannon was their only answer. In the country, all around Milan, terror and despair prevailed; the villages were deserted and the high-roads filled with families, carrying scanty provisions and their most cherished household goods; the young and the strong, dark gloom in their faces and fear fettering their tongues, marched on hurriedly, without listening or turning aside. Then followed the aged, and the children nestling in their mothers' bosom; even the sick and the maimed were borne on the broad shoulders of a dutiful son or loving father. Yes, did they not bring the dead to be buried under the shade of the great cathedral of Milan, for fear that the ruthless Austrian would not spare even the lifeless in the silent grave? Now and then a troop of soldiers would pass by, eagerly straining their eyes to see the colors of Italy flying yet from steeple and campanile, but slowly progressing, for they had marched long and with anxious speed; they had suffered from bitter want and exhausting fatigue. Still they were not cast down; there was military ardor in their emaciated faces, their eyes flushed with enthusiasm whenever the evening breeze unfurled the white banner with the red cross; and when the young noblemen of Naples or the students of Pisa and Padua passed by, there were heard snatches of bold war-songs from their pale lips until their strength was exhausted, and with eyes still turned to Milan, they sat down on the wayside, or knelt before the little chapel under the huge centenarian oak. There were no shouts of joy, no music and pomp to receive them in the threatened city; but with a warm grasp and a murmured welcome they were taken by the hand and made the children of Milan.

There was an anxious silence in the capital of Lombardy and a calm and dignified air did the noble city bear. Suddenly a rumor spread from street to street, the Sword of Italy is near, Milan is saved! So it was; during the night, unheard and unseen, Charles Albert had approached, and was, even now,* encamped near the gate that leads towards Rome. Near fifty thousand men had he brought with him; joy and confidence returned to the oppressed hearts of the Milanese and with gladdened faces did they say to each other: "Charles Albert has not forsaken us—God bless Charles Albert!"

But soon new fears arose; they knew the Piedmontese had come—but why did they not hear their cannon roar—why did not the troops enter the gates of the city—why did the king himself not come to meet his friends and allies? Still they gave not at once way to such vague apprehensions, but energetically prepared for the siege. Provisions were hoarded up for months, ammu-ation was distributed and held ready, workmen and soldiers poured in from the country, and the neighboring towns, Monza, Sienna and Lecco, sent their national guards to aid their powerful sister. Fortifications, strong and skilfully laid out, rose rapidly in every direction; the noble trees on the old ramparts, that had been the delight of the traveller and the pride of the citizen, were cut down, the palaces and large mansions were occupied by imposing forces, the place d'armes converted into a fortified camp with its ditches, redoubts and palisades, and the gates of the city walled up, with the exception of those through which long rows of wagons loaded with provisions continued to pour in. Every house was a fortress, every household a well-provisioned garrison—prepared to die, but not to surrender.

On the following day a review was held of the national guard, and still Charles Albert did not appear; he pleaded in excuse his vow not to enter the city as long as there was an Austrian to be found on this side of the Alps! It was a glorious sight, this army of patriots, ready to die for their country; there were the thirty-three banners of the parishes of Milan, there the volunteers from Piedmont in their handsome uniform, there the Calabrese and Roman in his well-known, picturesque costume, and at their side the guards of all the sister-towns with a large and well-appointed park of artillery: there were at last the whole population, men, women, and children, animated by the same feeling and prepared to lay down their lives for the common cause. But in the midst of their rejoicings a distant cannonade was heard; it came nearer and nearer until the fiery shells passed over the high walls and fell into the city. The Austrian had come! There was no time then to ask, how could he approach so suddenly and unobserved, and where is the Piedmontese army? Rapidly gathering up their arms and rallying around their sacred banner, a few regiments made a sally, and meeting the imperial troops at the very gates of the city, threw them back upon the main body of the army and returned in triumph with five guns and several hundred prisoners. But the city did not indulge in vain rejoicings; they knew that Milan was in danger, and when the next morning broke there were barricades in every street, formed from stones of the pavement and from costly furniture and gilded carriages; mines had been laid near the gates and the points most likely to be attacked, and the whole city appeared a forest of small fortresses and citadels. All night had Milan been illuminated; all night had the national guard been under arms on the walls, whilst the people had built barricades—and even Charles Albert had sought a refuge in the palace Greppi in the very centre of the town.

Again, however, dark suspicions agitated the excited multitude. There was an awful silence in the Piedmontese camp: not a soul was seen stirring in the palace of the king. Vague rumors ran through the city, and with pale face and shy look did they whisper them into each other's ear. What says that man with the large cockade and military look? Ere the last word has fallen from his lips he sinks down stabbed by a hundred daggers. How could he dare to think that the sword of Italy could forsake the old city, that Charles Albert could capitulate! Another came with the same news and he shared the same fate. But when message after message came and they could not doubt the incredible report any longer, when they rushed to the Porta Romana and found that the Piedmontese army had really abandoned them to their enemies, that all civil, all military officers had left them, and that the Croats of Radetzky would enter their beloved city on the same evening, then deep, overwhelming consternation seized them, and the sudden transition from almost certain victory to humiliation so disgraceful maddened them with grief. Men wept and cared not to hide their faces, women ran with cries of anguish from house to house and pressed their babes to their bosom, and more than one gray-haired man bowed his head never to raise it again, when he heard the fearful news. Soldiers rushed to the king's palace, overthrew and trampled down the battalions standing before it to protect their monarch, broke the carriages that were ready to carry him away, and with voices of mingled rage and indignation commanded the king to appear before them and to tear the capitulation in pieces. He excused his rash act by saying that his councillors had informed him of the reluctance and utter inability of the Milanese to defend their city; but now, seeing the truth, he would stand by them and fight at their head as long as a drop of blood was left in his veins!—At twelve o'clock of that same night an officer was secretly let down one of the side windows of the palace to call in two faithful regiments, and under the shelter of night, fired upon by his own subjects and breaking his sacred word did the king of Sardinia escape from the city of Milan!

They could not believe such treachery; they could not comprehend the extent of their misfortune. For not only was the city left without protection, but she was equally bereaved of all government and guidance; not only was the Piedmontese army gone and with it the officers commanding in the city, but their own artillery had been taken, their own ammunitions had been carried away and the four millions of florins, obtained by the sale of the plate and jewelry of patriotic citizens, had followed the king in his flight! Then came the order of General d'Aspre—old Radetzky, to the glory of his name, did not trust his self-control to enter in triumph the city he hated—that at noon His Majesty the Emperor's troops would march in, and that all men who had not left the city before the same evening would be forthwith enrolled in Croat regiments and sent across the Alps. Thus did Christian nations in the year of our Lord 1848 carry on war!

Again were the high-roads and by-ways filled with anxious crowds, and long columns of emigrants of every age, sex and condition, with tears in their eyes and bitter grief in their hearts, went forth, homeless and helpless, into the wide world. When they reached the end of the large plain that stretches to the Eastward, the vast multitude, with one accord, turned round once more to look upon their fair city with her proud churches, but the sky was red over Milan, dark clouds of smoke covered their deserted home and hung a veil of charity over the fearful scenes that followed the entry of the fierce Austrians.

With Milan fell all Lombardy; at Verona, at Mestre, everywhere the Piedmontese troops were defeated and a reign of terror, unparalleled in the history of modern warfare, cast dark gloom over the North of Italy. So exorbitant were the contributions levied on rich and poor, so cruel the treatment of guilty and innocent, so unchristian the oppression of Austria, that France and England, almost uncalled for, insisted upon an armistice until a congress of the great powers of Europe should have settled the difficulties between the emperor and his rebellious subjects. Radetzky retained, of course, military possession of the Lombardic provinces, but was to leave the Italians at liberty to develop their political institutions. Both parties complain of the bad faith, with which the conditions of the armistice have been observed; the hand of the master, restrained only by the respect due to the Great Powers, weighs heavily on city and country, whilst the Italian with his proverbially dark and tortuous character, hesitates little to use means, fair and foul, to satisfy his hatred against the oppressor. In the meantime Italy has been for the rest of the year falling from one crisis into the other—almost her only hope being the cheering words of Gioberti, that Christian nations never die! But her fate has been a sad one, and fearful are the sufferings, deserved and undeserved, she has endured since the fatal battle of Verona. The brilliant dreams of her political regeneration are rapidly passing away and leaving bitter disappointment, a galling consciousness of everlasting disgrace on all minds. Italy has not risen in a body. There is no genuine unity in the Peninsula. From the days of the Longobards, through all the centuries of brightest renown, when Republics flourished and popes revived the divine arts, the spirit of municipal hatred has, in its very intensity, ever been the moving spirit of action. Century after century saw the States of Italy invoke the aid of the foreigner against their own brethren; now the Spaniard reigned in Naples, now the Frank; then was the Guelf sent for to rule in Rome and then the Ghibelline to reign in Milan; Genoa, Venice and all the Republics, by law, compelled their chief magistrate to be of foreign birth, and the yoke of the stranger was always preferred to the more inventive tyranny of the native Italian. It is in these intestine animosities, in this hatred of province against province and town against town that we see the principal cause of the failure of those bright visions of invincible union which were so ardently cherished by national vanity. The spirit of jealousy everywhere paralyzed what patriotism and love of liberty had achieved. Sicily would not unite with Naples, Venice not with Lombardy, nor noble with simple citizen, or burgesse with peasant. The nobility to whom, under Austrian rule, nothing had been left but the frivolous life of the man of the world or the peaceful occupation of the farmer were unable to furnish warriors and statesmen; the middle classes fretted under the restless vanity and anxious jealousy of the aristocrats, whilst the people, excited by the cry of national independence and Italian glory, completely unnerved by long oppression and little attached to existing institutions, were easily led from one extreme to the other. Their temperament, so peculiarly susceptible of great undertakings which dazzle their fancy or inflame their enthusiasm, led them to attempt enterprises which their nerves and their energies did not enable them to execute. With disappointment came despondence; brilliant deeds of arms were followed by most disgraceful cowardice. The press, that most powerful of all modern levers, held for generations in utter insignificance, mistook from the beginning of the movement, license for liberty and became the most dangerous friend that rising Italy ever had. Studiously concealing whatever might be unfavorable to their particular views, the thousand newspapers that sprang up over night under the direction of returning exiles and fugitives, hesitated not deliberately and systematically to deceive the people and thus to deserve the name of the most unprincipled press of Europe. Instead of enlightening the people on those principles of self-government which must necessarily be new to those who ever since 1700 had been subjects of Europe's most absolute monarchy, instead of implanting a pure and unselfish patriotism, feelings of duty and honor in the breasts of the Lombards, they became the vile instruments of passionate factions and ambitious politicians and thus the first Italian crusade—for a second is close at hand—was completely defeated by want of energy and a spirit of jealousy, intrigues and declamations. There is still less hope now for the establishment of a federal union, even under the form of a constitutional monarchy. There were, it is true, Parliaments held at Turin, Rome, Venice and all the Lombardic cities—but in all, the independence, the aggrandizement of their own municipality was the paramount thought; none would yield to the other, in none could even the different parties come to an understanding on the first principles of future action. In vain did men like Gioberti, who undoubtedly stands at the head of all the ruling men of Italy, in vain did even Guerazzi and Massimo insist upon the necessity of unity; the Lombards were reluctant to join Piedmont, and Venice hesitated to enter the Lombardic league; there is, in fact, no good faith between the different parts of the confederacy. In this respect the Italy of our day is precisely the Italy of the middle ages; the famous cunning, the deservedly infamous diplomacy of former centuries prevails yet; Machiavellis are still opposing Borgias, the Viscontis wrestle yet with the house of Savoy and modern republicans are not more scrupulous than their ancestors—but the lofty, noble character of those ages is no longer there.

A constituent assembly for all Italy has met in Turin; but on what basis? Delegates have attended from Rome, Sicily, Naples and all Upper Italy, but they have no mandate from their sovereigns, who view them as little better than rebels, nor are they duly elected by their constituents—they are the representatives only of the different clubs with which Italy abounds. Their sole support is the force of public opinion—but is there a public opinion of all Italy existing? In their body also we find the two parties which divide the nation, those who wish for a one, united Italy, a party, represented as socialist, communist and infidel, but strengthened and encouraged by the indiscriminate amnesty of the pope, and those who prefer a federal union under the hegemony of the Lombardo-Venetian crown. Candidates for the latter also are not wanting; the Prince of Canino, the French president's hot-brained cousin is the rival of the King of Sardinia and his second son, the Duke of Genoa, who but lately refused the crown of Sicily. The meetings of the Assembly have for sometime been held in secret and thus little information about its doings has as yet crossed the Alps.

In the mean time the land suffers more than centuries will be able to repair. Tuscany, but lately so prosperous and happy, is overrun with lawless banditti and disbanded soldiers; Lombardy, the most fertile province of Italy, the most densely populated and the most opulent country of Europe, sees her plains untilled and uncared for; trade and commerce are extinct, travellers dare not bring their annual tribute to ancient Rome, employment is wanting and the whole population is discontented, rendered dissolute by idleness and demoralized by the constant, feverish excitement of all their passions. Two hundred thousand Lombards sought refuge in Piedmont and Switzerland; the poor alone remained. Milan has lost one third of its inhabitants; its nobles are reduced to poverty, its citizens are starving; Genoa, the superb, with its mixed, turbulent population, is in a state of uninterrupted anarchy, robbers and murders abound, and even the army is utterly demoralized. Florence, the flower of cities, with its cabinet of novelists, poets and exiles, whose ideas have not followed those successive modifications which constitute the progress of public opinion in a nation, pays the penalty for the mild execution of the laws and the gentle but weak character of its people.

There is but one city in all Italy whose fame is untarnished, whose flag still waves on her towers and whose freedom no tyrant has yet been able to break. It is Venice, fair Venice, whose winged lion once more looks down upon his bride, the Adriatic, and whose republican citizens, so long considered the very types of degradation, servility and corruption, have given their Italian brethren, all Europe, an example of truly admirable heroism. For months and months they are closely besieged; every day they hear the roar of the enemy's cannon and see the balls dance over the placid sheet of their harbor. Deprived of all resources, since their soil produces not a blade, abandoned by allies, whose assistance they purchased with their independence, and with no friend but the God of their fathers, they despair not, and willingly sacrifice their last olola to resist their hated enemy. They are resolved to suffer all, to sacrifice all, rather than to surrender their liberty.

Venice came last of all Italian cities under the dominion of Austria; whilst Milan had been a precious jewel in the Habsburg's crown ever since 1700, Venice was free until 1814, when she was weak enough to believe the promises of Francis I. and Metternich and of her own free will, agreed to form part of the Lombardo-Veneto kingdom under Austrian protection. She was cruelly deceived. The splendor of the old Republic lived still in the memory of many a proud citizen, whose family had given senators, councilmen and doges to the island-city; the penury of the low and the corruption of all classes of society were forgotten, the luxury and brilliancy of the high and the powerful alone were remembered. But when Venice had twice been robbed by the French and plundered to the last coin, when her palaces were crushed into ruins and her honor and glory had departed from her forever, there was desolation among her ruins and grief among her citizens. Her sluggish canals were no longer covered with mysterious gondolas, whose boatmen sang stanzas from Tasso, whilst the fisherman of Murano, far out on the Lido, sent back the alternate verse; their sluggish waters were stagnant, their beds choked with mud. Her harbor, that once saw proud fleets ride at anchor and vessels from all parts of the world bring tribute to San Marco, was filled with sand and rubbish, and young Trieste allured the richly laden ship to her safe, commodious port. Her palaces, the admiration of the world, with their balconies of stone and their strange, wonderful architecture, half Saracen, half Gothic, with their ogive windows and columns of white and red marble, their sculptured capitals, their painted plafonds, their invaluable stuccos, stood now with doors and windows open to sun, wind and rain, and presented a sight of such melancholy, that even the stranger wept over it, and the Venetian preferred death abroad to life at home. Her ruinous and forlorn suburbs, once filled with gorgeous villas and magnificent gardens, now harbored a poverty-stricken people, unhappier yet in the memory of by-gone days than in their present misery. In 1814 she counted over fifty-thousand paupers, among whom were the noblest of the land, the proudest of the golden book, and the Jew alone was seen to flourish amid the general decay.

Here also, it must be confessed, Austria cared well for her new subjects; under her rule Venice rose once more from apparently irreparable ruin to the rank of one of the first commercial cities of Europe. Commerce returned to her port, now a free port, princes and sovereigns came to reside in her palaces, a numerous garrison, the whole costly apparatus of an independent administration, brought large sums of money to her impoverished inhabitants, and civil splendor gratified once more their love of public festivities. Venice rose like a phoenix from its ashes.

But the people had never forgotten that they had once been free. Endowed by nature with uncommon sensibility, everything in the festive nation surrounding them, had directed their minds to poesy and those arts which elevate the soul, refine the taste, but refine also the perceptions and make them more acute, more susceptible of pain and disappointment. Thus, when the Venetian walked through his narrow streets, whose solemn quiet no carriage-wheel ever disturbed, and looked up to the monuments of former glory, to the gorgeous palaces of his ancestors, the stately churches, the rich convents and the splendid national buildings, he began to reflect on the singular fate of his beloved fatherland. Besides, every Venetian reads, and reads by preference the most exquisite, the most sublime of his great poets. What boatman on the lagunes—what idler on the street-corner does not know by heart the grandest passages of Ariosto and try to imitate them in eloquent improvisations? They saw at one glance, why their illustrious families lived miserably in exile; why their beautiful palaces belonged to foreigners; why the stranger on their wharves looked amazed at their wretchedness and poverty; why their arsenal was no longer filled with thousands of skilful workmen; why their merchants failed or went to Trieste—the answer was simply the more conclusive as it touched the most sensitive chord of their hearts, their ardent patriotism:—the Austrian reigned in Venice! They felt it less at first, for the old Republic had little accustomed the people to participate in the affairs of the State, or to meditate deeply on their relation to their rulers. And when the Empire of San Marco disappeared before the victorious will of France, the people, again taken by surprise, were the less disheartened, as the feeling of nationality, nowhere in Italy strong, had least of all existed in Venice; there had been no attachment binding the Venetian to his government; fear had been their true master, and thus the fall of their Council made little impressions on the citizens at large. Then came Austria with promises to restore that liberty to the old Queen-City of which the French had deprived her.

But when Pius IX. ascended the throne of St. Peter, and openly acknowledged the rights of all Italians, his magic words found an echo in the heart of every Venetian. The example of the Lombardic cities was not lost upon them. The brutal treatment of the prince of Canino, who had come to preside over the last scientific Congress and whose journey had been a succession of ovations, excited general and profound indignation. Then came that touching tragedy in which two sons of Venice's proudest family, the Bandeira, hardly grown to man's responsibility, paid, with their lives, for an hour of rash, youthful enthusiasm. Who knows not the brief, but sad history of these fair, ingenuous children of the Austrian admiral? But less is it known that, when he heard how his noble and brave sons had been hanged like the basest of the base, he sent his resignation to the Emperor and was immediately subjected to a system of persecution which has been as constant as cruel. Their loving mother never knew of her sweet children's disgrace; she was told that both had perished during a storm on board the frigate in which they served. Little did she reflect how improbable the story was, for with her sons she had lost the control of her mind.

A catastrophe like this, falling upon an illustrious family, endeared to the people by signal services and private virtues, could not fail to have its effect on the nation. Such misfortune gives an almost sacred character to those whom God chastises so severely, and the Venetian nobleman became once more the pride of the State, the idol of the people. The noble deeds of their ancestors were proudly enumerated, and the triumphs and victories of the Republic rose once more in brilliant colors before the ever active fancy of those who had for many years already lived in the Past alone, cut off, as they were, from the continent by their insular position and the jealous policy of their tyrannic masters.

The excitement soon grew to such a height, that it needed only one of those paltry incidents which former historians and short-sighted contemporaries look upon as the causes of great revolutions, to lead to a general rising. It is a fact strikingly characteristic of the Venetian and his hot blood, that not a word fell, not a threatening gesture was seen—but people and soldiers, the passionate children of the soil and the brutal hirelings of Austria merely measured each other with challenging looks, and the moment after, the bayonets were lowered, stones flew in all directions, several citizens fell, and the combat ceased only when the last purple ray of the setting sun gilded the graceful belfry near the San Marco. But the struggle was only begun; Austria displayed a truly formidable army to hold the rising city in subjection, and the two leaders of the people were thrown into the dark dungeons of those ancient prisons in which so many thousands have perished. Manin, an advocate, distinguished by his talents and probity, had often already won the admiration of his countrymen by his brilliant and energetic eloquence: while his warm, pure patriotism had gained him their hearts and their gratitude. Tommaseo, born in Dalmatia, is not only like Manin, an orator and a patriot: he is also a profound thinker, and an author of high distinction. Piety without intolerance, a lively and poetic imagination, and vast learning are united in him with a noble, lofty character. It had been his well-deserved good fortune to choose for his most successful public performances interests most dear to the people and his advocacy of the liberty of the press made him at once the favorite of all Venice.

With the arrest of these two men, the struggle began. Both parties prepared for the crisis which they felt was inevitable. More than ample provisions were brought into the city for the support of the numerous garrison; the forts were filled with men, artillery and ammunition; the arsenal was transformed into a citadel and every measure taken to keep the rebellious city in subjection. The people also prepared, quietly, silently, but with undaunted energy. Leaders were chosen, a secret government established, laws and rules for common action agreed upon. Ten or twelve men, belonging to different parishes exercised an almost absolute authority, their word was law; and a few moments sufficed to send their orders to the most remote suburbs. Had the governor with his aids taken a walk on this side of the Lido, it was found the next day to be completely deserted and the whole population assembled at the opposite end. If Austrian officers appeared at the theatre, five minutes sufficed to leave them sole occupants of the house. The use of cigars was repudiated, because government taxed them; even the favorite lotto was left by its most constant votaries, as a source of revenue to the administration. The last palace of a Venetian nobleman closed its massive doors against the foreigner, and Austrian and Venetian waited only for an excuse to measure each other's hatred.

This excuse came with the news of the revolution of Vienna and of the grant of a constitution. The governor proclaimed it at the theatre; one voice called out—long life to Ferdinand! and the people answered with cheers for Italy!

There was a busy scene on the following morning on the place of San Marco, along the quay of the Sclavonians and up to the world-known Rialto bridge. And a strange, excited crowd it was. Here were Mauretti, the descendants of the Moor, with the dark complexion and the finely cut features of their forefathers, speaking eagerly in deep guttural tones; there an Armenian, with his high cone of black lamb's wool, strode gravely and haughtily through a group of half-naked fishermen with gigantic, bronzed chests and the true Phrygian cap on their black curls, accompanying their shrill, piercing vociferations with violent, but ever expressive gestures. On the great square, right under the shadow of glorious old San Marco, stood a motley group in which all costumes seemed mixed, all tongues were heard and all races represented; still the fair sons of the Occident in the wretched costume of the day, the swarthy man of the Levant, the passionate Sicilian, his dagger never leaving his hand, and the subtle, cunning Venetian himself with his graceful dignity—all were animated by the same feeling, all were ready to share the same danger.

Cries of Manin! and Tommaseo! were heard; the crowd increased constantly, the cries became more and more passionate, the current carried the mass slowly before the prison, powerful arms were raised against its massive doors—and the falling gates displayed the jailers trembling before their prisoners whom they implored for protection! The people had found their leaders, and blow followed upon blow. They demanded at first only the proclamation of the constitution which the fugitive Emperor had reluctantly granted. They appeared before the palace of the governor, Count Palffy, a man whose sincere attachment to the cause of absolutism had been rendered more tolerant by the discreet piety of his fair and beloved wife. Like an angel of mercy and peace, she had often stood between him and the people he was called upon to govern, and if they did not love him as they revered her, they at least respected his consistency and were thankful for his moderation. He was taken by surprise: deputation after deputation appeared before him; his house was surrounded by an excited, passionate crowd and—he yielded. But here, as everywhere, the fatal words were heard, "It is too late!" Hardly had so much been obtained when a stentorian voice rose high above the tumult, "Down with the government!" and a thousand voices took it up, until echo repeated it from shore to shore, up the long canals to the firm land, down the lagunes to the fair Adriatic. It appealed to all the passions, it re-awakened all the long pent-up wrath of a free people held in base subjection. It was no longer illusory concessions they asked for: it was the great struggle between Italy and Austria, between the oppressed and the oppressor, which began on a new scene, in old, republican Venice!

Large, compact masses crowded around the palace, windows and balconies were filled with women and children, and from the depth of the black gondola that lay sleeping on the dark waters, from the height of the pillars of the Procuratie, from the desolate but still gorgeous palace and the despised Jew's hut arose the one mighty cry, "Abasso il governo!" But on the large steps of the palace bayonets began to glitter in the sunshine, fierce Croats twisted their huge moustaches, looking contemptuously at the unarmed crowd beneath them, and tall, muscular grenadiers slowly ranged themselves at the foot of the great portal. The cries only redoubled in number and violence. In vain did the roll of the drum—in vain did the shrill blast of the trumpet warn the multitude to withdraw: the open breast of the Venetian almost touched the German's bayonet, and yet he repeated the ominous words and looked defiance. The command was given; a sudden discharge of musketry, a few light clouds rising in the clear atmosphere, three hundred balls had been sent right into the dense crowd—and still but one man had fallen! Miracle! miracle! was heard on all sides; God himself had declared for his people, the Virgin still loved her faithful children. The enthusiasm rose to heroism; women, fair and feeble, young children, ladies of high rank and lofty station began with eager hands to loosen and accumulate rough, heavy stones. They were the only arms of the people. The Croats fired and charged again; the people, maddened and infuriated, drove them into the palace and then quietly dispersed.

But they dispersed only to meet again. When dark night covered the Adriatic and the huge masses of the grim, old palaces cast mystic shadows on public square and canal, gondolas were seen gliding stealthily along, and men, in their large cloaks, hastened towards the Giudecca. There stood a solitary house on the lonely coast, and the pale, young moon threw a melancholy light on the delicate tracery of its ogive windows, when shadow after shadow noiselessly passed from the canal up to the carved door and after exchanging a few mysterious words, disappeared under the massive portal. Within were assembled the leaders of the people and there it was determined that Venice should be free once more and the next morning's sun should greet the winged lion of the Republic on San Marco's time-honored walls.

The word had been given and with the dawn of morning the arsenal was surrounded by thousands and thousands. It is a city in the city, the Arsenal of Venice, and a citadel that Venice and Austria both thought almost impregnable. With it all was gained; without it every thing to be feared. But what was the disappointment when at the first summons the huge gates slowly turned and the people were admitted without resistance! The victory was too easy to satisfy the excited multitude. With eager cries they began to call the name of the man whom of all Austrians they hated most—who of all foreigners most deserved such hatred, Colonel Marinovich, the commandant of the arsenal.

It was not merely the German, the oppressor, the ever ready agent of tyranny whom they thus hated; there was a deeper feeling and a purer one, that made them detest him. He had been the governor of one of Austria's fairest sons—the Archduke Frederick—whose noble soul and youthful, generous heart had won for him the love of all who knew him, the gratitude and admiration of all Venice. But the unhappy Archduke had conceived a passion for the fair daughter of a simple Count and incurred the displeasure of his august parents. So they sent him away and compelled him by threats and promises to bind himself by sacred vows as a knight of Malta to eternal celibacy. There was deep grief in his heart and sorrow blanched his cheek. But Marinovich was a faithful jailer and day and night the young, unfortunate prince saw himself watched, followed, and even his friends exposed to the same disgraceful espionage. His noble heart could ill brook such ignoble treatment: with the first days of spring his love had begun to unfold itself,—the rough blast of winter withered the flowers the maiden of Venice had strewn on his grave!

For the people of Venice had read in his pale features and his mournful eye what the fair youth of twenty had suffered in his soul: they had felt with the poetic instinct peculiar to them the anguish that tore his bleeding heart and they hated the man whom they held responsible for the premature death of their beloved prince. And when he returned hatred for hatred and spared not the rod on those he governed, when he punished inhumanly the slightest mistake, and at last drove the honest workmen from the arsenal and replaced them by convicts in chains, then the exasperation of the Venetians knew no longer any bounds and they swore revenge.

And a fearful revenge it was! With fierce cries, with curses and imprecations taken from all creeds, with bloodshot eye and dagger in hand they hurried through the labyrinth of passages that fill the strange old building. Hall after hall, room after room was invaded, searched and every disappointment increased their rage. At last one of the foremost seized a man in the act of passing through a secret door; with powerful hand he turns him, and when he sees the hated commandant, buries his stiletto in his breast. The wound was mortal; still two officers who had hastened up to their chief succeeded before the infuriated mob approached in snatching him up and carrying him, with the power of despair, to the top of a lofty steeple, where they hoped to have found an inaccessible asylum. But a pack of hounds could not more eagerly follow their track than the eager crowd traced the blood of their victim from step to step. Exhausted by the loss of blood, by approaching death, Marinovich was torn from the arms of his friends and dragged from room to room and court to court until his murderers were tired of insulting a corpse.

At this instant Manin appeared before the arsenal and such was the power of his influence, such the respect in which he was held that a few words sufficed to lay the storm and to appease the blood-thirsty multitude. Hardly were they calmed when the preconceived cry: hurrah for the Republic! was heard and whilst some forty young men threw themselves into their boats to take the detached forts, which surround Venice and which surrendered after a short fire, the people assembled before the house of the governor,

Count Zichy, and demanded his immediate departure. He, too, was well known but much beloved by the Venetians. Long years ago he had seen and loved a daughter of the people of Lombardy, the flower of the land and endowed with the beauty that inspired the Leonardos and Luinis of by-gone days. With him all threats were in vain, all remonstrances lost and happy in her and through her, he had for twenty years lived among the brethren of his beloved wife, and found a second fatherland in Italy. At this critical moment also, as ever, she stood at his side and joined in the prayer of her countrymen. Deep emotion overwhelmed him; the memory of long, happy years spent in that Italy which now from his lips expected peace or war, rose before him. "I might," he said to the delegates of the people, with pale features and deeply moved voice, "I might fill your canals with blood; I shall not do it. You ask me to leave Venice; it is my death-warrant you demand. Be it so. May Italy remember that I pay her my debt of gratitude and when she curses the name of the German may she except mine!"*

On that day Venice was a Republic once more, Manin its president, Tommaseo its prime minister and the banner of San Marco floated triumphantly over "land and sea!" And whilst Turin hesitated and wavered, whilst even Florence capitulated and preferred temporizing measures to bold resolution, Venice has been free; and free even in fetters. For the Austrians have surrounded her by land at least with a close, impenetrable cordon, and Radetzky has sworn that he, the Slavonian, will yet be master of the city in which his race has ever been welcomed as a brother.

Little, however, does Venice look as if she were threatened by an army, the flower of Austria's warlike populations; little does the square of San Marco show that without her walls there are thousands of Tyrolian sharpshooters waiting in ambush with their never-erring rifle, that no harmless peasant is seen within miles of the beleaguered city without being surrounded by the fleet squadrons of Hungarian hussars, whilst the far-famed batteries of Austrian artillery pour night and day a murderous fire into the bastions of the suburbs. There is a proud consciousness of their undaunted courage on the brow of the Venetian as he steps towards the Lido and sees the banner of the Republic float proudly in the breeze. For there is confidence at home and trusty friends are helping afar. Month after month has passed and not a foot of their territory has been lost; peace and security reign within her low but inexpugnable walls, and an enthusiasm equal only to their heroic courage inspires young and old. Sacrifices, it is true, had to be made; but for their sacred cause they willingly renounced everything. Earthenware and iron cutlery have taken the place of costly plate; satin and velvets have been exchanged for stout linen and cheap cotton; jewelry has become a disgrace, and ornaments a reproach. Men, whose only life-long occupation had been the pursuit of pleasure, perform the arduous duty of private soldiers, old men have drawn forth their rusty weapons and children are seen to practise wielding arms they can hardly yet lift. Ladies, high and noble ladies, make garments for the warrior and nurse the wounded; women, meek and gentle, carry stones to the barricades and, with timid hand, aim the cannon of the deserted walls against the enemy's lines. The churches are filled from noon till night with those who can do no more than pray for the freedom of their country and the lives of their brethren, and the holy chant rises without interruption, day after day, to Him whose strong hand alone can save their beloved city from ruin. Chiefs, renowned for bravery and skill, generals like Durando, Zucchi and Pepe, are ever seen where danger is greatest and aid most needed, and the Crusaders, as the people of Italy have named them, seem to defy the weak nature of man. Warriors under the same sacred banner, they fight side by side, the free, proud Venetian, and he, who to defend the great city, has left the beautiful banks of Sorrento or the wild gorges of Calabria; daily do the enthusiastic Frenchman and the fanatic Pole risk their lives a hundred times for the glorious cause of liberty. Assistance is given and more yet promised by the sister States of Italy; Turin has granted 800,000 francs a month for the bold defenders of Venice; Rome has sent troops and generals, and little Ancona has given a war-steamer as a New-year's present to strengthen the navy of Venice. For with an energy, perhaps unparalleled in the history of modern times, the Venetians at once set about to create a navy of their own and whilst Germany was still debating what were to be the colors of her flag, Venice had two thousand patriotic workmen in her docks, and frigates and brigs arose, as by magic, to secure her once more the dominion over the Adriatic. Thus they were enabled to obtain provisions by means of vessels belonging to friendly powers, and Austria, who loses thousands by the malaria of the swamps and lowlands which connect the city with the firm land, sees, with bitter envy, the flags of all nations bring succor to her rebellious subjects. For the sacred cause has found friends all over Europe; the noble courage, the unabating enthusiasm of the Venetian have won the sympathy and admiration of even her enemies, and no heart, that ever beat for all that is most noble and generous, that ever throbbed with love for the sacred cause of liberty, can fail to join in the pious prayer of the Venetian, rising from their altars at Church and at home and inscribed on their as yet victorious banners, that "God may reward their constancy!"*

TO ZENOBIA, QUEEN OF PALMYRA.

Glorious daughter of Palmyra—City of the Sun,
Child of the east, radiant as the new-born day,
Queen of the desert—pure as the limpid stream in the valley of the Blessed—
Fain would I tune my harp to thy praise,
And on the thrilling strings of Harmony,
Sing of the well-garnished "store-house of the mind,"
And of the "symmetry of thy form and feature"—
Bright and fair as a Georgian's in her early bloom.
Mind—the eternal Diamond of the Soul—
Sparkled pure as heaven 'midst the jewels of thy heart,
And naught dimmed the splendor of its rays
Save the burning fire of Ambition.
Not content with the marbled halls of thy templed City,
Nor hearkening to the words of wisdom from the great Longinus,
Thou rushed headlong upon "the torrid desert of Ambition"—
And sought in thine evil hour with outstretched hands
To grasp the golden sceptre of thy foe.
Fatal was that hour!—for soon the Seven-hilled City poured her legions,
Glittering in pomp and pride upon thy burning plain;
And ere they left that fatal field, Palmyra was no more.
But not yet filled to overflowing was thy bitter cup of woe!
A captive and in triumph wast thou borne to the Seven-hilled City of thine adversary,
And there—arrayed in the splendid jewels of thy once brilliant throne;
And chained in mockery with thy once prized golden links—
Thou wert made to walk with thy weary feet
Step by step along the crowded streets of ancient Rome.
Whilst gazed the people on thy rare and splendid beauty,
And uncovered stood in honor of thy former glories;
Full many an eye the burning tear-drop shed,
And many a heart turned sick and pitied her—Whom Ambition's luring scenes had hurled from Fame's proud heights
To lowest depths of woe.
Tempered is the punishment to the act of the transgressor,
But bitter, far too bitter was thy fate, Oh, fallen Queen!
Thy mind—clear as the dayspring on High,
And pure as the murmuring stream from the Fountain of life;
Thy person—rare in beauty as the loveliest flower of Eden,
And thine honor, spotless as the crystal snow on Dian's temple—
Thou should'st have been to the faint and weary
A beacon-star on the pathway of Heaven.
Instead of which, oh Queen, where now is thy vaunted strength,
Where now thy jewelled throne?

Swept as a thing of naught from out their sterile plain,
Thy city, thy glory and thy throne have passed away forever—

Leaving but the dim reflection of their meteor light,
As eternal warnings on the devious highway of Ambition.

THE NEW PYTHAGOREAN.

CHAPTER THIRD.

Accounts which seem entitled to credit say that sometimes the dead, in what is called the vampire state, are found, weeks and months after interment, with undecayed flesh, cheeks of life-like color, the old skin sloughing off like that of a serpent in early summer, and new and fresh skin forming underneath, as if the body were preparing to come out of the grave for another life on earth, or as if some mysterious power of nature were sporting in images of resurrection, in types and shadows of the future history of the grave. Perhaps this is a mere superstition. If it is not, it is one of the many things in heaven and earth yet not more than "dreamed of in our philosophy"—a mysterious vis vivida able to exist still in the house of death; a strange power that can beard the old Stygian lion, corruption, in his very den. May it not be regarded as a just emblem of some of our Piedmont landscapes?—In these landscapes the parts of many a hill-side which are not furrowed with ghastly red gullies, are covered with ash-colored and worthless grass, which "withereth before it groweth up; wherewith the mower filleth not his hand nor he that bindeth sheaves his bosom." The slight waves into which it is indented by the winds of autumn, seem as grinning mockeries of the waves of golden grain to be seen in other fields far away. Its complexion is that of the old skin of the dead. Too often there are no signs of the new robes of green springing up at its roots. Too often it is the mere and only robe of an unreviving decay. Not spring with all the revelry of the days of vegetable resurrection, nor the sunshine of May and June, nor the showers of mid-summer, which seem almost to gladden the earth to its core, can awake in it the greenness of life. Such fields are desolate indeed when skirted and spotted with ragged thickets of dwarf oak and pine. But in some regions the pines have ceased to be dwarfs. They stand as uniform in height as if they were a harvest growing to be reaped by the scythe of some Titan or son of Anak. Even in the desolation of winter there is an indescribable charm in the deep green of their evergreen foliage. Like the cheeks of the vampire, they seem to triumph over winter and desolation, in retaining still that color which is the livery of summer and of Nature's life; and which has doubtless been chosen for that livery on account of its gratefulness to the eye, and may it not be added, on account of its mysterious charm for the spirit of man. A writer of very great genius locates one of the most fearful crimes which his own or any other pages unfold, under a "bare, wan and giant-like tree" surrounded by a ghastly wilderness and dead hedges. Who can tell what would be the social character of the men of this earth, if for one half-century, summer should fail to give foliage to the woods and flowers to the earth, leaving the trees gaunt and unsightly, the gardens unadorned?

In regions where the pine groves are lofty and of uniform height, scenery is sometimes to be met with, which, if we saw things at home with as deep a spirit as we dream of things afar away, would probably be thought not to yield to "Arcadia's rocks and pines" in power over certain emotions of the mind. The flooring in such a grove is more uniform than in other woods as it is covered with the spears of the foliage which has fallen. And when in addition it is carpeted with pure snow, and gleams of sunshine, on days fairer and far more blessed than was made by that grand "Sun of Austerlitz" which so deeply impressed the mind of the French Cæsar all his after life, mingle with the canopy above, making a rich vault of green and gold, and then fall sparkling on the floor of snow, and pour the varnish of an ineffably soft golden light over its surface of pearl, it is a scene fit for brighter beings than we; suggesting thoughts of things not realized in this life; perhaps a fit place of conclave for those pure visitors of earth which a dreaming poet has described, apparently with some such scene in imaginary view:

"Look! look! in the shade of that grand old tree,
What a glorious group is collected there,
Who move like the streamers of light which we see
In Aurora's strange night-scenes in northern air.

Or like winter-day sunbeams at noon in the grove,
As they reach through the boughs to the snow beneath;
Or as dreaming we image the spirits of love
Whom the light and the glory of heaven enwreathes.

As men in Elysium enchanted, they stand,
And their forms seem the models of heroes sublime,
Their faces how radiant! how peerlessly grand,
And their bearing how nobler than beings of time!

For they are indeed spirits who here had their birth
And were righteous, and now live in glory above,
Whom heaven has allowed to revisit the earth,
• And enquire for awhile of its light and its love.

Now they hear and they see, not as we of this world,
 But whole cities and states from their chosen arcade
 They distinctly can hear, and see, plainly unfurled,
 By the change in their senses which heaven has made."
 (Anon.)

Agriculture has not contributed as much to our scenery as it might have done, and as it will do hereafter. In many places time and taste and spring and summer do much. But there are few places where, if you stand and look round with calm eye, and watch the richer sunsets, and await the fairer seasons, and learn to know their favored times, you may not catch glimpses of the grand spirit of nature, and feel the strange sympathies of your kindred with sky and air and tree and flower. True, the sympathies of that kindred have yet been but little uttered in appropriate expression. Our pines have not yet had their Theocritus. That voice of the wind among them, concerning which there is an insoluble doubt whether it is a sigh or a shout, a hallelujah or a dirge, is just the same as the "ὄριον τῶν πεύκων," the song of the pines, of which the Syracusan poet sung in the dominions of Ptolemy Philadelphus. They lack the charm of the thought that a poet has been among them; they lack the charm of the pagan dream that huntress Diana has made them ring with the chorus of her phantom dogs, and the wild woodland revelry of her buskined train of nymphs; and the charm of the thought that Minerva too has mused among them who "non minus in sylvis errare quam Diana." Yet they also have their charms. They are the produce of a renovating power in nature as dark to our knowledge as the growing of the vampire skins of the dead. Their colour is that of summer and hope and joyous life. They seem too to disport themselves in types and emblems. Theirs are colors over which winter, the annual shade and ghost of death, has no mastery. They stand there forever showing and singing forth the tidings of an immortality which the grave touches not but to brighten. Their line of blue lies along the horizon like man's redemption in the horizon of history, a sign and an actual source of bright hopes yet abiding in the land. Above them are often spread the glory-wings of a sunset probably quite as fine as the Athenians ever saw over "sea-born Salamis." In such an hour they deeply mingle in the dreams which the soul has brought with it from the unknown realms. In those mystic recognitions there is always a sense of the present as well as of the past. It is this which is now before us that is made to seem an apparition of the past. It is a strange thing of two widely different eras. The hues of the time now, and of the time long ago, are both upon it. It is a pageant whose costume varies like an alternating star between the robes of the fashion which we see now and those of which we know not where to find legend or chronicle, or brazen clasp old enough to tell us.

THE GOLDSMITH'S DAUGHTER.

FROM THE GERMAN OF UHLAND.

A Goldsmith stood where shone around
 His pearls and diamonds dear:
 "The brightest gem I ever found
 Art thou, my pet, my Helena,
 My little daughter dear!"

A dainty knight just then came in:
 "Good day, my pretty maid:
 Good day, my brave old Goldsmith, too,
 I need a rich set garland
 My sweet bride's locks to braid."

Now when the finished garland shone,
 And sparkled all so bright,
 And Helen could be quite alone,
 Upon her arm she hung it,
 And saddened at the sight.

"Ah, happy, sure, the bride will be
 Who wears this pretty toy:
 Ah! if the dear knight would give me
 A simple wreath of roses,
 O, I should die for joy."

Ere long the knight came in again,
 And close the garland eyed:
 "My good old Goldsmith, make me, then,
 A little ring of diamonds
 For my sweet little bride."

And when the finished circlet shone
 With precious diamonds bright,
 And Helen could be quite alone,
 She drew it on her finger
 And saddened at the sight.

"Ah! happy, sure, the bride will be
 Who wears the pretty toy,
 Ah! if the dear knight would give me
 A little lock of hair, only,
 O, I should die for joy."

Ere long the knight came in again,
 And close the ringlet eyed:
 "I see, my good old Goldsmith, then,
 Thou mak'st quite beautifully
 The gifts for my sweet bride."

But that their fitness I may see,
 Come, pretty maiden, now,
 And let me try at once on thee
 The jewels of my dearest,
 For she is fair as thou."

"'Twas early on a Sunday morn;
And so the maiden fair
Had put her very best dress on,
And decked herself for service,
With neat and comely care.

In pretty shame, with cheek on fire,
Before him did she stand,
He placed on her the golden tire,
The ringlet on her finger,
And pressed her little hand.

"My Helen sweet, my Helen dear,
The jest is over now;
What bride shall claim the pretty gear,
The jewelled gold-bright garland,
And little ring, but thou?

With gold and pearl and precious gem,
Hast thou grown up to be—
As, sweet, thou shouldst have learnt from them—
The share of high honor,
In after days, with me."

A. PLATT.

The Last Hours of McCallum More.

—“So effectually had religious faith and hope, co-operating with natural courage and equanimity, composed his (Argyle's) spirits, that on the very day on which he was to die, he dined with appetite, conversed with gayety at table, and after his last meal, lay down, as he was wont, to take a short slumber, in order that his body and mind might be in full vigor when he should mount the scaffold. At this time one of the lords of the council, who had probably been bred a Presbyterian, and had been seduced by interest to join in oppressing the Church of which he had once been a member, came to the castle with a message from his brethren, and demanded admittance to the earl. It was answered that the earl was asleep. The privy counsellor thought that this was a subterfuge, and insisted on entering. The door of the cell was softly opened, and there lay Argyle on the bed, sleeping in his irons the placid sleep of infancy. The conscience of the renegade smote him. He turned away sick at heart, ran out of the castle, and took refuge in the dwelling of a lady of his family who lived hard by. There he flung himself on a couch, and gave himself up to an agony of remorse and shame. His kinswoman, alarmed by his looks and groans, thought that he had been taken sick with sudden illness, and begged him to drink a cup of sack. 'No, no,' he said, 'that will do me no good.' She prayed him to tell her what had disturbed him. 'I have been,' he said, 'in Argyle's prison. I have seen him within an hour of eternity sleeping as sweetly as ever man did. But as for me—'

"And now the earl had risen from his bed, and had prepared himself for what was yet to be endured. He was first brought down the High Street to the Council House, where he was to remain during the short interval which was still to elapse before the execution. During that interval he asked for pen and ink and wrote to his wife. 'Dear heart, God is unchangeable. He hath always been good and gracious to me; and no place alters it. Forgive me all my faults; and now comfort thyself in him, in whom only true comfort is to be found. The Lord be with thee, bless and comfort thee, my dearest. Adieu.'

"It was now time to leave the Council House. The divines who attended the prisoner were met of his own persuasion; but he listened to them with civility, and exhorted them to caution their flocks against those doctrines which all Protestant churches unite in condemning. He mounted the scaffold where the rude old guillotine of Scotland, called the Maiden, awaited him, and addressed the people in a speech, tinged with the peculiar phraseology of his sect, but breathing the spirit of serene piety. His enemies, he said, he forgave, as he hoped to be forgiven. Only a single acrimonious expression escaped him. One of the Episcopal clergymen who attended him went to the edge of the scaffold and called out in a loud voice, 'My Lord dies a Protestant.' 'Yes,' said the earl, stepping forward, 'and not only a Protestant, but with a heart-hated of popery, of prelacy, and of all superstition.' He then embraced his friends, put into their hands some tokens of remembrance for his wife and children, kneeled down, laid his head on the block, prayed for a little space, and gave the signal to the executioner."

The above account of the closing scenes in the life of Argyle cannot, we think, be presented to any contemplative mind without awakening in it a deep interest in the character and fate of that chieftain, the victim of intolerance in an age when the interests of the Church were less those of Christ, than of the State; when the prevailing form of worship, upheld by the adherents of the reigning power, was maintained, not out of love even to outward rites, still less to the spirit embodied in them, but from attachment to the family whose accession to the throne had rendered allegiance to the Establishment a test of loyalty.

A detail of the great events accompanying the rise and fall of empires, is, we conceive, but part of the province of the historian; the mind desires to look beneath into the character of those by whom these great events were wrought out, to follow causes to their effects, and to trace amid the tumultuous tide of affairs the hidden undercurrent by which society is borne along.

But especially is it interesting to the religious mind, whatever peculiar views it may have embraced, to mark,—in an age of persecution for opinion's sake, in a land whose fair fields were still reddened by the glare of martyr-fires, where the struggle for truth was the struggle between life and death,—the steady adherence to conviction, which neither exile could subdue, nor the sure prospect of torture and death overcome. It is not a question of mere conformity or nonconformity to established opinions; there has ever been heard in the heart of man a voice speaking from a higher than an earthly throne, and in a tone more commanding than that of earthly potentate, and which from earliest ages, when the "seed of the church" was scattered far and wide, has echoed the Apostle's defence,—“we ought to obey God rather than man.” The voice of conscience in the soul has, in all times, prompted individuals, exposed to different influences, and consequently embracing different tenets, to contend earnestly for that faith which they considered to have been delivered to the saints, and to seal their devotion, when called upon to do so, with their blood.

All honor to such men! We may or we may not agree with them upon the points for which they yielded up their dearest hopes on earth, sooner than peril their hopes of heaven; but we cannot even in this land of toleration, and after the lapse of centuries, look back upon the records of their fidelity and perseverance and not call their names with a feeling of veneration. We may even contend against the errors which they held dear as truths, but let us render all justice to the affection with which they clung to what they had received as sacred, ascending trustfully the scaffold sooner than retract one iota of what they had proclaimed.

“Deal gently, kindly, with the thoughts that guide
The weakest brother straying from thy side:
If right, they bid thee tremble for thine own,
If wrong, the verdict is for God alone.”

How firm a support reliance upon convictions of duty can afford; how truly in faith alone consists that victory which overcometh the world, is well exemplified in the contrast afforded by Argyle, “sleeping sweetly within an hour of eternity,” and the faithless peer who, traitor to himself, if not to his country, was unable to bear the sight of the slumbering prisoner, and whose unfinished sentence tells a more impressive tale of a heart turned from its early allegiance, wearing out an aimless life, embittered by self-accusation, than written volumes could have done.

Calm indeed must have been the conscience, firm the faith of him who, bound with fetters, shortly to be unloosed only that he might tread the road to the scaffold, yet lay down and slumbered tranquilly and peacefully as an infant. Perhaps visions of childhood's days came thronging in among the dreams of that last slumber, and he again basked in the sunlight of life's morning hours, forgetting the kaleidoscopic scenes which succeeding years brought before his view, and his own transformation from the head of a powerful and attached clan, to the doomed prisoner of a Crown to which he might not own allegiance.

Or perhaps the past came no longer before the gaze of one who was so shortly to pass beyond the reach of earthly cares and sorrows; but instead, visioned glories such as eye hath not seen nor ear heard, may have dawned upon his soul:—no scaffold rose up between with its horrid apparatus of destruction, but a tranquil and holy rest stole upon the waiting spirit—“for so He giveth his Beloved sleep.”

The touching letter of Argyle to his wife contains still further testimony to the undiminished confidence which he felt in the love of that Master whom he served—“God is unchangeable. He hath always been good and gracious to me; and no place alters it.” And so he found it to the end. His sins against his Maker (among which he included having at one time, through a mistaken sense of loyalty, employed his influence against the Covenanters) and the faults which he had committed against his king had been long ago repented of, and the listening crowd around the scaffold heard his forgiveness of his enemies.

The chronicler has characterized as acrimonious his expression “dying in heart-hatred of popery, of prelacy, and of all superstition;” but to us, though attached to the doctrines and worship of that church which the state power in England has established and allied with itself, these words of the Duke but seem to breathe a steady adherence to what he conceived right, and detestation of principles which the stern code that he acknowledged had denounced as erroneous. We hear no rebuke of individuals: he had just declared his forgiveness of his enemies, yet with his dying breath he bore testimony against those systems which he considered as subversive of the liberties of upright men.

An affectionate interview with some friends who were present during that trying hour then took place, kindly remembrances were expressed of the absent loved ones, and the lofty soul which strove to bear with calmness these heart-rending struggles once more composed itself in prayer—

“One prayer! what mercy taught us prayer! As dew
On drooping herbs, as sleep tired life renews,

As dreams that lead and lap our hearts in Heaven,
Prayer to the soul—dew, sleep, and dream—is given."

The words of that supplication went up before the mercy-seat, and ere its echoes had died away there, the liberated spirit of Argyle was among those around the Throne.

THE ARTIST'S EVENING SONG.

FROM THE GERMAN OF GOETHE.

O that the wild creative might,
That through my soul is flushing,
In one fair form could spring to light,
Out of my fingers gushing!

I only stammer in my zeal,
And trembling yet essay thee;
Still Nature, thee, I know, I feel,
And thus must I portray thee.

Reflected I, for many years,
My soul unclosed its powers,
As when in barren wastes, appears
A well-spring decked with flowers.

Nature, I yearn thine own to be,
Thee, true and lovely feeling,
A joyous fountain still to me,
Through thousand channels stealing.

And now my art, my soul's high prize,
Light on my mind is pouring,
And soon these fut'ring thoughts shall rise,
Through boundless ages soaring.

MR. VATTEMARE.

"Aut agitur in scenis, aut acta refertur.—Non tamen intrus
Digna geri promes in scenam: multa que tolles,
Es oculis; qua mox narret facundia pressena."

Hor. Ar. Poet.

The numerous testimonials which Mr. Vattemare has received from the most eminent personages of the age, must have struck those who have had the good fortune to see even a tithe of them with surprise, no less by their value and variety, than as proofs of the talent and good conduct which alone could have elicited them. Indeed, the utmost ingenuity seems to have been displayed in discovering how to bear testimony to the grandeur and magnificence of the plan, and the disinterested labors of its inventor. Nor have these testimonials been bestowed alone by the great and noble of the earth—they, indeed, have offered of their abundance—but the poor, also, of their penury.

"Te pauper ambit sollicita prece, Raris colonus, te domina sequoris."

The emperor of half the world sends his jewelled and costly offering; the working man, the fruit of his self-denial and toil. The mitred Roman or Episcopal bishop unites with the rigid Calvinist and the simple-minded Quaker in a common eulogy. The legislator lifts up his voice in the council chamber, and then, with the eloquent fervor of a disciplined and experienced mind, commits his thoughts to a more durable record, and there his offering lies, and by its side the more touching tribute of woman's admiration for disinterested and laborious effort. Here is the direct business-like letter of the merchant, and the more aspiring brief-like testimonial of the lawyer. Youth writes with a heart overflowing with enthusiasm at a scheme which realizes more than his excited imagination had ever conceived; the ordinary expressions of congratulation and panegyric are all too formal and cold for his burning zeal; in his eyes, instead of the laborious pioneer in a new, but rich and promising department of philanthropic enterprise, Mr. Vattemare appears exalted above the failings of humanity, a beneficent visitor from a purer region, a star like that which shone upon the shepherds of old, when the voices of innumerable angels chanted in the mid-heaven: "Peace on earth, good will to men." With such feelings, is it wonderful that difficulties vanish, and melt away like the dew? He considers the prize of victory as already won—he sees the productions of science and art already scattered over all lands, and man united into one great brotherhood—and his heart glows with gratitude and admiration, as he pours forth his feelings in a eulogy which shrinks from the cool criticism of experience and reality.

Books have been presented by hundreds, and rings, medals, crosses, portraits. Tributes there are, voluntary and well earned tributes of admiration and sympathy, which Mr. Vattemare has received from the first poets of the day, as well as from many an unknown, though not uninspired follower of the Muse. Artists of all nations have employed their best powers in the cause, happy in being allowed to contribute to the World's Album, and of extending their own renown, or at least their name, to the ends of the earth. A thousand productions from a thousand different pencils, have already been pressed into the service, as the first fruits of the glorious harvest which art, united and purified by the communication and free intercourse of her followers throughout the world, will, one day or other, pour into the common treasury, for the common benefit of the race.

From the mass of testimonials thus various and valuable, there is one which is worthy of particular notice, as the most singular contribution ever made to a private individual, or to the cause of science. It consists of a collection of autographs, nineteen in number, and written in nineteen different languages, by as many persons, natives of the different portions of the Russian dominions, where these languages are in use. This unique collection was presented to Mr. Vattemare, at St. Petersburg, in 1834, by Count Nesselrode, then Chancellor of the Russian empire, and Prime Minister of Foreign Affairs. By the aid of a French translation, we propose to give a slight sketch of these various specimens to the readers of the Messenger who may not have had an opportunity of seeing the originals, although all the interest arising from the beautiful execution, the singularity and variety of the different and uncouth characters of the languages must necessarily be lost by a mere description.

"Segnius irritant animos demissa per aurem, Quam quæ sunt oculis subjecta fidelibus."

The collection begins with the nineteenth Psalm, in the Slavenski language, said by the learned, to have been the literary language of Russia, until the beginning of the last century. The manuscript is in imitation of print, and the initial letter of each versè is red. The characters are, many of them, like those of the Greek, and not a few like those of the English alphabet, some of them in appearance identical. The whole is surrounded by a bordering of paint like gold-leaf.

The second is a specimen of that wonderful language which has attracted the reverence and admiration of all ages, ancient and modern, for its plastic power, and fitness to express, with ease and fidelity, alike the most delicate and almost unappreciable shades and distinctions of philosophic thought—the light graces of fancy—the scorching irresistible torrent of patriotic eloquence, and the high and sober dignity of history,—the language of the ancient Greeks. The specimen is written in a free, bold hand, and is not better executed than many which may be met with. It expresses gratitude to the powers of Christendom for their aid in recovering the independence of Greece, and the appointment of a king to aid the Greeks in arriving at their former glory.

A few lines of Arabic come next, on repentance and the fear of God; a distich on fidelity to promises, and another describing ignorance as the most dangerous of all maladies.

The fourth specimen is in ancient Hebrew, a language which, like the Slavenski and ancient Greek, can scarcely be said to be spoken in the Russian empire, or any where else, although once spoken, not only in Palestine, but in Phœnicia, Syria, Arabia, and Ethiopia. It is written in square characters, without points, and is surrounded by a border of bluish red.

There is also given a specimen of the German language, such as is used by the Jews in Russia, said to be, in most respects, the same as the language used by the English Jews in their commercial affairs. The following is a translation of the paragraph, which no Christian can read without interest; happily for humanity, and for forlorn, but not forsaken Israel, the picture here drawn is, in the main, correct:

"The Jews scattered throughout the western and southern provinces of Russia, enjoy the protection of an enlightened government. They exercise freely the worship of their fathers, and engage without molestation, in commerce, and other branches of industry, which offer them the means of subsistence and of advancing their interests."

Next in order come several specimens of Persian—the language of gentle affections, of love, bright eyes and flowers that never fade. Blessings and thanks be to those who are opening up to the English public its concealed riches, and transplanting to the cold North its fragrant and magnificent shrubs, to perfume and adorn

The sober gardens of our English song,
Not bare before, and naked to the view,
Nor fruitless; but with modest beauty deck'd,
"The tufted crow-toe and pale jessamine,
"The white pink, and the pansy streaked with jet,

"The glowing violet,
"The musk-rose, and the well attired wood-bine,
"With cowslips wan that hang the pensive head."
And flowers of a thousand thousand hues.

The Persian language, at least that of it which meets the outward eye, is far from being beautiful, and may be manufactured thus :

Take quæst. suff. of English commas, scatter them about the page ad lib. add a sprinkling of semicolons, and inverted interrogation points, the semicolons to be placed horizontally, and flanked by a dash bent secun. art., these, with a crescent or two to the lineal inch, and about forty full stops to the line chart. stult. will have a dish of Turkish, which will go down any where out of the dominions of the Sultan.

There is, however, much in the language that is elegant and imaginative in sentiment, as will appear from the following beautiful extract which we take from the autograph as it stands in the French translation.

"Imitez ces arbres fruitiers, et comme eux, donnez des fruits à qui vous jette des pierres. A l'exemple des montagnes, donnez de l'or à celui dont la cruauté déchire votre sein; et prenez pour modèle de douceur et de patience, ces coquilles qui donnent leurs perles à celui qui les brise."

The sixth specimen is in Turkish, with a triple border of blue and red. The portion translated is a prayer in which all Christians might join. "Lord! may thy mercy be my guide, conduct me in the way which leads to peace. Divine wisdom! I know not my own wants, do thou bestow upon me that which seemeth good to thee."

The next is a specimen of the Mongolian language, and is written vertically; in some of the words there are spaces of more than an inch marked by black lines, and the whole, at a little distance, looks like the dollars and cents lines of a ledger, with short lines diverging downwards from each line—for about half an inch at an angle of forty-five degrees. The paragraph translated is as follows :

"We must in this life overcome our destructive passions, and endeavor, according to the religion of the Grand Lama, to shun the three Sins, in order that the soul may pass (transmigrate) to the holy habitation of the Divinity."

The Moguls, like the inhabitants of Thibet, Burmah, Anan, Siam and the greater part of the Chinese and Japanese, consider the metempsychosis or transmigration of souls, as one of the most important articles of their faith, even the soul of Grand Lama being supposed to pass into his successor. This article of faith has prevailed in the East for more than three thousand years, and it is evident from the literature of Europe, that among more enlightened nations, it has not been without supporters.

The eighth is a beautifully written specimen of the Georgian language, giving an account of certain incursions into Georgia by the Ossetes in the year 448 (probably about A. D. 1225.)

The ninth is the Armenian language, ornamented, and in smaller characters than any of the other specimens. It recounts the dispersion of the Armenians by the barbarians, and the hospitable reception given them by the Russians, with their present prosperous condition under the Emperor Nicholas, who is styled their "Second Providence." "Under his sceptre," continues the writer, "the Armenians enjoy various privileges and prerogatives, superb churches, populous bishopricks, courts of justice, with judges elected by the people, schools, printing presses and other institutions protected by the government. The devotion of the Armenians for the august sovereign of the Russians, is without bounds."

Doubtless the writer was aware, that his production would pass under the review of the emperor or his chief officers, and this may account for the adulatory style in which the emperor is alluded to, and for the exaggerated professions of devotion to his service.

The next is a specimen of the Moldavian language, said to be a derivation from the Latin. Its characters are, many of them, very similar to our Roman letters, others are like the Greek, and the whole seems to be merely a modification of the first specimen in the collection, the Slavenski. It professes to give a short explanation of the names and divisions of the Moldavian and Wallachian nations.

The eleventh specimen is in Chinese running hand (!) but approximating nearly to the characters used in printing. The passage which is from Confucius, is well worth attention, not only from the consideration that it was written at least five hundred years before the Christian Era, but also from its intrinsic merit. Dsy-tou asks his master in what heroism consists; and Confucius, being probably ignorant of what certain modern wiseacres have called abstract nouns, enquires of Dsy-tou, whether he means the heroism of the people of the south or the north, or Dsy-tou's own proper heroism, but receiving no answer, proceeds to say: "The heroes of the south make heroism consist in greatness of soul and moderation. Professing these virtues, they teach how to bear injuries without seeking to revenge them, and have arrived at the highest degree of wisdom. The great men of the north think that virtue consists in physical force. They pass their life under arms, and they harness and face death without a fear. But can any thing be higher than the heroism of those who seek to live in peace with the whole human race! Are they forgotten in a well-ordered empire?—they complain not of their lot. Live they under a cruel government?—They remain faithful to virtue, and for her cheerfully die."

The twelfth is in the Manchew language. The characters in form are similar to the Chinese, and like them are also written up and down the page. The passage is the farewell of a Corean deputy to the Russian mission house at Peking, and is written in the usual inflated style of oriental complimentary composition.

The next is a Calmuck extract from a chronicle containing some historical details of the progress of the Calmuck division of the great Moravian family.

A further account of the Calmucks is contained in the next specimen, in the ordinary writing of Thibet, which states that there are three principal tribes wandering on the banks of the Wolga, numbering about 25,000 "waggons" or families, and 100,000 men.

A paragraph in the literary language of Thibet follows next in order. It gives some curious particulars of the religion of the Lama of Thibet. "The communion which his followers receive from his hands delivers from all diseases, and drives off destructive passions, and the soul passes into the invisible spirit of God. The learned Lamaic clergy believe that their religion will, in time, be extended over the whole earth. All the followers of the Lama have the doors of their houses facing to the south."

The sketch, slight as it is, affords much material for useful reflection, which it might not be amiss to improve; but it is time to close. Mr. Vattemare has the honor of possessing, in these autographs, a treasure as unique as it is valuable. They are, however, but a sample of the immense literary wealth of Asia and the east of Europe. These countries, for centuries, remarkable chiefly for their valuable natural productions, and the unprogressive character of their inhabitants, have begun to excite that attention, which no countries more deserve, or can better repay. It is gratifying to know that the late Sultan took infinite pains to introduce Mr. Vattemare's system into his dominions; indeed no monarch in Christendom is said to have done more for his people than Mahmoud. There are mines of rarest literary wealth in Turkey, which will one day, we trust, be brought to light, for the good of the world, and, throughout the East, many valuable manuscripts might be found, which the barbarity of former ages failed to destroy. These would be hailed with enthusiasm by the literati of Europe, who would gladly give whole libraries in exchange for one relic of ages gone by, which might shed upon the modern world some rays of that sacred light, which once gilded with its glory the cradle of the human race—the birth-place of civilization—the holy land, where the Saviour lived and died.

"A SONG IN THE NIGHT."

Isaiah xxx: 29.

Written on being asked by an aged lady, who was very deaf, whether she had heard music in the room below, during the preceding evening—saying she often seemed to hear sweet music while lying awake at night.

It was no sound of earthly music
 Played by one thou holdest dear,
 That, as evening shades closed round thee,
 Fell upon thy listening ear;

For that ear is sealed by Heaven,
 And thou hearest not the sounds
 Many-toned, of joy and gladness
 With which this fair world abounds.

Yet, though not by day 'tis given thee
 Earthly strains again to hear;
 In the silent 'mid-night watches
 Music comes, thy heart to cheer;

Music, far more sweet than earthly
 While around thee all are sleeping,
 Sung by low-toned angel voices
 Who around thee watch are keeping.

Heavenly harps for thee are ringing
 Touched by spirits hovering near;
 While celestial tones are breathing
 Angel-anthems to thee here.

"At even-tide there shall be light:"
 Still let thine aged heart be strong,
 Since even in this thine earthly night
 Thy God hath given to thee "a song!"

Kean is original; but he copies from himself. His rapid descents from the hyper-tragic to the infra colloquial, though sometimes productive of great effect, are often unreasonable. To see him act, is like reading Shakspeare by flashes of lightning.

MARGINALIA.*

BY EDGAR A. POE.

In getting my books, I have been always solicitous of an ample margin; this not so much through any love of the thing in itself, however agreeable, as for the facility it affords me of pencilling suggested thoughts, agreements and differences of opinion, or brief critical comments in general. Where what I have to note is too much to be included within the narrow limits of a margin, I commit it to a slip of paper, and deposit it between the leaves; taking care to secure it by an imperceptible portion of gum tragacanth paste.

All this may be whim; it may be not only a very hackneyed, but a very idle practice;—yet I persist in it still; and it affords me pleasure; which is profit, in despite of Mr. Bentham with Mr. Mill on his back.

This making of notes, however, is by no means the making of mere memoranda—a custom which has its disadvantages, beyond doubt. "Ce que je mets sur papier," says Bernardin de St. Pierre, "je remets de ma mémoire, et par consequence je l'oublie;"—and, in fact, if you wish to forget anything on the spot, make a note that this thing is to be remembered.

But the purely marginal jottings, done with no eye to the Memorandum Book, have a distinct complexion, and not only a distinct purpose, but none at all; this it is which imparts to them a value. They have a rank somewhat above the chance and desultory comments of literary chit-chat—for these latter are not unfrequently "talk for talk's sake," hurried out of the mouth; while the marginalia are deliberately pencilled, because the mind of the reader wishes to unburthen itself of a thought;—however flippant—however silly—however trivial—still a thought indeed, not merely a thing that might have been a thought in time, and under more favorable circumstances. In the marginalia, too, we talk only to ourselves; we therefore talk freshly—boldly—originally—with abandonnement—without conceit—much after the fashion of Jeremy Taylor, and Sir Thomas Browne, and Sir William Temple and the anatomical Burton, and that most logical analogist, Butler, and some other people of the old day, who were too full of their matter to have any

* Some years since Mr. Poe wrote for several of the Northern magazines a series of critical brevities under the title of "Marginalia." They attracted great attention at that time and since, as characteristic of the author, and we are sure that our readers will be gratified at his resuming them in the Messenger. By way of introduction, we republish the original preface from the Democratic Review.

[Ed. Mess.]

room for their manner, which being thus left out of question, was a capital manner, indeed,—a model of manners, with a richly marginalic air.

The circumscription of space, too, in these pencillings, has in it something more of advantage than inconvenience. It compels us (whatever diffuseness of idea we may clandestinely entertain,) into Montesquieu-ism, into Taciturnism, (here I leave out of view the concluding portion of the "Annals,")—or even into Carlyle-ism—a thing which, I have been told, is not to be confounded with your ordinary affectation and bad grammar. I say "bad grammar," through sheer obstinacy, because the grammarians (who should know better) insist upon it that I should not. But then grammar is not what these grammarians will have it; and, being merely the analysis of language, with the result of this analysis, must be good or bad just as the analyst is sage or silly—just as he is a Horne Tooke or a Cobbett.

But to our sheep. During a rainy afternoon, not long ago, being in a mood too listless for continuous study, I sought relief from ennui in dipping here and there, at random, among the volumes of my library—no very large one, certainly, but sufficiently miscellaneous; and, I flatter myself, not a little recherché.

Perhaps it was what the Germans call the "brain-scattering" humor of the moment; but, while the picturesqueness of the numerous pencil-scratches arrested my attention, their helter-skelter-iness of commentary amused me. I found myself at length, forming a wish that it had been some other hand than my own which had so bedevilled the books, and fancying that, in such case, I might have derived no inconsiderable pleasure from turning them over. From this the transition-thought, (as Mr. Lyell, or Mr. Murchison, or Mr. Featherstonhaugh would have it,) was natural enough:—there might be something even in my scribbings which, for the mere sake of scribbling, would have interest for others.

The main difficulty respected the mode of transferring the notes from the volumes—the context from the text—without detriment to that exceedingly frail fabric of intelligibility in which the context was imbedded. With all appliances to boot, with the printed pages at their back, the commentaries were too often like Dodona's oracles—or those of Lycophron Tenebrosus—or the essays of the pedant's pupils, in Quintilian, which were "necessarily excellent, since even he (the pedant) found it impossible to comprehend them:"—what then, would become of it—this context—if transferred?—if translated? Would it not rather be traduit (traduced) which is the French synonyme, or overzet (turned topsyturvy) which is the Dutch one?

I concluded, at length, to put extensive faith in the acumen and imagination of the reader:—this as a general rule. But, in some instances, where even faith would not remove mountains, there seemed no safer plan than so to re-model the note as to convey at least the ghost of a conception as to what it was all about. Where, for such conception, the text itself was absolutely necessary, I could quote it; where the title of the book commented upon was indispensable, I could name it. In short, like a novel-hero dilemma'd, I made up my mind "to be guided by circumstances," in default of more satisfactory rules of conduct.

As for the multitudinous opinion expressed in the subjoined farrago—as for my present assent to all, or dissent from any portion of it—as to the possibility of my having, in some instances, altered my mind—or as to the impossibility of my not having altered it often—these are points upon which I say nothing, because upon these there can be nothing cleverly said. It may be as well to observe, however, that just as the goodness of your true pun is in the direct ratio of its intolerability, so is nonsense the essential sense of the Marginal Note.

I do not believe that the whole world of Poetry can produce a more intensely energetic passage, of equal length, than the following, from Mrs. Browning's "Drama of Exile." The picturesque vigor of the lines italicized is much more than Homeric :

— On a mountain peak
Half sheathed in primal woods and glittering
In spasms of awful sunshine, at that hour
A Lion couched, part raised upon his paws
With his calm massive face turned full on mine
And his mane listening. When the ended curse
Left silence in the world, right suddenly
He sprang up rampant, and stood straight and stiff,
As if the new reality of Death
Were dashed against his eyes, and roared so fierce—(Such thick carnivorous passion in his throat Tearing a passage through the wrath and fear)
And roared so wild, and smote from all the hills
Such fast keen echoes crumbling down the vales
To distant silence—that the forest beasts,
One after one, did mutter a response
In savage and in sorrowful complaint
Which trailed off the gorges.

There are few cases in which mere popularity should be considered a proper test of merit; but the case of song-writing is, I think, one of the few. In speaking of song-writing, I mean, of course, the composition of brief poems with an eye to their adaptation for music in the vulgar sense. In this ultimate destination of the song proper, lies its essence—its genius. It is the strict reference to music—it is the dependence upon modulated expression—which gives to this branch of letters a character altogether unique, and separates it, in great measure and in a manner not sufficiently considered, from ordinary literature; rendering it independent of merely ordinary proprieties; allowing it, and in fact demanding for it, a wide latitude of Law; absolutely insisting upon a certain wild license and indefiniteness—an indefiniteness recognized by every musician who is not a mere fiddler, as an important point in the philosophy of his science—as the soul, indeed, of the sensations derivable from its practice—sensations which bewilder while they enthrall—and which would not so enthrall if they did not so bewilder.

The sentiments deducible from the conception of sweet sound simply, are out of the reach of analysis—although referable, possibly, in their last result, to that merely mathematical recognition of equality which seems to be the root of all Beauty. Our impressions of harmony and melody in conjunction, are more readily analyzed; but one thing is certain—that the sentimental pleasure derivable from music, is nearly in the ratio of its indefiniteness. Give to music any undue decision—imbue it with any very determinate tone—and you deprive it, at once, of its ethereal, its ideal, and, I sincerely believe, of its intrinsic and essential character. You dispel its dream-like luxury:—you dissolve the atmosphere of the mystic in which its whole nature is bound up:—you exhaust it of its breath of faery. It then becomes a tangible and easily appreciable thing—a conception of the earth, earthy. It will not, to be sure, lose all its power to please, but all that I consider the distinctiveness of that power. And to the over-cultivated talent, or to the unimaginative apprehension, this deprivation of its most delicate nare will be, not unfrequently, a recommendation. A determinateness of expression is sought—and sometimes by composers who should know better—is sought as a beauty, rather than rejected as a blemish. Thus we have, even from high authorities, attempts at absolute imitation in musical sounds. Who can forget, or cease to regret, the many errors of this kind into which some great minds have fallen, simply through over-estimating the triumphs of skill. Who can help lamenting the Battles of Pragues? What man of taste is not ready to laugh, or to weep, over their "guns, drums, trumpets, blunderbusses and thunder?" "Vocal music," says L'Abbaté Gravina, "ought to imitate the natural language of the human feelings and passions, rather than the warblings of Canary birds, which our singers, now-a-days, affect so vastly to mimic with their quaverings and boasted cadences." This is true only so far as the "rather" is concorned. If any music must imitate any thing, it were, undoubtedly, better that the imitation should be limited as Gravina suggests.

That indefiniteness which is, at least, one of the essentials of true music, must, of course, be kept in view by the song-writer; while, by the critic, it should always be considered in his estimate of the song. It is, in the author, a consciousness—sometimes merely an instinctive appreciation, of this necessity for the indefinite, which imparts to all songs, rightly conceived, that free, affluent, and hearty manner, little scrupulous about niceties of phrase, which cannot be better expressed than by the hackneyed French word abandonnement, and which is so strikingly exemplified in both the serious and joyous ballads and carols of our old English progenitors. Wherever verse has been found most strictly married to music, this feature prevails. It is thus the essence of all antique song. It is the soul of Homer. It is the spirit of Anacreon. It is even the genius of Æschylus. Coming down to our own times, it is the vital principle in De Béranger. Wanting this quality, no song-writer was ever truly popular, and, for the reasons assigned, no song-writer need ever expect to be so.

These views properly understood, it will be seen how baseless are the ordinary objections to songs proper, on the score of "conceit," (to use Johnson's word,) or of hyperbole, or on various other grounds tenable enough in respect to poetry not designed for music. The "conceit," for example, which some envious rivals of Morris have so much objected to—

Her heart and morning broke together
In the storm—

this "conceit" is merely in keeping with the essential spirit of the song proper. To all reasonable persons it will be sufficient to say that the fervid, hearty, free-spoken songs of Cowley and of Donne—more especially of Cunningham, of Harrington and of Carew—abound in precisely similar things; and that they are to be met with, plentifully, in the polished pages of Moore and of Béranger, who introduce them with thought and retain them after mature deliberation.

Morris is, very decidedly, our best writer of songs—and, in saying this, I mean to assign him a high rank as poet. For my own part, I would much rather have written the best song of a nation than its noblest epic. One or two of Hoffman's songs have merit—but they are sad echoes of Moore, and even if they were not so (every body knows that it is so) they are totally deficient in the real song-essence. "Woodman Spare that Tree" and "By the Lake where droops the Willow" are compositions of which any poet, living or dead, might justly be proud. By these, if by nothing else, Morris is immortal. It is quite impossible to put down such things by sneers. The affectation of contemning them is of no avail—unless to render manifest the envy of those who affect the contempt. As mere poems, there are several of Morris's compositions equal, if not superior, to either of those just mentioned, but as songs I much doubt whether these latter have ever been surpassed. In quiet grace and unaffected tenderness, I know no American poem which excels the following:

Where Hudson's wave o'er silvery sands
Winds through the hills afar,
Old Crow-nest like a monarch stands,
Crowned with a single star.
And there, amid the billowy swells
Of rock-ribbed, cloud-capped earth,
My fair and gentle Ida dwells,
A nymph of mountain birth.

The snow-flake that the cliff receives—
The diamonds of the showers—
Spring's tender blossoms, buds and leaves—
The sisterhood of flowers—
Morn's early beam—eve's balmy breeze—
Her purity define:—
But Ida's dearer far than these
To this fond breast of mine.

My heart is on the hills; the shades
Of night are on my brow.
Ye pleasant haunts and silent glades
My soul is with you now.
I bless the star-crowned Highlands where
My Ida's footsteps roam:—
Oh, for a falcon's wing to bear—
To bear me to my home.

A capital book, generally speaking;* but Mr. Grattan has a bad habit—that of loitering in the road—of dallying and toying with his subjects, as a kitten with a mouse—instead of grasping it firmly at once and eating it up without more ado. He takes up too much time in the ante-room. He has never done with his introductions. Occasionally, one introduction is but the vestibule to another; so that by the time he arrives at his main incidents there is nothing more to tell. He seems afflicted with that curious yet common perversity observed in garrulous old women—the desire of tantalizing by circumlocution. Mr. G's circumlocution, however, is by no means like that which Albany Fonblanque describes as "a style of about and about and all the way round to nothing and nonsense." If the greasy-looking lithograph here given as a frontispiece, be meant for Mr. Grattan, then is Mr. Grattan like nobody else:—for the fact is, I never yet knew an individual with a wire wig, or the countenance of an under-done apple dumpling. . . .

*"Highways and By-ways."

As a general rule, no man should put his own face in his own book. In looking at the author's countenance the reader is seldom in condition to keep his own.

In a "Hymn for Christmas," by Mrs. Hemans, we find the following stanza :

Oh, lovely voices of the sky
Which hymned the Saviour's birth,
Are ye not singing still on high,
Ye that sang "Peace on Earth" ?
To us yet speak the strains
Wherewith, in times gone by,
Ye blessed the Syrian swains,
Oh, voices of the sky !

And at page 305 of "The Christian Keepsake and Missionary Annual for 1840"—a Philadelphia Annual—we find "A Christmas Carol," by Richard W. Dodson :—the first stanza running thus :

Angel voices of the sky !
Ye that hymned Messiah's birth,
Sweetly singing from on high
"Peace, Goodwill to all on earth !"
Oh, to us impart those strains !
Bid our doubts and fears to cease !
Ye that cheered the Syrian swains,
Cheer us with that song of peace !

A book* remarkable for its artistic unity. It is to be commended, also, on higher grounds. I do not think, indeed, that a better novel of its kind has been composed by an American. To be sure, it is not precisely the work to place in the hands of a lady ; but its incidents are striking and original, its scenes of passion nervously wrought, and its philosophy, if not at all times tenable, at least admirable on the important scores of suggestiveness and audacity. In a word, it is that rare thing a fiction of power without rudeness. Its spirit, in general, resembles that of Reynolds' "Miserrimus."

Had the "George Balcombe" of Professor Beverley Tucker been the work of any one born North of Mason and Dixon's line, it would have been long ago recognized as one of the very noblest fictions ever written by an American. It is almost as good as Caleb Williams." The manner in which the cabal of the "North American Review" first write all our books and then review them, puts me in mind of the fable about the Lion and the Painter. It is high time that the literary South took its own interests into its own charge.

Here is a good idea for a Magazine paper :—let

* "Confessions of a Poet."

somebody "work it up :"—A flippant pretender to universal acquirement—a would-be Crichton—engrosses, for an hour or two perhaps, the attention of a large company—most of whom are profoundly impressed by his knowledge. He is very witty, in especial, at the expense of a modest young gentleman, who ventures to make no reply, and who, finally, leaves the room as if overwhelmed with confusion ;—the Crichton greeting his exit with a laugh. Presently he returns, followed by a footman carrying an armfull of books. These are deposited on the table. The young gentleman, now, referring to some pencilled notes which he had been secretly taking during the Crichton's display of erudition, pins the latter to his statements, each by each, and refutes them all in turn, by reference to the very authorities cited by the egotist himself—whose ignorance at all points is thus made apparent.

A long time ago—twenty-three or four years at least—Edward C. Pinckney, of Baltimore, published an exquisite poem entitled "A Health." It was profoundly admired by the critical few, but had little circulation :—this for no better reason than that the author was born too far South. I quote a few lines :

Affections are as thoughts to her,
The measures of her hours—
Her feelings have the fragraney,
The freshness of young flowers.
To her the better elements
And kindlier stars have given
A form so fair, that, like the air,
'Tis less of Earth than Heaven.

Now, in 1842, Mr. George Hill published "The Ruins of Athens and Other Poems"—and from one of the "Other Poems" I quote what follows :

And thoughts go sporting through her mind
Like children among flowers ;
And deeds of gentle goodness are
The measures of her hours.
In soul or face she bears no trace
Of one from Eden driven,
But like the rainbow seems, though born
Of Earth, a part of Heaven.

Is this plagiarism or is it not ?—I merely ask for information.

"Grace," says Horace Walpole, "will save any book," and without it none can live long." I can never read Mrs. Osgood's poetry without a strong propensity to ring the changes upon this indefinite word "grace" and its derivatives. About every thing she writes we perceive this indescribable charm ; of which, perhaps, the elements are a vivid fancy and a quick sense of the proportionate. "Grace," however, may be most satisfactorily defined, at least for the present, as "a term applied, in despair, to that class of the impressions of Beauty which admit of no analysis." Mrs. O. has lately evinced a true imagination, with a "movement" (as Schlegel has it) or energy, of which I have been considering her incapable. Beyond all question the first of American poetesses:—and yet we must judge her less by what she has done than by what she shows ability to do. A happy refinement—an instinctive sense of the pure and delicate—is one of her most noticeable merits. She could accomplish much—very much.

One of our truest poets is Thomas Buchanan Read. His most distinctive features are, first, "tenderness," or subdued passion, and secondly, fancy. His sin is imitativeness. At present, although evincing high capacity, he is but a copyist of Longfellow—that is to say, but the echo of an echo. Here is a beautiful thought which is not the property of Mr. Read:

And, where the spring-time sun had longest shone,
A violet looked up and found itself alone.

Here again: a Spirit

Slowly through the lake descended,
Till from her hidden form below
The waters took a golden glow,
As if the star which made her forehead bright
Had burst and filled the lake with light.

Lowell has some lines very similar, ending with

As if a star had burst within his brain.

I cannot say that I ever fairly comprehended the force of the term "insult," until I was given to understand, one day, by a member of the "North American Review" clique, that this journal was "not only willing but anxious to render me that justice which had been already rendered me by the 'Revue Francaise' and the 'Revue des Deux Mondes'"—but was "restrained from so doing" by my "invincible spirit of antagonism." I wish the "North American Review" to express no opinion of me whatever—for I have none of it. In the meantime, as I see no motto on its title-page, let me recommend it one from Sterne's "Letter from France." Here it is:—"As we rode along the valley we saw a herd of asses on the top of one of the mountains—how they viewed and reviewed us!"

I blush to see, in the — —, an invidious notice of Bayard Taylor's "Rhymes of Travel." What makes the matter worse, the critique is from the pen of one who, although undeservedly, holds himself, some position as a poet:—and what makes the matter worse, the attack is anonymous, and (while ostensibly commending) most zealously endeavors to damn the young writer "with faint praise." In his whole life, the author of the criticism never published a poem, long or short, which could compare, either in the higher merits, or in the minor morals of the Muse, with the worst of Mr. Taylor's compositions.

Observe the generalizing, disingenuous, patronizing tone:—

"It is the empty charlatan, to whom all things are alike impossible, who attempts every thing. He can do one thing as well as another; for he can really do nothing. . . . Mr. Taylor's volume, as we have intimated, is an advance upon his previous publication. We could have wished, indeed, something more of restraint in the rhetoric, but," &c., &c., &c.

The concluding sentence, here, is an excellent example of one of the most ingeniously malignant of critical ruses—that of condemning an author, in especial, for what the world, in general, feel to be his principal merit. In fact, the "rhetoric" of Mr. Taylor, in the sense intended by the critic, is Mr. Taylor's distinguishing excellence. He is, unquestionably, the most terse, glowing, and vigorous of all our poets, young or old—in point, I mean, of expression. His sonorous, well-balanced rhythm puts me often in mind of Campbell (in spite of our anonymous friend's implied sneer at "mere jingling of rhymes, brilliant and successful for the moment,") and his rhetoric in general is of the highest order:—By "rhetoric" I intend the mode generally in which Thought is presented. Where shall we find more magnificent passages than these?

First queenly Asia, from the fallen thrones
Of twice three thousand years,
Came with the woe a grieving Goddess veils
Who longs for mortal tears.
The dust of ruin to her mantle clung
And dimmed her crown of gold,
While the majestic sorrows of her tongue
From Tyre to Indus rolled.

Mourn with me, sisters, in my realm of woe
Whose only glory streams
From its lost childhood like the Arctic glow
Which sunless winter dreams.
In the red desert moulders Babylon
And the wild serpent's hiss
Echoes in Petra's palaces of stone
And wails Persepolis.

Then from her seat, amid the palms embowered
That shade the Lion-land,
Swart Africa in dusky aspect towered,
The fetters on her hand.
Backward she saw, from out the drear eclipse,
The mighty Theban years,
And the deep anguish of her mournful lips
Interpreted her tears.

I copy these passages first, because the critic in question has copied them, without the slightest appreciation of their grandeur—for they are grand; and secondly, to put the question of "rhetoric" at rest. No artist who reads them will deny that they are the perfection of skill in their way. But thirdly, I wish to call attention to the glowing imagination evinced in the lines italicized. My very soul revolts at such efforts, (as the one I refer to,) to depreciate such poems as Mr. Taylor's. Is there no honor—no chivalry left in the land? Are our most deserving writers to be forever sneered down, or hooted down, or damned down with faint praise, by a set of men who possess little other ability than that which assures temporary success to them, in common with Swaim's Panacea or Morrison's pills? The fact is, some person should write, at once, a Magazine paper exposing—ruthlessly exposing, the dessous de cartes of our literary affairs. He should show how and why it is that the ubiquitous quack in letters can always "succeed," while genius, (which implies self-respect, with a scorn of creeping and crawling,) must inevitably succumb. He should point out the "easy arts" by which any one, base enough to do it, can get himself placed at the very head of American Letters by an article in that magnanimous journal, "The — Review." He should explain, too, how readily the same work can be induced (as in the case of Simms,) to villify, and villify personally, any one not a Northerner, for a trifling "consideration." In fact, our criticism needs a thorough regeneration, and must have it.

THE SOUL'S CREED.

Late, as in my lonely chamber sat I as the day declined,
Meditation in my spirit magic spells of thought entwined,
And a thousand fancies flitted through the temple of my mind.

Gazing on the glowing heavens with the sunset splendor dyed,

Lo! the orb of night uprising with one pale star by her side

Blushing into brighter beauty—waxing into conscious pride.

And the airy clouds around her softly spread each silver sail,

Pilots of the purple twilight floating on the southern gale,
Laden as with costly treasure—amethyst and topaz pale.

Far across a waveless ocean, far across a summer sea,
Rose a vision fair as ever graced a tale of fairirie;
Palaces of gleaming marble, stately halls of porphyry.

Through the wide and burnished portal, flowed a radiance rich and rare,

Snowy banners, mist-empurpled, floated on the golden air;
Ne'er I ween, in Eastern story, shone a vision half so fair.

And a spell of quiet beauty, breathing from that world of light

Fell upon my lonely spirit with a deep and still delight,— Dreams of all most pure and holy—dreams of all most fair and bright.

Deeper grew the purple twilight, melting into misty haze,
Slowly then the cloud-built palace faded from my yearning gaze,—

Floated far the blackened banners—died away the portal's blaze.

Whispered then a thought uprising from my spirit's loneliness,

"Earth is dim, and life is dreary—pleasure daily groweth less;

All things fair too quickly vanish—nought is left but weariness.

Dreams of all most fair and holy in our yearning souls are shrined,

But the real living image never upon earth we find,

And we only deem that such is from that seeming in the mind.

Naught is real—naught is earnest! seeming truth is fancy's art!

Smilingly the visions come and mockingly their shadows part;

Leaving us with wearied spirit—with a sad and doubting heart.

Still believing, still pursuing, who may reach the promised goal?

Oh, it is a weary waiting, 'tis a mockery to the soul,—
Immortality still striving with mortality's control!

Cast aside the haunting visions—bid their mockery depart!
Leave thy realm of dreams, and mingle in the world's un-quiet mart,

Stilling 'mid its billowy strife the syren-music in thy heart."

Ceased that voice of sad complaining—seemed a gentle presence near—

Then arose an angel-whisper, soft and sweet and silver-
clear,

"Wherefore mournest thou sad spirit? rouse thee, be of better cheer!"

Like a ray of sunlight streaming o'er a dark and troubled sea,

Rife with hope and peace and gladness came that whisper unto me,

Breathing in its quiet tones "I see the good thou canst not see."

Telling that despite the teaching by complaining voices said,
Pure and holy is the nature in its Maker's image made,

Though the world's contamination o'er its lustre cast a shade.

And its course is ever upward, onward—like the rising sun
Waxing e'er in light and power as the myriad ages run—
Loftiest of earth's attainments but its untold power begun.

For not alone another life awaits the soul from this set free—
Life on life, a countless series, runs through all eternity;
What we dream of heaven's glory, but the dawn of that to be.

But the dawn of unknown ages, still ascending higher, higher!

Unto which the soul's free impulse doth unconsciously aspire,
Back unto the glorious fount from whence it drew its vital fire.

Therefore every gentle feeling, every pure and lofty thought,
Is a faint and far reflection from its Maker's image caught—Guiding to those lofty aims by creeds and maxims vainly taught.

Not for me that worldly wisdom—scornful of its weak
control,
Take I now my creed and standard from the impulse of my soul;
Meted not by worldly measure is my spirit's lofty goal.

Earnest of a brighter future, prophecy of things to be,
Are those yearning aspirations seeming but a phantasy;
Fades the rainbow, but its promise in the future still we see.

The Sabbath in its Poetical Aspects.

"Less fearful on this day the limping hare Stops and looks back on man, his deadliest foe."

Grahame.

A spring morning had come. It ushered in the day of rest and Ringwood had never looked as quiet or as handsome before. The kirks round about were all closed, a thing which sometimes happens in the country when our pastors are away. As the hours into which day is divided were chasing each other off, the writer got to ruminating upon what the Sabbath had done for poetry and what poetry had done for the Sabbath. The Sabbath presents itself periodically to the poet, and invites his eye on a range among its tints, whilst some of the poets, grateful for the materials it gives, have sung its sweet repose.

The writer is aware that he here comes again into collision with the Utilitarians, to some of whose schemes he cannot be reconciled. The rail-car is just as swift on the Sabbath as on any other day in the week and so is the steam-boat. The canal is just as noisy on Sunday as on Monday, and the mail-boy carries as much lumber on that as on any other day. But in this connection it would be inappropriate to treat this matter in its gravest aspects. The science of Theology has lessons of its own, nor shall we attempt to supplant it in any one of its offices. It is our wish to speak simply of the lights in which the Sabbath sometimes affects the imagination.

We have been often impressed by the silence of the sacred day. This is one of the features in its face which Grahame, the Scotch poet, has clothed with special interest. The gates of cities are shut, the tumult of towns is hushed—the village is reduced to silence, and the hamlet becomes increasingly still. Even the encampments made by huge armies are affected by its repose, though we lament to think that the great battle of Waterloo was fought on Sunday. That was a sanguinary day for the rose of England and the lily of Gaul. How much sweeter would harvest hymns have been, rising from the ravines of La Haye Sainte, than the fanfare of loud clarions and fierce trumpets? The color of a purple field is not so refreshing as that of a green one and Waterloo would have pleased us better on Sunday morning than on Sunday night. In the morning it stood in ranks of corn or waved in ripened wheat: but at night furrows and corn hills had been turned into sepulchres and mounds. We never liked noise but especially the noise of battle, and we return to our tranquil theme. Rural objects are generally still, but more so than usual on Sunday. There is something poetical in the lowing of herds and in the browsing of flocks, and in the milk-maid's song, and in the sound of the deer-bell. But on the sacred day the hum of rural labor seems to cease. A vis inertiae appears to seize the plough, the mill, the hay cart and the bee house, and lay its spell on the picturesque hill and dale. Sounds there may be, for the ringdove will coo—the lark will sing—the bee will hum and the sheep ring its bell, but these are sounds in harmony with the day. Poets must, by necessity, possess some descriptive power, and many of them have employed that power on the objects to which we have just alluded.

The imagination is often aroused by the church-going bell. Its chimes inspire animation and delight. In Scotland dissenters are not allowed to ring people to kirk, and dissenters in England are debarred from the same privilege. But why not augment the melody and add as much as possible to that of the established peals? This intolerance is at war with the best feelings of our nature, and turns churches, founded on policy and law, into sectarian institutions. When Selkirk was on the island of Juan Fernandez he heard the beating of the surf: but, according to Cowper, he heard nothing that called him to church. He was a lonely officer—the comrade of goats: but became a good Utilitarian before leaving his strip of land. We do not recollect that Burns has said much of the steeple: but we know that his Cotter's Saturday Night is a charming poem. How sweetly does he arrange the preliminaries to the Sabbath, and depict the home joys of the peasant. What pure Parnasian breath stole over that performance, and anointed the rustic temple which his imagination reared in an Ayrshire cottage. And sacred sounds pass over the volumes of Christopher North, and Irving employs them in his Newstead Abbey—his Sketch Book and his Bracebridge Hall. Addison used to obey the signal and walk to church with Sir Roger like Iulus by the side of Æneas, sed non paribus passibus, for the moralist would stop and look around him with an eye as bright as that of the celestial bird of China. He read more than his comrade in the gloss of woods—the primrose and the hyacinth, for he stripped the veil from Nature and turned it into a parti-colored shroud in which his imagination delighted to bury itself, whilst its requiem was sung by pensive birds among willows and sepulchral violets. We speak of his prose, for his Cato is no great affair, and several of the best hymns ascribed to him were the hymns of Marvell. If the reader would not deem us too serious, we would here allude to the way in which Leigh Richmond has written of the Sabbath bell in the Isle of Wight. He wrote in prose, but there is more than one dash of poetry in his productions. Cut off from the mainland—much of its exterior bristled with rocks—with marine water-marks on its coast—its interior is singularly fertile, producing eight times more than its home consumption. Its prose poet does justice to its luxuriance—its seats of opulence, its flocks and mountain ridges, and tells in felicitous terms how Sabbath sounds steal through its vales or rise among its uplands and call the peasant from his dale and the nobleman from his rural entrenchment into the Lord's house. And Grahame has done the same even in that land—

Where feathery clouds condensed and furled
In columns sweep the quaking glen.

The imagination is sometimes employed upon the influence which the sacred day exercises over objects at a distance. For example, when we leave the English cities and go out into the country, we cannot help calling on this faculty to aid our reflections. England is studded with towns and hamlets, some on the hill and some in the dale. Her churches are pleasing objects in the landscape, and often claim the vision of the tourist. They are planted on the downs, or the plains, or the slopes, or embowered in the woods, and in them the nobility mix with the shepherd and the hedger. There is a world of history connected with the Anglo-Saxon abbeys and cathedrals, whose ruins are like grey clouds fallen down on the green earth. But we will not enlarge. It is a pleasant thing, however, to indulge the imagination upon the little nooks of England that are like so many dots or periods where attention pauses over the complex book of her history. But our desire is just to glance at one or two poetical facts connected with the English

Sabbath. Old Izaak Walton was a sort of poet. He lived at a time when the history of his country had got into a storm: but on Saturday night the old angler used to decamp from the quiet brooks and lay by his rod and line and net. His skiff was moored in the miniature bays of the sea, where it rocked to and fro till Monday dawned. Some of the English poets have been the sons of rectors. Addison was son to Launcelot and his boyhood was spent at home, and we cannot help figuring out the urchin at the parsonage learning to write, or strolling down the lane, or at church gazing on the villagers, from an eye, that served him as a small tower of observation, on the peculiarities of the people. Or he paced the grounds of the rectory as he afterwards beat a path at Magdalen, and then that pencil commenced its operations which, in the future, was destined to sketch Italy—to pourtray London—to trace Eastern visions and introduce moral allegories and Saturday papers like clouds of purity into the intellectual horizon of England. Dr. Young was rector of Welwyn, a town of a thousand inhabitants in Herts, and Dyer had a good living, and Dean Swift—but we cannot tolerate the Dean. We would say to him procul—procul. When Dr. Johnson left Bolt Court and visited Staffordshire he used to attend on Sunday at the Cathedral of Litchfield, and who has not thought of him uttering his responses like a child? Was there any object in Dovedale so beautiful as that old giant on his knees? And who has not thought of Goldsmith and the rectory, of his brother at Pallas, and the gown of that good man, or of Crabbe at Trowbridge, or of Cowper in his Sunday boudoir, or of Salisbury Plain and its contented shepherd? Coleridge, too, was brought up at a rectory on the Otter that winds by the town as if it flowed by volition. Among the elms and myrtles of Devonshire that mind began its being which conceived the plot of dramas—the plan of the Ancient Mariner and the Aids to Reflection which unravelled the web of politics and dealt out colloquial volumes to the refined circles in which he moved. Nether Stowey, Allfoxden, Keswick and Highgate were his favorite haunts. It gives us pleasure here to acknowledge that Irving in several of his pieces has been true to the repose and the chastened sounds of the hallowed day. He, indeed, always calls it Sunday, and we will not break a lance with him for a word, but Sunday is a designation which suits a gentleman, whilst Sabbath suits the poet. Enough, however of England, for incidents and associations of this kind would extend our remarks to an unwarrantable length.

It would be pleasing here to note how Sunday has been kept in many corners of France, or among the Tyrolese peasants, and in the Swiss vallies. We do not know what the reality might be, but the Swiss are a very interesting people viewed through the imagination. But of all people the Scotch, perhaps, are the most remarkable in keeping the Sabbath, from the Highlands to the Tweed. The only regular poem ever written about the sacred day, was by James Grahame, who was born near Glasgow in 1765, and who was first a lawyer and then a minister. He sketched out and filled up in his poem a Scottish Sunday, weaving round about it the scenery which Burns has depicted with a bolder, but not with so soft a pencil. The scenery of Scotland differs from that of England in many obvious points. Its wildness is certainly one of those points, unless the lake country be an exception, and we admit the latter to be highly romantic. Nor do we know where more justice has been done to it, than by Dr. Arnold, who was master of the Rugby School in Warwickshire, and who cultivated a little spot in Westmoreland, called Fox How. Fox How became to him a kind of staid, from the interior of which he took a more exact likeness of the country than Southey or Wordsworth. But when we cross the Tweed, we come in contact with stone kirks and mansees—with friths and locks—with a profusion of hawthorn glens and harebell dales—with mountains, braes and burns over which the breath of the Muses has been richly blown. In connection with such objects Grahame has treated his subject. It is a poem far before his "Birds of Scotland," and superior to Byron's Hebrew Melodies, or Tom Moore's sacred pieces. We cannot forgive Byron for his attack on the author of the "Sabbath," in his celebrated satire. It was well for him to wrestle down Lord Brougham and draw a few drops from Lord Jeffrey's blood and break Southey's neck: but to assault one of our favorite poets was a mortal sin. Here was a lowly pastor who lived in a country parish, of kind feelings to the hedger and the herb woman, who went out of the tread-mill of his profession to sing the sound of his lute over the Sabbath, and yet Lord George attacks him with relentless mercy. He might just as well have bruised a violet because it was meek, or shot at a harebell and thus wasted his fire when hunting after ravenous wolves.

But to leave this episode, and get back to our theme. Our imagination has quite as often been occupied with the Scottish mansees, as with the rectories of England. We have wished to send as on magnetic wires our Sabbath feelings to old Caledonia, and to receive in return cards on which Scottish objects are pictured. To a person of simple tastes it is entertaining to look at the Ednam manse, where the author of the Seasons was brought up on the Liddel, or the manse where Armstrong, Robertson, Mickle, the translator of the Lusiad, and Witherspoon, were reared, and the kirks where Logan, Herne and Blair, the author of the Grave, officiated.

The imagination often takes delight in the morning scenes of this world, when objects were their first gloss. What mind can be so destitute of taste as never to have thought of the first seventh after the six days in which Creation had been finished up to its last embellishments? The pencil of the imagination is here powerless and falls away from the grasp even of the most skilful delineator.

How sweet was the dawn of that day when the Creator's eye beheld the wonder he had reared—an orb which had just started on its eventful race. Were there mountains near Eden, then the hues of light which painted them on the seventh day must have been enchanting to the eye of the first man beneath the flowering almond tree on the lawn of Eden. All was still in that garden. Still when the sun arose—still at his meridian—and still at twilight, save when the lion romped in his crown of flowers, or the play of the tiger drew smiles from his keeper, or when the lama darted aside to browse, or when the rivers dashed together in melodious concert, or when the wings of celestial visitants rustled at the gates and those visitants left their purple stoles and their unclasped sandals before the forbidden tree, and their diadems sparkling among the amaranths around the tree of Life. There is poetry in the beginning of the world: but where are the poets? Shall we speak of Byron's Cain, or Moore's Loves of the Angels, one the bard of skepticism and the other of wine? No, we will speak of Gesner, because, though not great he was good, and of Montgomery's "World before the Flood," because in all the charming productions of its author, he is on the side of virtue, of philanthropy and good will to his race. He is not so flashy as Moore, for Moore looks at things through a sensual prism, while Montgomery has always employed a chastened kaleidoscope.* And in this connection we would speak of Milton, did not the builder of Paradise Lost demand a chapter instead of a sentence. His mind was like some vast cathedral wherein his strains could rise to celestial devotion, or fall away to the lowlier homage of earth, intermingling with the storm of melody the brief sonnet and the inspiring hymn.

In that Sabbath reverie, which the writer is trying to recall, he could not help indulging a few reflections on subjects a little serious. Abel's crook and the rod of the Hebrew legislator, and the manna which pattered all night on tents once planted in Arabia's deserts, and the wand of Joshua, came up as well as Jubal's lyre. Greece is covered all over with a classic mantle; but over the face of Palestine Heaven has thrown a mantle on which many moral pictures have been wrought out in threads of all beautiful colors. There is Tabor's cone—and there are the heights of Carmel—and the bulky cedars of Lebanon—and the purple rocks of Calvary, celebrated by Pope and Bishop Heber and a hundred travellers, and of which Tasso sung in noble verse. And there are the blue waters of Gennesareth and the reeds of the Jordan. And there are olive trees under which a great pilgrim used once to pause, and fig trees from which he pulled the fruit. There too lived some Sabbath poets, to whom we need not refer.

* One of the most interesting hours the writer has ever spent, was in conversation with Joseph Galea, sealer, who was well acquainted with Montgomery.

In our reverie we could not help casting out a thought to those good men who, in their different corners, are telling of the Sabbath to many who never heard that word before; but let us not become theological here. It may be poetical to think of the Persian's robe, and of the scimitar of the Turk, and of the Arab's sandals, but it is not so to think of the half-closed eyelids of the New Hollanders,

And of the Cannibals that each other eat,
The Anthropophagi and men whose heads
Do grow beneath their shoulders.

After ruminating in this way, about twilight, my Ringwood grounds looked very sweet, dressed out in the bloom of apple and peach tree orchards. The sight recalled to mind the descriptive poetry of Mrs. Hemans and the fact that this noble woman always liked the Sabbath. Among the bold mountains of Wales she sung the sacred day; and when dying among the shamrocks of the Emerald Isle, she indited to her amanuensis the lines with which we shall conclude—

How many groups this hour are bending
Through England's primrose meadow-paths their way
Tow'rs spire and tower, midst shadowy elms ascending,
Whence the sweet chimes proclaim the hallowed day.

I may not tread
With them those pathways—to the feverish bed
Of sickness bound—yet O my God I bless
Thy mercy that with Sabbath peace hath filled
My chastened heart.

THE POET TO HIS WIFE.

BY REV. JOHN C. M'CABE.

I met thee first, my gentle one, amid a heartless crowd,
When my soul was darkened over with sorrow's shadowy cloud;
And thy soft and lute-like breathings came so sweetly on my ear,
They calmed the spirit's anguish deep, and checked th rising tear.

We met again, my gentle one, where music's power was felt,
And songs of touching melody made sternest natures melt;
But one sweet voice above the rest,—its calm and silvery tone,
I knew,—my loved, my gentle one—could only be thine own.

We stood beneath the calm blue sky—the stars were marching on,
In quest of some sweet sister star, which from its sphere
had gone;
I wooed thee in that hour, love, while all that far off sky,
So blue, so bright, so beautiful, was mirrored in thine eye.

I wooed, I won thee, gentle one, I 'shrine thee as a gem,
More pure and precious far than that in India's diadem;
And though a shadow sometimes falls upon this heart of mine,
I know, in sunshine, or in shade—my weal and woe are thine.

We are passing on together, 'mid comforts, and 'mid cares,
And smiles have played around our path, and very often tears;
Yet grief hath proved, though for awhile 'twas dark, a just alloy,
For when 'twas past, there came, sweet one, the luxury of joy!

We are passing on together, a gray hair here and there,
Upon my brow, grows eloquent,—and sounds the note,
"prepare;"
And that calm thoughtful eye of thine, as in its depths I
gaze,
Reveals the matron, in the glance which back my worship pays.

We're passing on—but not alone, my boy climbs up my knee,
A fearless, careless, joyous child, for fun and frolic free;
A little bright-eyed daughter's laugh rings merrily and clear,—
Her mother's miniature,—I trace thy early beauty there.

We're passing on,—we might have laughed at fools and follies 'round,
But rather gave our tears, God knows, for woes wherever found;

Our prayers for earth's wide brotherhood,—'twas all we had to give—
That men might turn from folly's ways, and in His service live.

We're passing on—we're passing on—I do not grieve to go.
I know we shall be happy there—His volume tells me so!
With thee, and others, dearly loved, in that blest world of bliss,
I know I'll find a recompense for all I've lost in this.

Now I resign the poet's shell, I sweep the lyre no more!
A nobler, higher aim is mine, the Muse's reign is o'er!
God's work, not mine,—God's cause, not mine,—call for my efforts now,
My faith is pledged, and up on high, is writ the solemn vow!

And now, though God despises not the precious gift of song,
And Poetry's a holy thing, though often "warped to wrong;"
Still the dear lays of early life, I would not, cannot sing,
The strain is o'er, its echoes dead, and crushed the minstrel string.

Reminiscences of A Traveller.

No. VIII.

Three queer Villages and other things in Holland.

We were sojourning for a week in Amsterdam; the season was the fall of the year and the weather generally cold and misty; but one morning, when it was clear and exhilarating, — proposed an excursion to the country, and after debating whether we should wend our way, we decided on visiting the villages of Berkslow and Broeck, and sat out accordingly.

Crossing the water in a row-boat and landing at the toll-house, we thence proceeded on foot to Berkslow. The houses which constitute this little town are painted of divers colors—blue, red, pink, green, yellow, brown and lilach! and a few are painted black, thus varying from one extreme to another, that is from being of all colors, becoming of no color at all. The general appearance of the place, reminded us of Burlington in the State of New Jersey.

We passed en route the Grand Canal of Holland, which unites the river Wye with the Zuyder Zee, and was cut for the purpose of allowing vessels of the largest size to reach Amsterdam without discharging a portion of their cargoes, which they were formerly obliged to do, in order to get over a bar. This canal is said to be the largest in the world, and is indeed a stupendous work! We witnessed the passage of a vessel of considerable magnitude, and were told that a short while previous, a man-of-war, mounting one hundred and twenty guns, had been carried through the enormous locks with ease and safety.

At Berkslow we endeavored to procure a boat or a carriage to convey us to Broeck, but failed in each attempt, so nothing daunted though much disappointed and somewhat fatigued, we even determined to continue our journey on foot rather than turn back, and a rough and tough time we had of it! Broeck is several miles from Amsterdam, but alas! for us, we made a mistake in the road and thereby nearly doubled the distance. The path lay over an unfinished causeway composed of loose stones—these hurt our feet,—then the wind rose and assailed our bonnets and faces with the usual blustering rudeness of Old Boreas and his attendant gusts from the North Sea. Yet on, on we trudged with a patience and perseverance quite equal to those of the phlegmatic race through whose country we were thus toiling. At length we attained the object of our labors and quickly discerned that it was well worth the difficulties we had surmounted in getting to it. Such a peculiar! such a queer kind of a town or village we never had beheld in the course of our perigrations, either in Europe or America, and it is surprising that no description of it has been given in any of the various narratives of travellers through Holland which I have read.

Indeed, we should not have known of its existence and its proximity to Amsterdam, but for the loquacity of our "Maitre d'Hotel," who was what "Mrs. Malaprop" would designate as a good-natured and talkative "sort of a person." He told us, besides, of many other things deserving the attention of "Lookers on in Holland."

Broeck is remarkable, (even in Holland where every place is neat,) for its perfect neatness and tranquillity. No drawing-room could be more exquisitely clean than its nicely-paved alleys, for I cannot term them streets, they are so very, very narrow! They are not more than four or five feet wide, I should think, with the exception of the main street, which is tolerably spacious, and like the others, paved with glazed and shining tiles, daily sprinkled with sand, probably for two purposes, to prevent one from slipping and for the sake of tidiness. Not a vehicle of any kind is suffered to be brought into the town, nor an animal permitted to enter it, unless some of the feathered tribe may chance to alight there in the course of an aerial excursion. In one of the streets, we observed a small flock of crows pecking about quite as much at their ease as if in a wilderness, nor did they evince the least fear or concern at our passing very near them; yet they were not domesticated, and had alighted merely for a short time, for in less than half-an-hour, they were again on the wing towards some other spot.

The houses of Broeck, like the houses of Berkslow, are of many colors, and each one has a certain door next the street, which is never opened except on the occurrence of a wedding, or a funeral in the family. At all other times the entrance is through the back doors of the dwellings, and by these may be seen, whenever there has been a fall of rain, or snow, a pair or pairs of wooden slippers, intended for the use of all comers, who, to avoid soiling the floors within, put off their wet shoes and leave them without, and in place of them wear the sabots. They are never in much demand, for there is little sociability or visiting among the people of the place—we were told that they rarely left their homes even in fine weather; and in our ramble through the village, we did not encounter more than ten or twelve persons.

Near the centre of the town was a pretty lake, upon the borders of which several storks were feeding. These birds are held in veneration in Holland as well as in Germany—it is deemed sacrilegious to kill them and considered a favorable omen by the superstitious if they take up their quarters in the chimney, or on the roof of a house. One cause of their being so valued and preserved is that they destroy venomous insects and reptiles and the eggs of serpents. Their usual resort is the stable yard.

We visited a beautiful garden, the property of a wealthy "Mynheer" named Bakker. Besides flowers and shrubs, trees and rivulets, statues and miniature bridges, a pigeon and summer-house a la Chinoise, and a green-house teeming with geraniums in full blossom, it contained a rustic cottage which was quite a curiosity, not merely from its completeness without, but for its contents. It was a picturesque thing with a low thatched roof and a single apartment furnished in the usual style of such dwellings. In it, three automatons, or wooden figures, were seated on rush-bottom chairs—an old woman with a spinning-wheel before her, an old man holding a reel, and a sportsman with a gun. Each was painted, dressed and arranged so naturally, and was so life-like in appearance, that on seeing them unexpectedly, we involuntarily started and for a moment believed we had intruded upon the domestic privacy of a living group.

Scarcely had we recovered from this surprise when another was given us. While we were busy in examining the automatons, our cicerone, who was the gardener of the earthly paradise we had been perambulating, slipped, unperceived by us, into a closet in the rear of the cottage and put in motion a small wheel connected with the wooden figures, by a spring ingeniously contrived and concealed.

No sooner was this spring touched than the old crone began to spin with all her might, and the old man with equal energy to wind his reel and puff smoke from a pipe he held in his mouth. Where the smoke came from, and how it was produced, Heaven knows!—we did not discover—but cheerily it curled away.

The sportsman was the only inactive one of the company—perhaps he was too tired after a hunting excursion to move—for as we found him, so we left him, listlessly resting upon his gun.

Around the cottage was a bright array of pewter plates and dishes and some copper kettles and pans. You could almost see your face in their polished sides and surfaces; and the shelves upon which they stood were as clean and white as deal boards could be scoured.

By-the-by, I have omitted in speaking of the automatons above, to mention the most ingenious and wonderful thing in their construction—viz: that their heads and eyes moved, and it was really diverting to observe their motions and glances.

On the way back to Amsterdam we stopped at several farm houses to see the arrangement of the cow-stables, which had been represented as remarkably neat and clean, and verily there was no exaggeration in the account. A description of one may suffice for all, as they were very similar in every respect.

A long low building was divided on one side into fifteen or twenty stalls, in each stall was an open window above a trough filled with hay, or other food. Each cow was haltered and fastened to a post, and so thoroughly curried and rubbed, that her skin was sleek and shining, and we remarked that with few exceptions, all the cows we saw were black and spotted with white. When the cold is severe a woolen cover is girted on to keep them warm. The floors of the stalls were planked and there were pipes for conveying water and cleansing them several times a day.

On the side of the building opposite the stalls, was a range of doors communicating with the various apartments of the family and with the dairy, than which nothing could be more complete. Its capacious basins of cream and milk, and golden-hued pots of butter, were tempting to behold! The main passage of the house, and I believe the only one, was this space between the stalls and doors described, but it was not in the least disagreeable—such perfect cleanliness and order prevailed throughout the whole establishment.

On these farms large quantities of excellent butter and cheese are made, the sale of which contributes mainly to the support of their thrifty owners.

Much to our comfort and satisfaction we succeeded in obtaining a boat after leaving Broeck. This was pulled along by a man upon the shore, and as it glided upon the surface of the canal we were quite astonished at the immense numbers of wild geese which clamored above, and sometimes even fluttered around us. We were also struck with the grotesque costume of the country women who passed us. Some of them wore full plaited chintz petticoats and short gowns with tight sleeves, round and flat crowned caps with stiff-floated borders to garnish the face, but not so much over it as to conceal a pair of large and heavy gold earrings. Several who seemed of a higher grade than the ordinary class, had their foreheads decorated with gilt or golden bandeaus set with brilliant stones and secured to their caps by a clasp on each side of the head. The women of Holland, like those of Germany, (I allude to the lower classes) are great drudges. We met one driving a cart loaded with cheeses and two others toiling with a wheel-barrow quite overstocked with vegetables of divers kinds; one pushed it along while her companion dragged it by a rope attached to the back of it, but it seemed very hard work and they made slow progress.

We reached Amsterdam at sun-set, and on approaching the tower, a sound of music, as it were from the clouds, saluted our ears!—the clocks were chiming a tune, as all the clocks of Holland do before they strike the hour. On the way to our lodgings we saw two men clad in deep-mourning surtout coats, with streamers of black cloth bound with black satin ribbon attached to their backs—they wore cocked hats with flowing crape bands, and their shoes were adorned with enormous silver buckles—their appearance was so strange that we could not help enquiring of a passenger in the street what was their vocation, and were informed they were bearers of funeral invitations. A few days afterwards we had an opportunity of witnessing a funeral and a heartless scene it was! Four men thus equipped "in mockery of woe" one might truly say, walked after the hearse in company with eight others in mourning; but no sooner was the coffin deposited in the grave, than all of them jumped into the hearse and rode off as rapidly and merrily as if on a party of pleasure. The remaining persons who formed the procession, quitted the cemetery with almost as much levity—there were only a few females present, and they, like myself, stood aloof and were merely spectators. The coffin and hearse were peculiarly shaped and decorated—the first was perfectly flat on the top and widened gradually from the foot to the head. There were three coffins in one grave, placed one above another! A bystander told us that after a certain period allowed for the decomposition of the body, the bones of the dead were taken from the earth and deposited in a room over a church and when that was full the bones were again removed to a ship kept for the purpose and carried out to sea!

The hearse resembled a flat-sided narrow coach; it was surmounted with a ghastly caecutcheon, consisting of a sculptured death's-head and cross bones entwined with laurel leaves—over the door behind was a large hour glass between a pair of Death's wings. The driver was clad in black and wore what seemed to me the usual badge of public menial office in Holland, a cocked hat—the horses were black and covered with palls that almost touched the ground.

Our next aquatic excursion from Amsterdam, was to the village of Saardam, famed for ship-building and wind-mills, of which a goodly number were whirling away when we arrived, as briskly as in the days of the pilgrimage and perigrinations of the Knight of La Mancha and his pury squire.

The weather was cold and misty, but we were anugly wafted on a small steamer that plied daily between Amsterdam and the little haven we sought. The inhabitants of Saardam are said to have boasted that if given only two months notice they could build a ship for every week in the year—fifty-two ships in twelve months!! What a task! But it was neither their ships nor their wind-mills that allured us to their village, but a simple rude hut, a venerable relic of departed greatness—in plainer terms, it was the hut in which the Czar of Russia, Peter the Great, resided during two years, for the purpose of studying and practising the art of ship-building, to which he was prompted by his unquenchable thirst for universal knowledge. Here, in disguise, and under the assumed name of Michaelhoff, he sedulously labored with common workmen until he had acquired the information and skill he desired to possess.

I am no friend to despots, however dazzling and fascinating their mental qualities and attainments may be, and my recollections of some occurrences and traits mentioned in the annals of the renowned Czar, as I stood within his lowly habitation, were not by any means of a pleasing nature.

I thought of his furious and ungovernable fits of passion—the cruel punishments he caused to be inflicted, and sometimes even assisted in personally! of his unkind treatment and unjust re-pudding of his first wife Eudoxia—his indifference and harshness to their only son, the unfortunate Alexis Petrowitch, who, though a man of intemperate and vicious habits was still his child, and perhaps had acquired those very habits in consequence of his father's shameful neglect of his education, but above all I thought of the dark, deep stain impressed upon the Czar's character, by the suspicious and mysterious death of that same ill-fated son, and my admiration of the abilities and brilliant achievements of the emperor was almost lost in the remembrance of his brutality and tyrannical sway.

A lofty shed, covered with flaming red tiles and resting upon open arches, is erected over the hut to shield it from storm and sun. Within are two small rooms; that on the left hand was the Czar's work-shop; that on the right, through which you enter, was his chamber and they assure you contains the identical articles of furniture he used, viz: three triangular chairs painted ash color, a long oaken table and a cupboard. In a closet is shewn a very broad, low shelf upon which he laid his bed. The hearth and chimney were extremely wide, the former paved with immense square bricks, and each side of the fireplace was covered with glazed white tiles adorned with pictures, done in brown, such as I have often seen in old-fashioned houses in New York. Over the mantle-piece were two inscriptions upon marble slabs, inserted into the wall. Upon one was engraved the names "Peter Magno," "Alexander"—and we were told that the Emperor Alexander put it there with his own hands after the battle of Waterloo—but it is not probable that he took that trouble, when masons were so near and numerous. The second inscription was placed there by order of Government and was very long. In 1825 an inundation overspread the floor of the hut to the depth of several feet, but subsided without doing any injury.

Before leaving Saardam we visited a collection of landscapes, figures, birds, flowers and animals cut out of white paper and so inimitably executed that they resembled beautiful reliefs in marble, and in a neighboring church we saw a curious picture representing a ferocious bull which had killed a man and a woman. The picture was hung over their tombs. In the same church was a singular pulpit supported by a Pelican feeding its young with the blood from its breast—meant, I suppose, to be emblematical of the blood of the Redeemer, shed for us.

We returned to Amsterdam in rain and snow, both falling at the same time—thus ended our day's adventures and thus ends my narration for the present.

J. M. C.

"MONK" LEWIS.

Matthew Gregory Lewis, (commonly called Monk from the novel of that name which he wrote,) was born at London in the year 1775. His parents were of ancient and wealthy families. The father held an important station in the war department, and, in addition to the monies thence derived, received a very respectable income from estates in the West Indies. The mother was a lady of great beauty, of elegant deportment and unaffected good breeding. She was also a person of distinguished literary ability and taste; and in belles-lettres there always existed the greatest congeniality of feeling between Lewis and his mother. Between his parents, disagreements of no small importance arose, and at last a final separation was agreed upon; but the son never forgot the respect he owed his father, or the deep affection he had early cherished for his mother's memory.

With the exception, perhaps, of Lord Byron, there was no man so much talked of in his time as Monk Lewis. To-day he was abused; to-morrow praised: and between the battledores of envy and idolatry, his feet never touched the ground of obscurity. He was not a great romancer, a great poet, or a dramatist of the first order. But he dealt in the horrible, and with an imagination naturally vivid, and afterwards stored with all the phantasies of the German and Italian schools, he succeeded in effectively administering to the then prevailing taste for the supernatural.

His versification was smooth, agreeable in sound, correct in rhythm and frequently of a high imaginative order. So singularly melodious was his verse, that writers of operas, and musicians, constantly beset him for materials with which to build the bridges of harmony. As a dramatist his great knowledge of stage effect and acute perception of situation rendered his plays very popular; and for many years he was the play-wright for Drury Lane and Covent Garden—his offspring bringing into their treasuries enormous receipts. His "Castle Spectre" and "Timour the Tartar" are well known to theatre-goers of the present day.

If he was distinguished as a literary character, he was pre-eminently so as a man. The correspondence he has left behind him shows forth his ardent affections and his unostentatious generosity. He was a kind son and a valuable friend.

In his twenty-first year Lewis became a votary of love. He conceived a violent and lasting attachment for the celebrated Lady Charlotte

Campbell—a lady no less distinguished for the graces of personal, than for the charms of mental beauty. In the companionship of this lovely female, Lewis, while a guest of her father, spent many happy hours. But however great was his attachment, there is no reason to believe that the lady entertained for her eccentric admirer stronger sentiments than those of admiration and esteem for his literary and social qualities. In person Mat Lewis, (as his intimate friends at first termed him,) was quite ordinary; his stature was rather diminutive; his face was almost an ellipse, looking upon it from the side, and his features though pleasant were not to be regarded as handsome. His forehead, however, was high and his eyes very lustrous. These considerations might have had some influence in deciding the choice of a young girl, who, at an early age, was beset by admiring flatterers; but, whatever they were, Lewis found his suit likely to prove unsuccessful and gave up the chase. Between Lady Campbell and himself, however, there afterwards existed a friendship which remained unimpaired until dissolved by the hand of death. To her many of his most touching lyrics were addressed, and the well-known ballad of "Crazy Jane," written by Lewis, owed its origin to an encounter of Lady Campbell and himself with an unfortunate maniac. Mr. Lewis remained a single man until death and never forgot his early passion.

At the early age of sixteen we find him an author; and, what is more, a successful one. He wrote and Mrs. Jordan produced for her benefit, at Drury Lane, the comedy of the East Indian, which was triumphantly received. At the same time he was busily engaged upon a novel called the "Effusions of Sensibility;" two volumes of which were written but never published. It consisted principally of letters from Lady Harrowheart to Miss Sophonisba Simper, and was intended to burlesque the prevailing rage for that fashionable nonsense which is too successfully encouraged even at this day. Some of these letters are capital and we cannot forbear a short extract:

"Fair and smiling blushed the young and rubicund morn when I stopt into my father's post chaise and four on Friday last. The azure atmosphere smiled with touching serenity; the feathered songsters poured forth their early orisons from the May-besprinkled bushes; and the heifers hastening to their daily labors lowed cheerfully to hail the gold-streaked dawn. But my sad heart was incapable of sharing the calm pleasures which on all sides offered themselves to my eyes. In vain did the atmosphere smile—I could not smile at the atmosphere. In vain did the birds trill their warbling songs—I could not trill my song in concert. In vain did the heifers low—I could not low in return. Leaden sorrow oppressed my palpitating bosom and stifled the feeble exertion of infant joy. As we approached the postern gate, the gardener stood there to open it. 'Adieu, John,' said I, 'I wish you health and happiness.' 'Good bye lady,' answered the fellow, grinning with satisfaction at the honor I had done him. The grin was not in unison with my feelings at that moment. I turned away my head to the other window and there beheld a creature possessed of much more sentiment than the old gardener. It was his dog Pompey, who, you know, my dear Sophonisba, is blind of one eye and lame of one leg; but it is the heart which gives value, and Pompey's more than repaid the roughness and deformity of his external appearance. 'Adieu, Pompey,' said I. The interesting animal wagged his tail and cried 'bow! wow!' Had he said, 'Will you then leave me, my beloved mistress,' it could not have spoken to my heart with such audible expression as did its lamentable 'bow! wow,' and the peculiar style he made use of to shake his shaggy tail. Had I before hated the creature, his admirable behavior at that moment would have obliterated every sentiment of unmerited aversion. As it was, the milk of human kindness boiled in my bosom, and in spite of all my papa's arguments, I resolved to descend from the carriage and embrace the dog for the last time. Pompey instantly leapt into my arms. He had just come out of the water, and his caresses dirtied my beautiful new scarlet riding-habit from top to bottom; but it was the dirt of sensibility and I felt proud of it."

The "effusions" were never published: why, does not appear. Of all works, satirical ones sell best. As an old writer observes, "satire is that kind of mirror wherein every body sees every body's faces except their own; therefore few are offended at it." This performance, together with the comedy before alluded to, when considered as boyish productions, certainly deserve to rank among the curiosities of literature.

Temporary pecuniary embarrassments, attendant upon his parents' separation and his desire to add to his mother's income, were probably the causes which first violently impelled Lewis to literary labors. We say impelled, because otherwise, however great may have been his literary predilections, he might not have begun so early or prosecuted his labors with so much assiduity and anxiety, as he appears, from his letter, to have employed. Soon after his first play was performed, he published a volume of poems. They of course did not sell—we say of course, for the world was the same then as now, and poems untrumpeted by circumstances or fame are in these days bankrupt stock. That such was the case moreover appears from the following jeu d'esprit, written by him a few years after the publication in question, and entitled

"A PALPABLE FALSEHOOD.

In your last book, friend Mat, you really tell
A lie so gross that every one deserves it.

Your title page asserts, 'sold by John Bell ;'
How can you say 'tis sold when no one buys it?'"

About this period, amid struggles for literary fame, he spent much time in Germany and France; in the former country, exploring the mines of romance and sentiment, which are there so extended and deep. The appetite for the horrible, which had been engendered in Lewis while he was young, still clung to him. He obtained a great part of this from his mother, and it is probable her favorite work, "Glanville on Witchcraft," had no small influence over his early dreams.

"For in the wax of a soft infant's memory Things horrible sink deep, and sternly settle."

While abroad he wrote, in the short space of ten weeks, a romance of between three and four hundred pages!—almost equal to the exertions of Walter Scott in his most facile moments. On his return it was published under the title of "Ambrosia or the Monk." Never did a work of so young an author (for he was then not quite twenty) or scarcely of one mature in years, obtain a more rapid sale or more tenaciously seize upon the public attention. It was assailed by some critics on the score of immorality and plagiarism; they alleging under the latter head that the author had borrowed largely from Canzotte, Smollett and Mrs. Radcliffe. By others its claims to originality and power were immediately allowed.

It had run through two editions when the Attorney General moved for an injunction to restrain its further publication, giving as a reason its undoubted immorality and its skilful disguise of vice. The injunction, however, was never granted—perhaps because in the third edition the author expunged a large portion of the book. From this work he took his title of Monk; many then believed it his real name, his first initial M readily assisting their delusion. He was by no means offended at the appellation and answered to it readily and good humoredly, for he was as eccentric and covetous of notoriety as he was talented and persevering.

This romance was rapidly succeeded by the "Castle Spectre," a drama; "Alphonse of Castile," a tragedy; "Rugantino" a drama; "Adelgitha," a tragedy; and "The Wood Demon," an opera, to all of which stirring and agreeable music was wedded by his friend Michael Kelly, the distinguished composer and tenor singer. "The Bravo of Venice" and "Tales of Wonder and Terror" with sundry poems constitute the principal remaining portion of his literary labors.

Most of those were of decided immoral tendency; his views of vice and error were as original as destructive; and it is probable he adopted these as assistants to that eccentric reputation which he every where sustained—whether intentionally or not is a matter of debate. To illustrate this, take the following lines from his tragedy of "Adelgitha."

"Tis in man's power never to sin at all;
But, sinning once, to stop exceeds his power."

His sister, Lady Lushington, prevailed upon him to allow her supervision of his Castle Spectre and he consented, and before it was acted, full a quarter of the piece was struck out or altered.

Among his poems is that celebrated one "The Maniac," which has been lately joined to thrilling music and sung by a distinguished composer. It was originally a monodrama and presented by Mrs. Litchfield, a tragic actress, at one of her benefits. Her character as a maniac, and her embodiment of the author's imaginings, combined with the scenic effect, threw a portion of the audience into hysterics and the whole theatre into confusion and horror. Even the box keepers took fright, and universal terror clothed the countenances of boxes, pit and gallery. Mrs. Litchfield herself, in acting, was very near fainting. Of course the piece was withdrawn, but the author was sufficiently complimented by its effect, if compliment it be, to well-nigh kill a whole assemblage. The piece, with Lewis's stage directions and in its original form, is much more effective than as a bit of poetry or as a song. In its primitive dress we present it.

The scene represents a dungeon in which is a grated door guarded by strong bars and chains. In the upper part is an open gallery leading to the cells above. Slow and melancholy music. The captive is discovered in the attitude of hopeless grief: she is in chains; her eyes are fixed with a vacant stare, and her hands are folded. After a pause the Gaoler is seen passing through the upper gallery with a lamp; he appears at the grate and opens the door. The noise of the bars falling rouses the captive. She looks around eagerly; but on seeing the Gaoler enter, she waves her hand mournfully and relapses into her former stupor. The Gaoler replenishes a jug with water, and places a loaf of bread by her side. He then prepares to leave the dungeon when the captive seems to resolve on making an attempt to excite his compassion; she rises from her bed of straw, clasps his hand and sinks at his feet. The music ceases and she speaks:

"Stay, Gaoler stay, and hear my woe!
She is not mad who kneels to thee,
For what I'm now, too well I know
And what I was and what should be.
I'll rave no more in proud despair,
My language shall be calm tho' sad;
But yet I'll firmly, truly swear
I am not mad, [kissing his hand] I am not mad.

He offers to leave her; she detains him, and continues in a tone of eager persuasion:

A tyrant husband forged the tale
Which chains me in this dreary cell,
My fate unknown, my friends bewail,
Oh Gaoler haste that fate to tell.
Oh haste, my father's heart to cheer;
That heart at once, 'twill grieve and glad
To know, tho' kept a captive here
I am not mad! not mad! not mad!

Harsh music, while the Gaoler, with a look of contempt and disbelief, forces his hand from her grasp and leaves her. The bars are heard replacing.

He smiles in scorn!—He turns the key!
He quits the grate!—I knelt in vain!
Still—still, his glimmering lamp I see.

Plaintive music; the light growing fainter as the Gaoler retires through the gallery, and the captive watches his departure with eager looks.

'Tis lost!—and all is gloom again.

She shivers and wraps her garment more closely around her.

Cold!—bitter cold!—no warmth!—no light!
Life! all thy comforts once I had;
Yet here I'm chained this freezing night,
[Eagerly.] Altho' not mad! no, no, no,—not mad!

A few bars of melancholy music, which she interrupts by exclaiming suddenly,

'Tis sure a dream!—some fancy vain!
[Proudly.] I—I, the child of rank and wealth!
Am I the wretch who clanks this chain,
Deprived of freedom, friends and health?
Oh while I count those blessings fled
Which never more my hours must glad,
How aches my heart!—how burns my head!

Interrupting herself hastily, and pressing her hands forcibly against her forehead.

But 'tis not mad—no—'tis not mad!

She remains fixed in this attitude, with a look of fear, till the music changing, expresses that some tender, melancholy reflection has passed her mind.

My child!—ah! hast thou not forgot by this Thy mother's face—thy mother's tongue?
She'll ne'er forget your parting kiss,
[With a smile.] Nor round her neck how fast you clung,
Nor how you sued with her to stay,
Nor how that suit your sire forbade!
[With agony.] Nor how—[With a look of terror.]
I'll drive such thoughts away

In a hollow, hurried voice,

They'll make me mad! they'll make me mad!

A pause—she then proceeds with a melancholy smile.

His rosy lips, how sweet they smiled!
His mild blue eyes how bright they shone.
Was never born a lovelier child!

With a sudden burst of passionate grief, approaching to frenzy,

And art thou now forever gone?
And must I never see thee more,
- My pretty, pretty, pretty, lad!
[With energy.] I will be free!
[Endeavoring to force the grate.] Unbar this door!
I am not mad! I am not mad!

She falls, exhausted, against the grate, by the bars of which she supports herself. She is roused from her stupor by loud shrieks, rattling of chains, etc.

Hark! Hark!—what mean those yells—those cries?

The noise grows louder,

His chain some furious madman breaks!

The madman is seen to rush along the gallery with a blazing firebrand in his hand,

He comes! I see his glaring eyes!

The madman appears at the grate, which he endeavors to force, while she shrinks in an agony of terror.

Now! now! my dungeons bars he shakes,
Help! Help!

Scared by her cries the madman quits the grate. He again appears in the gallery above, is seized by his keepers with torches! and after some resistance is dragged away.

He's gone!—oh fearful woe
Such screams to hear, such sights to see.
My brain! my brain!—I know—I know
I am not mad, but soon shall be,
Yes—soon! for lo! yon—while I speak
Mark yonder demon's eyeballs glare!
He sees me—now with fearful shriek
He whirls a scorpion high in air!
Horror! the reptile strikes his tooth
Deep in my heart so crushed and sad:
Ay! laugh ye fiends!—I feel the truth!
'Tis done! 'Tis done—[With a loud shriek]
I'm mad—I'm mad!

She dashes herself in frenzy upon the ground. Her two brothers cross the gallery, dragging the Gaoler; then a servant appears with a torch conducting the father, who is supported by his youngest daughter. They are followed by servants with torches, part of whom remain in the gallery. The brothers appear at the grate, which they force the Gaoler to open; they enter and on seeing the captive, one is struck with sorrow while the other expresses violent anger against the Gaoler, who endeavors to excuse himself; the father and sister enter and approach the captive, offering to raise her, when she starts up suddenly and eyes them with a look of terror; they endeavor to make themselves known to her, but in vain; she shuns them with fear and aversion, and taking some straw, begins to twine it into a crown, when her eyes falling on the Gaoler, she shrieks in terror and hides her face; the Gaoler is ordered to retire and obeys; the father again endeavors to awaken her attention, but in vain. He covers his face with his handkerchief which the captive draws away with a look of surprise. Their hopes are excited and they watch her with eagerness. She wipes the old man's eyes with her hair, which she afterwards touches and, finding it wet with tears, bursts into a delirious laugh, resumes her crown of straw, and after working at it eagerly for a moment, suddenly drops it and remains motionless with a vacant stare. The father and brothers express their despair—the music ceases. An old servant enters, leading her child, who advances carelessly: but on seeing his mother, breaks from the servant, runs to her and clasps her hand. She looks at him with a vacant stare, then with an expression of excessive joy exclaims: "my child," and clasps him to her bosom. The relatives raise their hands to heaven in thankfulness for her restored reason, and the curtain falls slowly to solemn music.

To his other versatilities of genius, Mr. Lewis added the character of musician. He sang and accompanied himself on the piano with considerable effect: and to many of his songs he has united original music of a high order, which exactly corresponds in expression with the words.

Lewis's generosity was well known, although he was extremely retiring in all his bounties. He educated and established in society the son of a lady whose acquaintance he had made through a bookseller, and whose circumstances had driven her to literary labors. In writing to the latter, after sending her money, etc., he concludes thus: "I beg you to spare all thanks. When a person of your feelings and character accepts a kindness, you confer, not receive an obligation." Taking refuge in a cottage, near his own hermit residence, from the peltings of a storm, he stumbled upon a young man who made a scanty living by writing sermons for lazy curates. He inquired into his circumstances, left him money and shortly after remitted him sufficient capital to open a small country bookstore. The worthy object of his bounty never knew who was his patron, until being one evening at Drury Lane, he recognised in the manager's-box Mr. Lewis as the same person who had taken refuge in his cottage many years previous.

So far did his natural generosity lead him, that when, upon his father's decease, he came into a very large property in the West Indies, he embarked for the latter place and employed many months in meliorating the condition of his slaves and improving their social relations. He even drew up a will in which he gave them unconditional freedom. The slaves of his own and the adjoining plantations hailed him as almost a divinity, and loudly sung his praises.

It being announced to them, however, that their master would leave them free at his death—a very indiscreet act when the character of the West Indian negro is considered—some of them very naturally concluded that the sooner he died the better was it for their interest. One of them stole into Lewis's room and well-nigh assassinated him. Indeed it has been said that his last sickness, which was called yellow fever, was the effect of slow poisons administered by his cook. His death occurred on ship-board on the 13th of May, 1818; his age being forty-five. And it is not a little remarkable that the same person who watched his last illness should have performed a similar service for Lord Byron, between whom and Lewis had always existed a very intimate friendship. The unfortunate author died in most convulsive agonies, principally occasioned by an emetic, which was heedlessly administered while his retchings were still violent. On account of his death by the yellow fever it was judged best to commit his remains to the deep and not convey them to England. His body was placed in a rough coffin, covered with a sail, and with weights attached, and plunged into the ocean amid the deep sorrow of all on board. Singular to relate the wind filled the little sail which covered his remains and bore it up. The coffin bark, floating upon the buoyant wave, was slowly wafted by the breeze from the astonished gaze of crew and passengers.

He who had lived amid the supernatural all his life and had created terrors while living, imparted the same effect when dead. Whether his body at last sunk or reached some distant beach was never known.

For some years previous Lewis had retired in a measure from the world of fashion and had spent much time abroad in the society of Byron and Shelley. The announcement of his death, therefore, did not create so great a sensation as one would suppose the departure of a person well known in the circles of literature and society might occasion. His relatives and immediate friends felt his decease deeply, and many an object of the departed's bounty shed in secret warm and bitter tears.

Mr. Lewis was of singular composition; he was moody, petulant, pathetic, affectionate, generous, mournful and gay all in the same breath. As is the case with many men of genius—Dickens and Hood for example—his literary vein was equally pathetic and humorous. Of the former, his "Crazy Jane" and "Maniac" are sufficient examples. Of the latter, take the following extract of a letter to his mother:

"My new servant is very stupid and very forgetful; and so awkward that when he comes into a room he seems to communicate the principle of life to all the books and chairs and cups and saucers—they all tumble about. I gave him a glass jar of magnesia yesterday to put upon a shelf, under which stood a single China basin. In this shelf was a single hole. He put the jar into the hole, upon which it fell so exactly into the basin that he broke both. This morning I bade him get me some water, for there was none in the ewer; so he asked me whether I wanted to drink or wash, as he could get it accordingly either in the tumbler or the basin. He looked quite surprised at my ingenuity when I assured him that if he got it in the ewer I could do either. I am sure he is the very man who had the cat and kitten, and when he cut a large hole in the door for the cat to go through he cut a little one for the kitten!"

Lewis was quite famous for epigrams and impromptus. On one occasion being in company with Lord Erskine, this noble personage indulged in severe railery at the ladies: he was thus answered by the "Monk," who though like his brotherhood, a patron of celibacy, was at the same time a gallant:

"Lord Erskine at women presuming to rail
Says "wives are tin canisters tied to one's tail," While fair Lady Anne as the subject he carries on,
Feels hurt at his Lordship's degrading comparison,
Yet wherefore degrading? considered aright
A canister's useful, and polished, and bright,
And should dirt its original purity hide,
That's the fault of the puppy to whom it is tied."

In reviewing the whole career of so extraordinary a person as "Monk" Lewis, it is difficult to write impartially and correctly: it would be wrong to employ with some the language of unbounded praise; unjust to use with others the language of unlimited censure. His life was a chess-board, on whose chequered paths the pieces of fate took strange and devious ways. Early sent into the world with competent fortune and energetic genius, with a high ambition and headstrong perseverance, his parents separating before his years of discretion had arrived; his mother weak in heart and his father haughty and imperious; what wonder that his morals became loose and his way of life unsettled? It should rather be a wonder that amid flattery and vituperation, the visitor of the green room and the floor of parliament, he preserved his affectionate habits and generous impulses!

If he injured society in one way he benefitted it in another. He was one of those men who are sent into the world for some great and unseen purpose. The moralist may deduce one, and the man of the world another. But be that what it may, none who knew him, who had frequent and various opportunities of studying his virtues and his vices, will say that Matthew Gregory Lewis lived in vain!

THE OLD DOMINION.

A BALLAD.

BY M. J.

Ho! gallant Old Dominion! I hail thee as the state,
Of all our thirty commonwealths, most proudly consecrate;
My pulse beats quicker as I feel my feet upon the sod
Which nurtured men of giant mind, which true-born heroes trod;

Where 'mid primeval forests, rich in hues of varied green,
The noble Raleigh planted first the standard of his Queen!*

When over all the "Old Thirteen" extended Britain's sway,
Thou ever wert the loyalest,—the readiest to obey:
The high romantic chivalry that marked thy gentler blood,
Made thy forbearance virtue seem, and kept allegiance good;
But when thy nature once was roused, thy most heroic soul
Spurned, in its consciousness of might, oppression's stern control.

With generous heart thou did'st obey thy country's rallying call,
And pledge thyself for her dear sake, to sacrifice thine all;
Tho' others laid with zeal as true, their offerings on the shrine,
No gift was found of such a pure and priceless worth as
thine:
With Spartan matron's hope and pride, thou brought'st at thy noblest son,
And gav'st to freedom and the world, thy glorious Washington!

Virginia! brave Virginia!—a happy Mother thou, Whose children's fame will ever shed a splendor round thy brow;
The thrilling words of eloquence that Henry's fervor flung;
The simple majesty of thought that flowed from Marshall's tongue,—
The force and skill political which Jefferson could show,
The statesmanship of Madison,—the wisdom of Monroe;

The biting sting of Randolph's wit,—the matchless grace of Wirt,—
An Alexander's zeal that leaves no energy inert;
The saint-like piety of Rice,—McDowell's wealth of thought,—
The pure and classic mind of Rives with lore so varied fraught;—
Oh! where from Maine to Florida, from east to western bound,
Can such a shining galaxy, of brilliant names be found!

And Nature too has dowered thee, the favorite of the band,
And scattered beauties everywhere, with most unsparing
hand.

The azure mountain-tops are seen, where'er I turn my eye,
And stretched between in loveliness the shadowy vallies lie;
In Alpine grandeur Otter's Peaks uprear their lofty forms,
And stand serenely looking down on summer's passing storms.

* The first settlement of Virginia was made under Sir Walter's auspices, though he himself did not accompany the colonists in person.

As far among the sloping hills clear springs are bubbling bright,—

Egeria's fountain leaped not up as freshly to the sight. Here health, the rosy lipp'd and free, with blue and laughing eye,

Is often wooed and won beside the rills that murmur by; She hath a loving for the woods and for the rambles wild, That give to her the buoyancy of a delighted child.

And wonders too are here,—an arch, proportionate, sublime!

Unworn by wearing centuries,—commensurate with time; A structure most significant,—a vast stupendous span, That rears itself as if to mock the aims of puny man: One only such in all the world,—and that upon thy sod, Thou favor'd land,—one only bridge whose architect was God!

It is not strange that those who first drew breath within a state,

So rich in by-gone memories,—so grandly, nobly great, Should sometimes boast, and manifest an overweening pride, As if their birth-right lifted them o'er every State beside; A pardonable weakness,—yet, we judge of men alone, Not by their sires' immortal deeds and words, but by their own.

But now from all these glowing scenes my thoughts return again,

With filial reverence to thee, dear sylvan land of Penn! Thou, too, canst boast a thousand charms that make thy vallies bright,—

O'er which affection sweetly pours a flood of golden light; Thy shaded homes lie lovingly by many a sparkling stream, Thy rivers, mountains, fields and groves,—how beautiful they seem!

Beside Virginia's would I place thy justly honored name, And claim equality for thee upon the scroll of fame; But while with admiration deep, I humbly dedicate, A heart of zealous loyalty to my adopted state,— Yet true to all my earliest love, I still will turn again With fondlier feelings far to you, oh! sylvan shades of Penn.

Lexington, Virginia.

THE INAUGURATION.

BY H. T. TUCKERMAN.

After more than a week's disappearance, the sun broke forth on the 4th of March, 1849. It was the Sabbath and the ceremonies that usher in a new president had been deferred until the following morning. By many the cheering alteration in the weather was hailed as a felicitous augury; and not a few hearts responded to the chapter of the day, among the crowded audience that engaged in the religious services at St. John's: "For thou shalt prevent him with the blessings of goodness; and shalt set a crown of pure gold upon his head. And why? because the king putteth his trust in the Lord; and in the mercy of the Most Highest he shall not miscarry.

Some poet has declared that "change is the life of nature;" one would imagine it was also essential to the vitality of republics. If there be, as the advocates of free institutions maintain, no position more enviable than that of the elected head of a great nation, there is none which less justifies elation of feeling. The tenure is limited and its enduring distinction only results from personal fidelity. To be "clear in this great office" is the test of its glory. The constitution prohibits a long sway; the contests of party give rise to inevitable difficulties, and the responsibility of the station when sincerely felt, checks the exultation of success. The momentous principles at issue throughout the world and involved in the grand experiment of popular rule, of which this country is the arena, render the administration of its government more widely influential than that of any dynasty on earth; and this consideration, added to the intrinsic bearing of the course pursued on the honor and welfare of her people, is enough to solemnize the advent of a new executive and cabinet.

Washington cannot be termed a "Mecca of the mind," as Halleck calls the grave of Burns; but at every transition epoch in our annals, it is the goal of innumerable pilgrims. They come from all quarters of the continent, inspired by varied motives,—those of selfish aggrandizement, liberal curiosity, patriotic sentiment, the magnetism of fashion and the hope of enjoyment. A kind of serious carnival ensues; speculation is rife; ambition plumes her wings; policy sharpens its wits; beauty opens her caskets of jewels; and the honest pride of citizenship revives. Expectancy vague yet ardent, is quickened. Opinion finds a response in events; the past is decently buried; and over the future hangs the iris of hope evoked from the subsiding tide of faction. The occasion, when justly appreciated, eloquently explains these signs of the times; and the disproportion of the scene and the symbols, to an imaginative and thoughtful observer, heightens their moral significance.

It is a singular fact, that the only city in the United States planned with reference to extensive growth, is the only one which has never reached its anticipated bounds. The broad avenues, scattered and inadequate dwellings and lonely thoroughfares of Washington, though cheerless to the eye, are suggestive to the imagination. An aspect so incongruous as is here presented,—the blending of village and metropolis, of splendid equipages and comfortless streets, of vast capabilities and inelegant utility—the noble Capitol and the straggling houses, plain citizens grouped around inn doors, public edifices of substantial architecture and a frame building erected for a national ball—all indicate the unfulfilled destinies, the utilitarian instincts and at the same time the boundless promise of the republic. All that meets the gaze in Washington, except the Capitol and the Departments, seems temporary. The city appears like the site of an encampment—as if it were adapted more for a bivouac than a home. Stone ramparts and grated palaces immediately announce to the traveller abroad, an ancient seat of power; here every thing whispers of “brief authority” and proclaims that the officials of every grade are for the time being only servants of the people.

Some fine copies of Claude give a mellow warmth to the parlor of the friend with whom I sojourned; and the bare walls of the East Room of the Presidential mansion, look more desolate from the contrast. They should be adorned with national pictures. With such painters as we now boast, this would be an object of easy achievement. It is to be regretted that Washington was ever incorporated as a municipal town; as the property of the country it might have been filled with handsome residences for ambassadors, heads of departments, and other officials, at the expense of government; and it would thus have become a compact and picturesque metropolis. As it is, the houses tremble from roof to cellar beneath the gay steps of the dancers; we emerge from lighted rooms glowing with “fair women and brave men,” into mud and darkness; hacks are indispensable, and a clean promenade, a rare luxury. It is one of the striking peculiarities of America, that her Capital, which, in every other land, is the centre of refinement and external luxury, is the least significant, of all her cities, of the state of civilization. Yet, here are gathered the trophies of mechanical skill; here are breathed the noblest strains of eloquence; here originate the laws; and here annually congregate the wisdom and beauty of the land. To an ardent republican, however, all this betokens the triumph of his favorite principles. He will regard it as a proof that the interests of office are secondary to those of general prosperity, and that its agents and locality are not suffered to absorb the benefits designed for the whole people.

In the National Institution, like nearly all of our scientific and literary establishments, as yet in embryo,—sea quadrupeds from the Arctic Zone, birds of rare plumage, the coat in which Jackson fought at New Orleans, the rifle of an Indian chief, plants, fossils, shells and corals, mummies, trophies, busts and relics, typify inadequately natural science and bold adventure. Cruikshank might discover new hints for ungraceful attitudes in a hall consecrated by the triumphs of rhetoric; and refined minds learn to hate anew the coarseness and bigotry of partisans, and philosophers the narrowness of a statesmanship acquired in the practice of venal casuistry—where the most generous and profound reasoning has often thrown new light on questions of vital importance to humanity. The foundation of the long-delayed monument to him of whom it has been so admirably said, that “providence made him childless that his country might call him father;”—the slowly-rising walls of the Smithsonian Institute, the vacant panels of the Rotunda, the sculptured deformities on the eastern front of the Capitol, and the very coin, freshly minted from California gold—awaken that painful sense of the incomplete, or that almost perplexing consciousness of the new, the progressive and the unattained which is peculiar to our country.

It is indeed wonderful to contrast our immense territory with the seat of government, and with the ceremonial and magnificence of the most petty court in Europe fresh in the memory, to note the simplicity of our political arrangements. The richly caparisoned steeds and gaudy footmen, the splendid uniform of the soldiery, the line of thronged ante-chambers, the formal announcements and prescribed costume that render those scenes memorable to a transatlantic spectator, are all wanting here. When we reflect upon the idea in the abstract, there is a sublimity in this apparent superiority to external blandishments as emblems of authority. Patriotism thus recognised, is like religion when cherished as a sentiment. The feeling seems adequate to its own realization, independent of form, as if the essential greatness of free institutions obviated the necessity for any outward demonstration of rule. It is a lesson both for the conservative and the radical of the old world to witness such a scene as was presented at the ex-President's final levee. Let us remember that in three days, the highest office in the gift of the people is to be resigned, that the lady who, with such dignified urbanity, receives the salutations of the throng, is dispensing her graceful hospitalities for the last time, that hundreds of hearts in that vast assembly are thirsting for the emoluments and distinctions of office;—and then contemplate the order, propriety, self-respect and good-feeling with which greetings are exchanged! Observe, too, the “infinite variety” of classes, dress, manners and character, and where else on the face of the earth, could such elements be brought together without an array of physical force to subdue and regulate them? Yet group follows group, the heiress in her silks and diamonds hard pressed by the servant-maid in calico, the snowy cap of an old quaker lady brushed by the gold epaulette of a naval hero, and the cold but well-defined profile of one of the Boston aristocracy relieved against the bronzed cheek of a gigantic Chippewa! The attenuated and keen, yet genial physiognomy of the editor of the Union is in juxtaposition with the ear of one of his talented opponents, whose smile proves that their intercourse is jocose. The unsuccessful candidate for the occupancy of this very dwelling, is laughing with a member of the triumphant party; a half civilized Texian is in conclave with the accomplished New England Speaker; the high brow of a judge of the Supreme Court is benignly turned upon the sparkling face of a little country belle; and one of the wounded colonels of Monterey is detailing the fight to a pale but intent artist. Here comes the eloquent defender of the Constitution, of whom Carlyle said that he was the only man whose appearance ever realized to him the idea of a great statesman. Calhoun, with his mass of iron-gray hair and his nervous figure, is shaking hands with Duff Green, their two heads in the light of the chandelier, reminding us of Salvator's conspiracy of Catiline. There stands the venerable Mrs. Madison, like one of Stuart's ladies, reanimated from the canvass. To be appreciated, however, she should be seen in her own apartment, where the portraits of the departed presidents, her scanty and plain furniture, and her wood-fire harmonize with the associations of other days. Farmers with huge paws, sailors with a rolling gait, the sleek adventurer, the bar-room politician, the mercurial southern representative, the calm and portly senator, the eager office-seeker and the philosophic idler,—faces lowering with vulgar obtuseness, or kindled by cultivated sympathies, heads massive with thought, or oscillating with vanity, make up a human panorama which no limner can adequately reflect. And if we seek to define the motley social characteristics, imagination is equally baffled; for, although political aspirations and fraternity and "the insolence of office" form the basis,—the variety of talent and disposition thus associated, necessarily create an accessible, frank and universal tone, which renders society here more free of conventional drawbacks, and more inciting to vivacious intercourse than can be found elsewhere in the land.

How recent too, are all memories compared with those which haunt the pilgrim at other shrines! A morning's walk may bring him to the spot where the gallant Decatur fell; he may think of the British invasion on the shores of the Potomac, or give a day to a visit to Mount Vernon where the ashes of the stainless chief repose. The convent at Georgetown may possibly awaken an affecting reminiscence, and Pennsylvania Avenue recall the characteristic anecdote of John Randolph, when he said to an acquaintance who there overtook him and complained that it was difficult to keep up with him—"Sir, I will increase that difficulty"—striding on at a quickened pace. The Congressional burying-ground has cherished memorials; and beneath yonder lofty dome, within a few months, a venerable statesman [died the death of Chatham. The oratory of Pinkney, Wirt, Clay, and a host of others, hallows the scene; but, with singular pertinacity, it ever breathes of the immediate, which De Tocqueville truly says is the natural language of democracy. Yet how impressive, at certain exigencies, is that language! Now that scarcely a country of Europe owns genuine tranquillity, when every popular movement is fraught with terror, and propriety and domestic life seem at the mercy of revolutionary excitement, there arrives here a family from the extreme South, in manners, dress and appearance, in no degree superior to the mass,—unpretending, simple, kindly—without any escort but that of friends and citizens, receiving homage in the limited apartments of a hotel, and called from their distant farm by the popular suffrage. Now and then a crowd in the entries, or a shout in the street, the attendance of a committee, or the flight of a rocket, the display of the national banner, or a knot of earnest talkers may betray the occurrence of something more than common. Otherwise the stranger would perceive no inkling of a political advent. The usual avocations of life go on without interruption. Not an element of society is disturbed. Anxiety, doubt, exultation are equally subdued; and, though under this apparent quietude, we know there is heaving a deep tide of individual ambition, curiosity, joy and disappointment, the surface is almost unruffled. One accustomed to the etiquette and parade by which less secure authority is retained and transmitted, and, at the same time, cognizant of the alternations thus unostentatiously realized, must view the circumstances with incredulous wonder.

I was seated in the public room awaiting a friend upon whom I had made a morning call, when an honest-looking man with gray hair, in a suit of blue a little worn and unfashionably cut, walked in with four companions. The latter placed themselves respectfully about him and one with a parchment scroll in his hand, in emphatic yet courteous terms, and with a graceful elocution, announced to him his election to the chief magistracy of the Union,—spoke of the hard-fought battles which had endeared him to his country, the confidence thus awakened in the people, and the freedom and discrimination of their choice. The old man listened with downcast eyes, a thoughtful and self-possessed mien, and when the address ended and the certificate was received, read his answer in a tremulous but clear voice, but with a hesitancy indicating how little he was accustomed to express his sentiments in words. He spoke of the greatness of the honor conferred, of his deep sense of inadequacy, his solemn determination to be faithful to the duties of the office, to the requisitions of the constitution and the example of Washington. The ceremony over, he interchanged a few natural observations with those around, returned the cordial grasp of such as were introduced, and then retired with the avowed intention of visiting the present incumbent whom, in a few days, he was to supersede. In the course of three years this man had become known to the world by the integrity and valor displayed in a war declared by the government he served, and, if report does not err, undertaken against his own convictions and sympathies. His troops manifested somewhat the feeling towards him which Frederic of Prussia inspired. "Old Fritz" was their watchword and "Old Zach" that of the American soldiers. The fields of Palo Alto and Buena Vista at once became renowned in military history. The despatches of the General, reputed to have been written by the officer now his son-in-law, were admired for their soldier-like point and brevity; and, by degrees, the name of the faithful warrior became endeared to the people. With the trust and the gratitude naturally inspired by his services, they elected him President of the United States; and he had at the appointed time come to the Capital to be inducted into office. Such is the explanation of all these informal phenomena; thus simple is it possible for the mechanism of government to be!

For one inclined to carp at the inefficiency of details and the unimpressive in outward feature, the Inauguration was a scene prolific in material for humorous complaint; but viewed by the eye of reflection, it abounded in the moral sublime. There is no modern public structure with a site so commanding as that of the American Capitol, if we except the monastery of La Superga at Turin; and although the panorama visible from the former is meagre in all that relates to grandeur in scenery and art, it is extensive and characteristic. The widely scattered buildings, the winding Potomac, and the broad fields lost in the distance, reposed beneath a cloudy sky; but the neutral tints thus yielded, allowed the gaze to wander with freedom and rest undazzled on the prospect. There was something too in the gray atmosphere now and then flecked with snow, that was adapted to the thoughtful mind busy with an occasion that suggested grave as well as happy ideas. Along the steps and alleys of the surrounding grounds, on the esplanade and the balconies, clustered an eager multitude, the bright hues of the female costumes giving a cheerful aspect to the sombre groups that stood in quiet conversation, or roamed to and fro awaiting the procession. At length it was seen coming up the avenue below. A few volunteer corps formed the only escort. As it approached, the crowd gathered densely around the stage erected at the eastern point. The colossal statue of Washington rose in the far back ground; and immediately before the spectators, was the elegant facade. Scarcely half an hour elapsed, when the judges in their robes, the diplomatic corps in their uniforms, the senators and numerous officers of the army and navy, appeared; and on the sofa at the edge of the platform, were seated the newly elected heads of the republic. General Taylor looked the impersonation of that large and sterling middle class that form the strength and the credit of the United States; he was the image of a benign and patriotic country gentleman; and read the noble pledges of his Inaugural with modest self-possession. The oath was then administered and uttered with an air of reverence and sealed by a kiss upon the very Bible with which Washington was sworn. The President instantly received the congratulations of the Ex-President, and the distinguished personages in his vicinity; and then advanced and bowed to the vast assembly. Shout after shout rent the air; peal after peal of cannon echoed from the hill; the multitude dispersed on every side without tumult; and accompanied the carriage of their new executive with cheers. The bands played their liveliest airs. Wide to the breeze fluttered the star-spangled banner. Fair hands waved handkerchiefs from every window; and thus the cavalcade passed on to the White House. There, entrenched behind a slender barricade of chairs, to avoid the pressure of the throng, stood the venerable man, while before him in an almost endless file, moved the people to welcome him to the home his integrity and valor had won. About a twelvemonth since the Parisian populace broke into the Tuilleries; but they wandered through the gorgeous apartments with a kind of savage wonder and to destroy the luxurious insignia of royal authority; clowns and workmen, the poor and the rude, as well as the gentle and the wealthy, composed the mass that overran the Presidential abode; yet a sense of mutual relation and individual privilege, subdued to courtesy the most uncultivated.

Thus direct, unostentatious and kindly is the popular recognition of the transit of power, with no intermediate authority to control, no pageantry to beguile and no exhibition of force to awe the spectators. The reason is obvious—all parparticipate in the interests of the occasion; and each, however humble, may claim a share in the glory. The principles of the constitution chasten all the excitable elements of popular will. The instant the successful candidate is invested with the chief magistracy, partisan weapons are laid aside; and as the head of the nation, universal respect is awarded the President. Such are the redeeming features of our political system and the noble episodes in the ceaseless struggle for power that revive hallowed memories and patriotic delight.

The Inauguration Ball, as a social demonstration, was an appropriate finale. Between three and four thousand people of both sexes, of every class, from all parts of the land, assembled in an immense saloon erected for the purpose. Members of the diplomatic corps and naval and military officers by their rich dress gave variety to the scene. From the stage at the head of the room, the view was magnificent when the old General appeared. The mass opened to the right and left to allow him to pass freely; a sea of heads swayed to and fro; the band played exhilarating martial airs; jewels sparkled, murmurs of applause rose and fell, smiles beamed, cheers resounded and the crowd reunited like a swelling flood, as the unassuming object of all this festivity moved slowly on, with a meek, yet gratified air. When he reached the elevated platform he was received by a group of fair women and men of noble aspect; he stood among them in the simple dignity of a faithful citizen-soldier. The dance was resumed; and the eye fell on a vast and brilliant throng, whose courteous hilarity afforded a hopeful presage to every generous heart.

Washington, March 7th, 1849.

LETTERS FROM NEW YORK.

New York, March, 1849.

D. Appleton and Co. of this City have published a "History of England from the Peace of Utrecht to the Peace of Aix La Chapelle, by Lord Mahon." I have for several years had this admirable work in my library in the handsome English edition in four volumes octavo, as published by John Murray in 1839.

Attracted first by a review in the London Quarterly of Lord Mahon's Life of Condé, written originally in French, I became desirous to read that brilliant sketch. As, however, only a limited number of copies had been printed in London for private distribution, I could not gratify that desire until a translation was made by the noble lord himself and published. Wiley and Putnam afterwards gave the work to the American public in their Choice Library. It was read with great interest by the true lovers of elegant letters and won general admiration. But excellent as it was, that production falls far below the able work, which, with the best taste and judgment, the Messrs. Appleton have recently published. There is a calmness and dignity in the style of Lord Mahon, which fits it peculiarly for historical writing. His narrative has both the smoothness and strength of an inland river flowing through a level country, upon whose breast you may sail ever along without fear of interruption from rocks or shallowness. It is not broken with the rapids and falls that lend diversity to Macaulay's bolder course, but it imparts more confidence to the mind while less exciting its admiration.

The stand-points, to use a Germanism, from which these two historians view their subject, are wide asunder, being separated by that broad space which divides the English Tory from the British Whig. So far as my preference goes, I must avow that I repose more undoubtingly upon the lord than the commoner. The former writes like a judge, the latter like an advocate. The former gives a seemingly just, impartial, elevated verdict; the latter indulges in a full, eloquent and often heated argument.

Since my last letter was written, I have read the second volume of Macaulay's History as issued by Harpers. There is a decided falling off in the interest and character of the work. It reads less like an opinion and more like a controversy. There is not the slightest doubt that the writer's object is to justify the lords, who invited over William of Orange, and to show that the people could not do otherwise than rebel against the weak and wilful King James. No palliation whatsoever is found for that monarch's faults, and he is held up to the scorn and contempt of the world as the most cowardly, cruel and contemptible of monarchs. Mr. Macaulay's views may be the true ones; but they might have been presented with less acrimony, and not so much in the manner of a partizan, endeavoring to set forth in strong array the considerations which had justified, even on historical grounds, the positions he had himself elected.

Dr. J. G. Cogswell,—formerly well-known throughout the country as the principal (in connection with George Bancroft) of the Round Hill School at Northampton, Mass., and subsequently as Editor of the New York Review, private Secretary to the late John Jacob Astor and Librarian of the Astor Library to be established in New York,—is now in London engaged in the purchase of books for this Library.

In a letter to a friend in this city he speaks warmly of the uniform kindness and courtesy with which he has been greeted and treated in England. He observes :

"I would like to say a few words about things in England generally. I would like to have it known at home, that every possible disposition has been shown here to facilitate the great object of my visit—everything I have asked for has been granted me without hesitation; many gentlemen on whom I had not the slightest claims have bestowed upon me hours and hours of their time, in helping me to form catalogues of books in the special department of science to which they were devoted, or in examining buildings which had some improvement important to be known; in these and in various other ways has a spirit of uniform kindness been manifested towards America—for I regard none of this as personal to myself, it is to me as the representative of a great Institution of our country. You know how men of science are sparing of their time, and it may surprise you to hear, that in several instances, after an accidental introduction at a party to some celebrity, I have inquired of him what were the great books in his department, and had for answer, Come and breakfast with me the first day you are at leisure and we will talk over the whole matter—this has repeatedly given me three and four hours of the valuable time of the inviter. If it were not wrong to publish anything of another, even praise without his knowledge and consent, I would name several individuals who have done this. I have now been two months in London, and not an ill-natured or discourteous word has been addressed to me by either high or low.

Such language, such a tone indicates the gentleman as well as the scholar. In his avoidance of mentioning publicly the names of those even whom he is desirous to praise; in his extreme delicacy, his reverent regard for the implied confidence of social intercourse, how does he differ from many American tourists and pencilers who have dishonored their country.

Dr. Cogswell's description of his visit to the celebrated Althorp Library is very interesting, and deserves transfer to your columns from those of the Literary World. It is too long for introduction into this letter, but I enclose it that you may give it honorable place, if you think proper to do so. At the late sale of the Stowe Library, which Dr. Cogswell attended, he purchased for the Astor Library a princeps Homer for twenty-nine pounds. "On getting possession of it," he remarks, "I could not but call to mind Petrarch's eloquent apostrophe to the 'illustrious bard,' as reported by Gibbon, when the Byzantine Ambassador presented him with a manuscript copy; and something of the same veneration which he there confesses, induced me to deviate from my rule and buy a book at a great price, because it is a first edition. There are but two other first editions, which I am very anxious to have for the Astor Library, one is the Mazarin Bible, which I despair of obtaining, the other Shakspeare, which I am resolved to have. As books, these are my three objects of veneration, and I mean to speak of the Bible with all reverence, when I connect it with anything human, as a book merely, and not as the volume of inspiration."

The Astor Library is fortunate indeed in having so erudite and tasteful a librarian. It will be truly a magnificent collection and add greatly to the attractions of this Metropolis. No considerable part of the endowment, ($400,000,) will be expended on the building—but a handsome and appropriate edifice, not too costly, will be erected. The management of the whole matter could not be in better hands, and not only the New York, but the American public are to be warmly congratulated on the literary treasures in store for us.

Mr. Richard H. Dana has just concluded here at our University Chapel an exceedingly valuable course of lectures on Shakspeare. They are the same which he gave in this city some eight years ago, and which were then highly praised by our New York Sir Hubert Stanleys. Their present repetition has been attended by our intellectual aristocracy and others, forming a goodly assembly. You should have Mr. Dana in Richmond. He would infuse a new spirit into your literary circle.

This employment of giving lectures on popular topics seems, during this season, to have been taken up by several respectable writers. It is certainly honorable. The most distinguished of lawyers, physicians and divines have been lecturers. It is both a pleasant and a reputable mode for an author to increase his income, besides bringing one in his perigrinations acquainted with numbers of agreeable and accomplished persons.

I have myself conceived the idea of giving courses of lectures, as much for the entertainment as instruction of audiences, in our different towns, on a somewhat novel plan—novel with regard to such oral discourses, though not as to printed books. I refer to making such mental diversions cheap and within the range of humble means. I would, par example, fix the maximum price of admission for each person at a single New York shilling, (12½ cents,) or even our United States dime. Thus a pleasant evening's excursion into the field of letters may be taken for a trifling sum. So far as I have tried the experiment, I have been met and cheered by large audiences, steadily increasing with each new lecture. Perhaps it would be an affectation of modesty in me to attribute my success wholly to the low price of admission; nor is it mere vanity to assert that people came in crowds to hear me, (more always than could get into the lecture-room,) because they were amused. My constant effort was not to be dry—but to irrigate my dissertation with little rills of humor, I will not say wit, since that is said not to excite laughter. I have been willing to expend a little dignity even, if I could keep pleased expressions on the faces of my hearers, and prevent any undue distension of visages by yawns. Thus have I, with no great merit of my own, succeeded where I have attempted lectures on the plan which I contemplate carrying out extensively by-and-by, and which I have taken the liberty to speak of here, because it is recommended at least by its novelty and reasonableness.

Let me tell you about Fanny Kemble Butler. When she proposed to read Shakspeare in Boston, because it had become necessary for her to do so, she did not anticipate to be listened to by more than some two hundred persons. Great was her surprise therefore to find more than four times that number crowded into the hall of the Masonic Temple. Her auditors consisted entirely of that intelligent and fashionable set of exclusives, who in Boston seem to preserve their social position as undisputedly as similar folk do in England, and to give the tone to wider and lower circles. Accordingly, the whole town thronged to Mrs. Butler's readings and paid her some three hundred dollars a night, net, as the dry-goods dealers say. This must have looked to her like old times, when her father and herself created in the quiet capital of Massachusetts a theatrical ferore of the wildest sort, and box tickets were sold at auction and brought five dollars a piece,—before her unpropitious marriage with Mr. Pierce Butler of Philadelphia, who was at that time a young man and not a perverse Benedict bent on having his own way.

Mrs. Butler has recently repeated her readings in New York. She has not exactly carried the citadel by storm, for we are rather less notional than the Bostonians, and seldom suffer our personal feelings to sway our judgment concerning a public performer. But Mrs. Butler has made a decided sensation. Her Merchant of Venice was immense; her Shylock greater than anybody's except George Frederick Cooke's, who, by-the-by, is remembered only by that omnipresent individual, "the oldest inhabitant." She lets you know what characters she is personating simply by a change of tones, after she has announced them at the beginning of each scene. Here she employs her full, rich, flexible vocal organ with fine effect. For instance, in the dialogue between Portia and Nerissa, the change from the lady-like tone of the former, to the pert, chambermaid manner of the latter is strikingly perceptible and even dramatic in its deception of the ear. Her reading of the exquisite poetry of the Midsummer Night's Dream is also wonderfully charming.

Mrs. Butler has taken up a regular residence with her friends the Sedgewicks in Pittsfield, Massachusetts. Her intimacy with this family of talents and blue-stockings was a main cause of her husband's dislike—of his wrath, the direful spring.

I must as a special favor, ask here for the space to praise two recent publications—the one a romance, and the other a magazine. "Merry Mount" is decidedly the cleverest novel of the season. I am not sure that there are many books of the kind written with so much splendor of fancy, felicity of description and artistic painting of character. An experienced dramatist might work its materials into a play that would run fifty nights. The scenes are laid at that eventful period in the history of New England, when the Puritans or Roundheads had acquired almost exclusive possession of the colony and had begun to rule after the Cromwellian fashion with despotic and iron hand. A few brave and jolly cavaliers who were still remaining, claimed a portion of territory and held their jocund revels on an eminence, which they christened "Merry Mount." I know of few things finer in its way than the account of the May-day revels and of a Hawking Party. If I were to say that this romance would be popular, I might prophesy falsely—for much of it is decidedly "caviare to the general"—but if I should say that it will be read with delight by people of taste and imagination, I should run no risk of speaking other than strict truth. The author of the novel is J. Lathrop Motley, an accomplished gentleman, a member of the present Legislature of Massachusetts and formerly United States Secretary of Legation to the Court of St. Petersburg.

The magazine which I beg leave highly and with emphasis to recommend to Southern readers, and especially the fairer portion, is "Sartain's Union Magazine," published by John Sartain & Co. in Philadelphia. Mr. Sartain is an artist of extraordinary merit. No one could be more capable of tastefully arranging and selecting the embellishments of a periodical of this kind. His mezzotint engravings have never been surpassed, and he may justly claim the honor of giving that style vogue in this country. Look for example at the most beautiful specimen after Richard Westall in the March number, and "Undine" from an original, by C. L. Muller. The Editors are Mrs. C. M. Kirkland and Professor John S. Hart—the former known to the lovers of genuine and happy humor by her "New Home, Who'll Follow!"—and the latter a man of fine talents and a scholar of high celebrity. Mr. C. H. Wiley, author of "Alamance,"—a Southern writer—has just commenced in this magazine a novel that promises to be exciting in its interest. It is entitled "Roanoke, or Where is Utopia." William Howitt, Frederica Bremer, (translated by Mary Howitt,) Willis, Mrs. Sigourney, Dr. Bethune and several others of equal fame are contributors. Longfellow is also engaged to contribute a poem monthly. The critical notices are fairly and handsomely made.

I met Mr. Halleck a few days since looking very intellectual and very well as usual. I asked him if he intended that all his new poems should be published posthumously; but he replied laughingly that he should not put his executors to much trouble in that respect. I suspect, nevertheless, that he writes, but is too infinitely fastidious to publish. I love Halleck; he is emphatically a gentlemanly poet.

Your correspondent, Tuckerman, who is another capital specimen of the genus homo, has been some time in Washington enjoying the Inauguration festivities.

A new American Drama, entitled Kate Woodhull, from the pen of Mr. C. Edwards Lester, has just been produced at the Broadway Theatre. I sincerely hope that it may succeed.

The Italian opera has closed its first season with considerable loss to its urbane and competent manager. The successive failures of two winters must have at length convinced a set of people, whom Mr. Willis exaggeratingly called "The Upper Ten Thousand," but who would be more than comprised in Hundreds, that they cannot sustain an establishment of this sort against the tealder. Their "odi profanum vulgus et arceo," will not do for this region. They cannot monopolize all the best boxes and turn up their noses at the commonalty in the pit and upper tiers. No theatre or opera can be sustained here unless all parts of the house are free to all comers. Exclusivism must confine itself to private edifices. It is an exotic that dies in the open, strong air of democracy.

The numerous friends of the good Bishop Doane of New Jersey will be glad to learn that his health has greatly improved. He was, during the winter, sick unto death; but the arm on which he has ever leaned confidently for support, has upheld him so that his footsteps have wandered on the borders of the dark valley of the shadow and he has not been hidden from the light of existence. Not only to the church but to literature would this excellent Prelate have been a serious loss. Though his name is scarcely mentioned now among the herd of common writers, yet has he produced many beautiful short poems, remembered and hoarded among the literary gems of tasteful collectors. His prose is, moreover, strong, nervous, ornate, "drawn from the pure wells of English undefiled" and cast in a style similar to that of the old divines.

Is it not rather an amusing fact, apropos to my comments on the liberties taken with the orthography of Mr. Macaulay by the Harpers in their edition of his History of England, that these very publishers, who persisted that their standard of spelling was the true one, should now advertise a cheap edition of the same work, "spelled according to the English edition?" Do not believe that the critics brought about this favorable change: it was entirely owing to the appearance of two correct editions, one published in Boston and another in Philadelphia.

I take pleasure in transmitting to you a fine and spirited poem by an English gentleman of high abilities. Though written in 1824, when its author was connected as editor with one of the prominent journals of the time, it is now published for the first time in the United States—where the genius and wit of Sheridan have been always appreciated at their full value.

The Death Bed of Sheridan.

They fled from thee—all the gay, titled and proud,
When thy evening of life in its dreariness came;
They fled from thee—all who had joined with the crowd
To echo thy praise in thy morning of fame.

To thy bedside unblessed came the harpies whose fangs
Were rudest and sharpest in fortune's decay,
And of all who should soften the victim's last pangs,
None scared the foul birds from their desolate prey.

In loneliness withered the spirit that shed
The eloquent charm that might Senates command,
Who the mask and the pageant and revelry led
And waved over fashion a magical wand.

Not lonely—one minist'ring angel was there!
Oh, woman! how faithful, how changeless thou art
To the man of thy love; though his eye gleam despair
And a wilderness gather its gloom round the heart.

The struggle is over—the mutes at the gate,
And the recreant grandeur which struck the worst blow
Thy spirit had felt, ere it bowed to its fate,
Now follow thy bier in the trappings of woe.

Oh, faithless such chivalry—ye who rely
On its promise, behold! how its friendship could spare
Misfortune's last claim, and leave genius to die
And then with late homage embrace its cold urn.

They thronged round his bier, who had let him depart
Like an outcast too mean and too worthless to save;
Who cheered not his gloom with one ray of the heart
And threw the vain splendor of pomp on his grave.

With bards rest thy ashes whose fate like thy own
 Was neglect from the proud in Life's cheerless decay,
 Who were left, unbefriended, to wither alone
 By those who strewed flowers on their passionless clay.

Had talents like thine but by virtue been crowned,
 Their blaze had not set in so sullen a night;
 But the circle allured thee where folly was found
 And the red cup of Circe was sparkling and bright.

Had wisdom, oh Sheridan, guided thy mind,
 She had taught thee that genius was best when its powers
 Beam forth like the sun for the good of mankind,
 Not neglecting the fruits in its fondness for flowers.

The glory which genius thought never could die
 Too oft on the bosom of riot decays;
 Like the bird that, while singing his wild song on high,
 Droops, flutters and dies by the rattlesnake's gaze.

Thy laurels were twined with the roses that grew
 In the garden of pleasure, all flaunting and gay;
 But the canker lurk'd under their brightness of hue
 And the rose and the laurel both withered away.

P. B.

THE ALTHORP LIBRARY.

We gladly act upon the suggestion of our New York correspondent in republishing from the Literary World, the following description of the Althorp Library by Dr. Cogswell.—[Ed. Mess.]

I have already referred to the Althorp Library, and as I have recently made a visit to it, you may like to have some account of it from me, however familiar you may be with the Bibliotheca Spenceriana and Ædes Althorpiæ of Dibdin. Althorp, as you doubtless know, is one of Lord Spencer's country residences, about five miles from Northampton, and seventy-two from London, or as distances are now marked, it is three hours from the metropolis by rail, with three quarters of an hour more for the five miles footing. The country between Northampton and Althorp is not particularly striking, but it was certainly pleasant to enjoy an old fashioned drive, sitting in an open carriage drawn by horses, with an opportunity of seeing things by the road side, and not have them flit by you like spectres; it was pleasant, too, to look upon the green fields, as green as ours in June, and see the men at work ploughing the long furrows as cheerily as if spring were back again. It was most refreshing also to breathe the fresh air of the country, after being cooped up two months in the smoky atmosphere of London. But I must on to the park; it is very spacious and grand, adorned here and there with a fine old far-stretching oak or a stately elm, varied with clumps of evergreens or smaller trees; the drive through it to the house is half a mile or more, winding amid a lawn as clean as a parlor carpet. The house has nothing imposing in its external aspect, and is in no particular style of architecture; but in passing its threshold, one feels that he is standing on holy ground, and would almost instinctively put off his shoes from his feet. I read Dibdin in my young days, and from him learnt to regard the Spencer Library with nearly the same veneration I entertain for the Vatican, and the feeling came back upon me in its full strength when I found myself within it. Knowing that I had allotted but one day to the inspection of the library, Mr. Appleyard the librarian, who was all courtesy and kindness, proposed to begin our work at once. The library is distributed through various rooms of the house, eight altogether I think, several of which are very large; the first in order is the room of the Incunabula, which is devoted entirely to editions of the fifteenth century, and works inseparable from them. This room is larger than a common sized parlor in New York, and is completely full. And here, indeed, are the things which the prophets and kings of literature might well desire to see, some of which can be seen in no other library in the world. What shall I select from this multitude of treasures to describe to you, for the time must fail me, were I to attempt only to name the curious and precious volumes which were successively placed before me by the learned librarian? We must begin with the block books. In specimens of this forerunner of printing, Lord Spencer is very rich; his earliest is a single leaf, on which there are two wood cuts, one representing St. Christopher carrying the infant Jesus through the sea, the other the Annunciation; beneath the cuts is an inscription, with the date 1423, which is regarded as the earliest known use of printing ink—there is clearly no falsification of any kind about it; there cannot be a doubt that it was executed at the time it was dated, and nothing of an earlier date exists, which is admitted to be genuine, that of 1418 not being so. From this onward there is a fine series of block books, besides many of the blocks with which they were stamped; nowhere can one see more perfect specimens of the early Xylographic art. One portion of the Biblia Pauperum is in curious old skin binding, on the cover of which the name of the owner is stamped, with the date of the binding, 1467—probably it would be difficult to produce a book bound earlier than this. We passed from the block books to the movable type incunabula; of the art in this style Lord Spencer has a specimen of the earliest unquestionable date; it is a bull of Pope Nicholas V., granting plenary indulgence to all Christians bearing arms against the Turks, who at that period were pushing on their conquests in the Mediterranean; the date is 1453. Another of the next year has evidently been altered in the date, by the insertion with a pen of an I to the M.CCCC.LIII., probably that the copies remaining from the preceding year might answer for 1454, and save the necessity of a new impression. Nicholas V. died in March, 1455, and was succeeded by Callixtus III.; it was therefore necessary to issue a new bull. Accordingly we find that the one of the date of 1455 is in entirely different type, and the comparison of the two furnishes the best argument in favor of the priority of Gutenberg's Bible printed at Mentz, (now known as the Mazarin Bible,) to that of Pfister; printed probably between 1456 and 1460, but without date or place, Pfister's remarkable F being found on the last dated bull. Copies of both these Bibles are in the Althorp Library, and of the first there is a copy in New York, but it cannot be seen. Next in order is the earliest Bible with a date—that of Faust and Scheffer, printed at Mentz, 1462, of which Lord Spencer has a magnificent copy on vellum, and then a suite of the early Bibles in all languages; in every case, the first edition in each language is found in this library. The earliest printed book with a date is the Psalter of 1457, of which there is a copy in fine preservation. The earliest English Bible is the one translated from the Latin and Dutch, by Miles Coverdale, and printed by him in the Low Countries in 1535, as it was not permitted to be done in England, being before Henry VIII. had decided for the Protestant faith. All the other English versions to the time of the received one, follow in proper order in the library.

In first editions of the Greek and Latin Classics, the Library is equally rich; not one of the rare ones is wanting. I never thought much of Alduses until I saw the Althorp set in vellum, and now I know how beautiful they are. Until the addition of the Cassano Library to his collection, Lord Spencer had no copies of the very rare Naples Horace and Juvenal; finding them in the possession of the Duke of Cassano, he offered him six hundred pounds sterling for these two small volumes, which offer the Duke declined, unless Lord Spencer would extend his purchase to the whole library; it was in this way that the Cassano Library happened to be bought by him. Don't fret, I've little more to add. You remember Dibdin's glowing account in his Bibliomania of the Valdarfar Boccaccio, for which the Duke of Marlborough, when Marquis of Blandford, paid, or rather agreed to pay, £2260.

Dibdin's account of it used to form one of my stock stories, and now I can add that I have had the precious volume in hand; it is in the Althorp Library, having been purchased by the late Lord Spencer for about £900, when it was sold under a decree to satisfy the claims of the Duke of Roxburgh's heirs, to whom it had belonged, when bought by the Marquis of Blandford. The whole history of this volume, from the time of its being discovered in the Library of the Monastery, until it came into Lord Spencer's hands, is most curious: it has now found a proper resting-place, and reposes quietly among its fit associates.

I cannot quit the subject of the Althorp Library, without observing, that every thing there is in proper keeping, every copy is a choice one, all books of prints are proofs before the letters, the binding of every volume is of the best and richest kind, and they are kept as neatly and as free from dust as fresh books. The number is not very great, 56,000 volumes only, but that is enough to include every thing worth having. As to the paintings and other works of art, which form the embellishments of the Ædes Althorpiæ, they are just such as one would desire to see in such a princely residence; but I have already trespassed too long on your patience to enter upon an account of them now. Never have I spent a more agreeable or a more interesting day than that of my visit to Althorp, and nowhere have I met a kinder and more courteous reception.

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS.

CLASSICAL SERIES, by Dra. Schnitz and Zumpt. C. Julii Cæsaris Commentarii De Bello Gallico. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard. 1847.

C. JULIUS CÆSAR'S COMMENTARIES ON THE GALLIC WAR. With English Notes, Critical and Explanatory, a Lexicon, Indexes, &c. By Rev. J. A. Spencer, A. M., Editor of the "New Testament in Greek, with notes on the Historical Books," "Arnold's Series of Greek and Latin Books," &c. New York. D. Appleton & Co., 200 Broadway. Philadelphia. Geo. S. Appleton, 148 Chestnut Street.

These publications have been on our table for some time, and as editions of a classic author, so celebrated and so much used, deserved an earlier notice. Editions of Cæsar are indeed "plenty as blackberries." But a few years ago, Prof. Anthon put forth a mammoth one, which apparently contained every thing which could possibly be desired by any one, and certainly more than is desirable for young beginners. Yet it was far from preventing the preparation of others; how many we cannot say. Mr. Spencor alludes to several—Andrews', Leverett's, &c., and here are two more, which have recently appeared. The first, Schmitz's, is a small, neat volume, with a very conveniently arranged map in miniature of Gaul, (Transalpina and Cisalpina,) and very brief, yet clear and sensible explanatory notes. They are not copious enough; but meagerness is a much smaller objection than excessive expansion, especially when the latter is occasioned by much liberal translation. The editor is a German scholar of high reputation now residing in Edinburgh, and author of an abridged Roman history.

Mr. Spencer's edition has more pretension, size and completeness. The expediency of large editions of school classics may well be doubted. Yet they may perhaps be allowed, where an author is commonly used for mere beginners, as Cæsar, or where he is exceedingly obscure, as Tacitus or Juvenal.

Mr. Spencer has certainly executed his task very well. He has perhaps rather too freely amended the commonly received text, and occasionally translated too much without accompanying explanations. But he is brief and sufficiently clear and full in the exposition of those points of grammar, geography and antiquities, which are suggested by the text. The student never will be wearied by his notes, although he may be occasionally baffled by references to books not within his reach. The life of Cæsar prefixed to this is far more just than the one written by Dr. Schmitz, who appeared to be quite carried away by his admiration of the hero. This we conceive to be a serious objection to a book in the hands of boys, sufficiently prone, without extraneous influence, to be dazzled by military glory. We have seen recent proof that this is far from being confined to boys, in the most extravagant of all eulogies on Cæsar, introduced into a preface to the lives of the Apostles.

Whoever wishes a cheap, yet good edition of Cæsar, will do well to purchase Schmitz's; the student who prefers a large and more complete one will find Spencer's such as he desires.

A MANUAL OF GREEK AND ROMAN ANTIQUITIES. By Dr. E. F. Bojesen—Professor of the Greek Language and Literature in the University of Sorø. Translated from the German. Edited with occasional notes, and a complete series of questions by the Rev. Thomas K. Arnold. Revised with additions and corrections. New York. D. Appleton & Co., 200 Broadway. Philadelphia. Geo. S. Appleton, 148 Chestnut Street.

This book certainly supplies a desideratum in our classical school literature. It is a reliable manual of both Greek and Roman antiquities—brief, clear, and embracing all the results of scholastic research. It is preferable to Potter, Adams, &c., because the author has availed himself of the lights thrown on various subjects by the investigations of Niebuhr, and many other modern scholars. It is better as a text book, than Fiske's Manual, because it is less voluminous and minute, and less encumbered by a multiplicity of indexes. Yet we cannot see why Bojesen's could not be arranged with only one index, and we know that this would add to its convenience. It is well gotten up, under the supervision of Mr. Spencer we believe.

The sanction of those German scholars, who translated it into their own language, and of Dr. Arnold, who edited it in England, renders any commendation on our part superfluous. We will venture, however, to differ from the great English scholar in one point, viz. the propriety of using set questions in teaching any book whatever.

We hope that, in the language of Dr. Arnold, "the volume may be thoroughly mastered, got up and retained" by all students who set a proper value on Classical Antiquities.

THE GERMANIA AND AGRICOLA OF TACITUS; With notes for Colleges. By W. S. Tyler, Professor of the Greek and Latin Languages in Amherst College. New York. D. Appleton & Co., 200 Broadway. Philadelphia. Geo. S. Appleton, 148 Chestnut Street.

This is a neat and well-printed volume, prepared with great care and labor. It seems too to have been not a mere professional labor, but one of love. The author tells us that it is his first essay in this department, and displays a discrimination, enthusiasm and power as a writer, which promise high excellence. The want of a good edition of Tacitus must have been long felt by American teachers, and this commencement of an attempt to supply the deficiency, should be hailed with approbation by all lovers of the classics. Mr. Tyler seems to be imbued with a sincere and warm admiration of his author, but, if we may be allowed the criticism, has chosen rather too ambitious a style for an annotator. He has however no mean talent, has laboriously collated the different manuscripts and editions, and often interests the reader by reference to parallel passages in other authors. This last we consider very judicious, especially when he compares Tacitus with the authors of the Augustan period, from whose purity he had, with all his genius, evidently degenerated.

But while Mr. T. has done so much towards fixing and elucidating the text, that the student of his edition will seldom have any difficulty in understanding the author, yet, to use his own words, he sometimes "carries him on the broad shoulders of an indiscriminate translator."

It is certainly preferable, whenever it can be done, to explain the sense of the original and the idioms of the language without actual translation, especially free translation, which, in a majority of instances, prevents the student from farther exertion. But in an author so difficult as Tacitus, it is very hard to do this without drawing out the notes to an inconvenient length.

We heartily thank Mr. Tyler for what he has done, and have little doubt of his "ability to make it better at a future day."

THE CAXTONS: A FAMILY PICTURE, By Sir E. Bulwer Lytton. Complete in Two Parts. Part I. New York: Harper & Brothers.

ROLAND CASHEL, By Charles Lever. Illustrated. Complete in Two Parts. Part I. New York: Harper & Brothers.

After some months domination in the empire of fiction, the Bells and Mr. Titmarsh have given place to the old régime, and once more "the author of Pelham" and the volatile Harry Lorrequer hold sway. Bulwer, however, is Bulwer "with a difference," for "the Caxtons" is quite unlike anything we have seen from his pen. It is more carefully finished than his first efforts, though with not so much of plot, and differs altogether from his latest works, (which were skilfully elaborated) in design. "The Caxtons" is a series of highly graphic and agreeable sketches of men and things, strung together in a manner that is an evident imitation of Tristram Shandy.

When we took up "Roland Casbel" we were greatly surprised to find ourselves in company with a select circle of piratical blaek-legs in South America. They talk Spanish and play at monte. Now, thought we, for a novelty in novels. But no sooner do we become partially acquainted with the social habits and mode of life of that rather immoral region, than Roland Casbel, (the mausis says that Dr. Lever takes for a hero) is whisked off to Dublin, there to commence flirting and fox-hunting at the rate of £17,000 a year! In short "Roland Casbel" begins to figure in the same scenes that all Dr. Lever's heroes have figured in before. We do not complain of this, however, for no one has a greater command of incident than Dr. Lever and no one says smarter things in the progress of his dialogue. We look for the second part with interest.

These novels may be found at the book store of A. Morris.

1. WHAT I SAW IN CALIFORNIA: Being the Journal of a Tour, &c., &c., in the years, 1846, 1847. By Edwin Bryant, Late Alcalde of St. Francisco. Fourth Edition. With an Appendix, Containing accounts of the Gold Mines, &c., &c. New York: D. Appleton & Co.
2. FOUR MONTHS AMONG THE GOLD FINDERS IN CALIFORNIA: Being the Diary of an Expedition from San Francisco to the Gold Districts. By J. Tyrwhitt Brooks, M. D. New York: D. Appleton & Co.
3. THE GOLD SEEKER'S MANUAL: Being a practical and instructive guide to all persons emigrating to the newly discovered Gold Regions of California. By David T. Ansted, Professor of Geology, King's College, London, &c. New York: D. Appleton & Co.
4. THE CALIFORNIA GUIDE BOOK: Comprising Major Emory's Overland Journey from Fort Leavenworth to San Diego, and Capt. Fremont's Narrative of the Exploring Expedition to the Rocky Mountains, and to Oregon and North California. From Official Sources. New York: D. Appleton & Co.
5. WESTERN AMERICA, Including California and Oregon, with Maps of those Regions, and of "The Sacramento Valley," from Actual Surveys. By Charles Wilkes, U. S. N., Philadelphia, Lea & Blanchard.
6. OREGON AND CALIFORNIA IN 1848: By J. Quinn Thornton, &c., &c., with authentic information on the subject of the Gold Mines, &c., &c. In Two Volumes. New York: Harper & Brothers.

The Messrs. Appleton have quite distanced all their neighbours of the book trade in the number and variety of their publications on California. They have issued indeed all sorts of treatises, in musha and stitched paper, containing every thing that it is at all desirable to know about our new possessions on the Pacific, and a great deal more besides,—despatches of commodores, accounts of huge lumps of the precious metal beyond anything that Aladdin saw in the cave of the genii, and statements which tell us how fortunes are made in a day and how one young gentleman sold a barrel of whiskey for $14,000! Some of their books are valuable for the information they give of the geography of the country, its climate and agricultural resources. We are glad to know something of these territories beyond the mere accounts of gold, gold, with which every newspaper is filled. In this respect Mr. Bryant's narrative and the work of Capt. Wilkes are especially useful, the latter being accompanied with excellent maps of the country from actual surveys. Judge Thornton's volumes are also well worth reading, in the handsome text of the Harpers, although one is sometimes amused with the simplicity of the author's reflections.

We do not wonder at the multitude of books on this subject when we consider that the attention of all Christendom and Heathenese is now directed to the rich Sierras of California. The sacra fames of the Sacramento has smitten "mankind from China to Peru." Punch itself has allowed Lord Brougham a respite from caricature, and instead of weekly reproductions of his checked breeches and his remarkable nose, brings out prints of the gold-diggings with the emigrants that are flocking thereto. We have seen it stated that at a recent representation of Robert Le Diable, in a little town in France celebrated for its white wines and its red politics, an apology was made for the absence of the tenor, who was to sing "L'or est une Chimere" to the effect that he had gone off to the gold regions. The followers of Confucius too have become sensible of the existence of enchanted lands beyond the limits of the Celestial Empire, and in some of the islands of Oecania, the voice of the missionary is mute. All races of men, indeed, however divided in opinions or differing in physical characteristics, agree with the fellow in Beranger's song,

"Que dans mes mains pleuve de l'or,
De l'or,
De l'or,
Et j'en fais mon affaire!"

How this auriferous excitement will turn out at last, remains to be seen, but we venture nothing in the opinion that those nations will derive the greatest benefit from the discovery which pursue the even tenor of plodding industry and commercial enterprise, unaffected by insane schemes of boarding up masses of the shining ore.

To those of our fellow citizens who would learn the statistics of the gold country or who design visiting it, we commend these publications, which may be found at all the bookstores of our city.

HISTORY OF HANNIBAL THE CARTHAGINIAN. By Jacob Abbott. With Engravings. New York: Harper and Brothers. Publishers.

Mr. Abbott deserves and will receive the lasting gratitude of two important classes of society for his series of elementary historical works. The juvenile portion will thank him again and again for telling the stories of great captains and fair queens in plain words, such as fix events and characters upon the youthful mind. Parents and teachers (whom we regard as the other class) will thank him for investing with interest those studies from which children generally are repelled by the stiff style of the books in which they are presented.

The volume before us contains all about Hannibal, the great Carthaginian, how he urged his elephants over the Alps, and fought the battle of Cannae and sent home bushels of rings from the fingers of the Roman knights slain there, together with the subsequent incidents of his life. It is beautifully printed and illustrated.

It is for sale by A. Morris.

ESSAY ON THE UNION OF CHURCH AND STATE. By Baptist Wriothesley Noel, M. A. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1849.

This book from the pen of a most celebrated English divine, has created an unparalleled sensation in England, directing public attention to the evils of the Establishment and causing the High Church party to offer a prize for the best refutation of its arguments. The author attacks the Union of Church and State on political grounds, and draws upon the Old and New Testaments to prove it unscriptural. He proceeds to show the baleful influence of the union upon true religion, subjecting pious dissenters to disabilities and nurturing within the pale of the established faith, a set of fox-hunting parsons, fond of whist and half-and-half, who preach their neighbors' sermons and love their neighbors' wives. The concluding portion of the volume is devoted to some suggestions with regard to a more fervid revival and extension of religion.

Mr. Noel will meet with little favor, we apprehend, at the hands of those who wield or enjoy the patronage of the Established Church, but the disinterested piety which has induced him to resign the ease and emolument of a Rectorship under a system he disapproved, will not fail to ensure him the respect of all and will doubtless lend additional sanction to his views.

The volume is a neat octavo, and may be found at the bookstore of A. Morris.

A CATECHISM OF THE STEAM ENGINE. Illustrative of the Scientific Principles upon which its operation depends, and the Practical Details of its structure, in its application to Mines, Mills, Steam Navigation and Railways. By John Bourns, C. E., editor of a Treatise on the Steam Engine, by the Artisan Club. From the last London edition. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

This valuable work is supplemental, and to some extent, introductory, to a more lengthy treatise on the same subject by the same author. It embodies in the form of questions and answers all that can be said of the Steam Engine with its application to various kinds of machinery. The work is cheap, well-printed and of convenient size for the pocket.

It may be obtained of Nash & Woodhouse.

THE LITERARY AMERICAN. G. P. Quackenbos, Proprietor. New York.

Having taken occasion to commend this literary enterprise, when it was first entered upon, we have seen with great regret in the number for March 24th, a most discreditable plagiarism. The editor has thought proper to put forth as original the very striking translation from the French of Pierre Chevalier, entitled "The Statue of Santa Maria,"—which was contributed to this magazine for January, 1848, by Miss Mary E. Lee of Charleston, S. C. The two versions are the same in every particular, verbatim et literatim, the only difference being that in the Literary American the name of the translator is abridged to the initials, M. E. L., and the residence altogether omitted. We can submit with a pretty good grace to "appropriations," (we use the mildest term,) of our property by certain monthlies and weeklies, whose offences in this particular are notorious, but we are sorry to see so respectable a paper as the Literary American reduced to such expedients. We trust the matter was the result of inadvertence and we respectfully ask an explanation at the hands of Mr. Quackenbos.

OUTLINES OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. By Thomas B. Shaw, B. A., Professor of English Literature in the Imperial Alexandria Lyceum of St. Petersburg. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard, 1849.

A delightful treatise on the best of subjects, something between the "Cyclopaedia of English Literature" by Chambers and the "Catalogue of British Authors," with spirited comments on each age or school of letters. We venture nothing in saying that the views of many of our modern authors, who are wedded to the Germans, would be considerably modified by a careful perusal of this volume in connection with Sir Henry Ellis's admirable chapters on Literature in the Pictorial History of England. We believe that the treasures of our own tongue are inferior to those of no modern language and we are pleased to see so excellent a volume to sustain our opinion.

It is for sale by J. W. Randolph & Co.

NARRATIVE OF THE LATE EXPEDITION TO THE DEAD SEA. From A Diary by one of the Party. Edited by Edward P. Montague, &c. &c. &c. Philadelphia: Carey and Hart.

This is a volume of some pretension, with an attractive title, and rather flashy exterior. Those who buy it, however, with the expectation of finding it a faithful "narrative of the late expedition to the Dead Sea" will be most egregiously disappointed. It seems to have been gotten up by the publishers on the principle that "a book's a book although there is nothing in it," to take advantage of public curiosity which is now rife with regard to the late remarkable voyage of Lieut. Lynch, and also (we cannot help thinking) to forestall his work on the same subject, now in the press of Lea & Blanchard. But our gallant commander is not to be thus treated, and we predict that this attempt to take the wind out of his sails will prove quite ineffectual, or, in other words, that his sales will only be the larger in consequence. Mr. Montague's book is certainly not the book which public expectation demands.

HISTORY OF MARYLAND; From its first settlement in 1634 to the year 1848. By James McSherry. Baltimore, Printed and Published by John Murphy. 1849.

The numerous volumes of history which have appeared during two or three years past, drawn from the annals of the States of our Union, attest an increased and gratifying attention to this branch of research. The work before us is a well-written and well-digested narrative of events connected with the history of Maryland, from the landing of the Calverts to the present time. We have no room to enlarge upon its merits here, but would recommend those who desire an excellent history of Maryland to procure it at once. It has reached us through J. W. Randolph & Co.

COLLECTIONS OF THE GEORGIA HISTORICAL SOCIETY. Volume III. Part I.

We are indebted to our excellent friend, Mr. I. K. Tefft, whose zeal in historical research has made his name well-known on both sides of the Atlantic, for a copy of this useful publication. The present number contains a vast deal of curious and valuable information with regard to the "Creek Country" and the Indian tribes of Georgia, taken from MSS. of the late Colonel Benjamin Hawkins, the earliest Agent of the United States for Indian Affairs. The Society is indebted for the use of these MSS. to Mr. Tefft its Corresponding Secretary, under whose guidance the Institution itself has attained a proud eminence among the scientific corporations of America.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

PROSPECTUS.

This work is conducted in the spirit of Littell's Museum of Foreign Literature, (which was favorably received by the public for twenty years,) but as it is twice as large, and appears so often, we not only give spirit and freshness to it by many things which were excluded by a month's delay, but while thus extending our scope and gathering a greater and more attractive variety, are able so to increase the solid and substantial part of our literary, historical, and political harvest, as fully to satisfy the wants of the American reader.

The elaborate and stately Essays of the Edinburgh Quarterly, and other Reviews; and Blackwood's subtle criticisms on Poetry, his keen political Commentaries, highly wrought Tales, and vivid descriptions of rural and mountain Scenery; and the contributions to Literature, History, and Common Life, by the sagacious Spectator, the sparkling Examiner, the judicious Athenaeum, the busy and industrious Literary Gazette, the sensible and comprehensive Britannia, the sober and respectable Christian Observer; these are interspersed with the Military and Naval reminiscences of the United Service, and with the best articles of the Dublin University, New Monthly, Fraser's, Tait's, Ainsworth's, Hood's, and Sporting Magazines, and of Chambers' admirable Journal. We do not consider it beneath our dignity to borrow wit and wisdom from Punch; and, when we think it good enough, make use of the thunder of The Times. We shall increase our variety by importations from the continent of Europe, and from the new growth of the British colonies.

The steamship has brought Europe, Asia and Africa, into our neighborhood; and will greatly multiply our connections, as Merchants, Travelers, and Politicians, with all parts of the world;

so that much more than ever it now becomes every intelligent American to be informed of the condition and changes of foreign countries. And this not only because of their nearer connection with ourselves, but because the nations seem to be hastening through a rapid process of change, to some new state of things, which the merely political prophet cannot compute or foresee.

Geographical Discoveries, the progress of Colonization, (which is extending over the whole world,) and Voyages and Travels, will be favorite matter for our selection; and, in general, we shall systematically and very fully acquaint our readers with the great department of Foreign affairs, without entirely neglecting our own.

While we aspire to make the Living Age desirable to all who wish to keep themselves informed of the rapid progress of the movement—to Statesmen, Divines, Lawyers, and Physicians—to men of business and men of leisure—it is still a stronger object to make it attractive and useful to their Wives and Children. We believe that we can thus do some good in our day and generation; and hope to make the work indispensable in every well-informed family. We say indispensable, because in this day of cheap literature it is not possible to guard against the influx of what is bad in taste and vicious in morals, in any other way than by furnishing a sufficient supply of a healthy character. The mental and moral appetite must be gratified.

We hope that, by "winnowing the wheat from the chaff," by providing abundantly for the imagination, and by a large collection of Biography, Voyages and Travels, History, and more solid matter, we may produce a work which shall be popular, while at the same time it will aspire to raise the standard of public taste. May, 1844.

TERMS.

The LIVING AGE is published every Saturday, by E. LITTELL & Co., Boston; Price 25 cents a number, or six dollars a year in advance. Remittances for any period will be thankfully received and promptly attended to.

Clubs, paying a year in advance, will be supplied as follows:—

Complete sets, in nineteen volumes, to the end of 1845, handsomely bound, and packed in neat boxes, are for sale at $2 a volume.

Any volume may be had separately at two dollars, bound, or a dollar and a half in numbers.

The following LETTERS on the plan and execution of the work have been received:

DEAR SIR,—I have read the prospectus of your proposed periodical, "The Living Age," with great pleasure; and entirely approve the plan. If it can only obtain the public patronage, long enough and large enough, and securely enough, to attain its true ends, it will contribute in an eminent degree to give a healthy tone, not only to our literature, but to public opinion. It will enable us to possess, in a moderate compass, a select library of the best productions of the age. It will do more: it will redeem our periodical literature from the reproach of being devoted to light and superficial reading, to transitory speculations, to sickly and ephemeral sentimentalities, and false

I wish it every success; and my only fear is, that it may not meet as full success with the public as it deserves. I shall be glad to be a subscriber. I am, very truly and respectfully, yours,
JOSEPH STORY.

Cambridge, April 24, 1844.

DEAR SIR,—I approve very much of the plan of your work, to be published weekly, under the title of the "Living Age;" and if it be conducted with the intelligence, spirit and taste that the prospectus indicates, (of which I have no reason to doubt,) it will be one of the most instructive and popular periodicals of the day.

I wish it abundant success, and that my name be added to the list of subscribers. Yours, very respectfully,
JAMES KENT.

New York, 7th May, 1844.

It seems to me that a selection from the highest foreign journals, if conducted with discrimination and taste, might have a very favorable influence on our reading community, deluged as it is, with periodical and other publications, which have little to recommend them but their cheapness. I have looked occasionally into the Magazine formerly conducted by Mr. Littell, and I have little doubt, from the capacity he showed in that selection, that he would compile a magazine, from the sources indicated in his prospectus, that would furnish a healthy and most agreeable banquet to the reader.

Believe me, Dear Sir, your obedient servant,

WM. H. PRESCOTT.

Boston, May, 1844.

From the specimens that the public has seen, it cannot be doubted that Mr. Littell is able to make, from the mass of contemporary literature, instructive and interesting selections. I wish you success, with all my heart.

Yours, very truly,

GEORGE BANCROFT.

DEAR SIR,—I have never seen any similar publication of equal merit; and I heartily wish for it that wide success it deserves, as a most agreeable and useful selection from that vast mass of the current periodical literature of our time, which has grown to such importance that none are beyond the reach of its influence, and few can safely be ignorant of what it is constantly sending forth to the world. Be pleased, therefore, to consider me a regular subscriber to the Living Age from the beginning.

Very truly yours,

GEO. TICKNOR.

Boston, 5th August, 1844.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have much pleasure in congratulating you upon the success of the Living Age, which has been well deserved by the great cleverness shown in its management. It has been a welcome visitor to my family, always giving us a variety of instructive and pleasant reading. Indeed, the only fault I have to find with it, is that it gives too much weekly—a fault which those of more leisure than myself, will not be likely to find.

Yours, very truly,

GEO. W. BETHUNE.

WASHINGTON, 27TH DECEMBER, 1845.

Of all the Periodical Journals devoted to literature and science which abound in Europe and in this country, this has appeared to me to be the most useful. It contains indeed the exposition only of the current literature of the English language, but this by its immense extent and comprehensiveness includes a portraiture of the human mind in the utmost expansion of the present age.

ADVICE TO YOUNG LADIES.

BY ARBOR VITE, ESQ.

If the following pages should not be found to possess that interest for the public, which is requisite for their admission into your valuable journal; or if, being there published through your courtesy, they should not be favorably esteemed by your judicious readers, the result would be extremely mortifying to my sensibility. And this, sir, would be the effect, not so much of wounded pride, for a modest estimate of my own talents has ever been one of my characteristic distinctions; but of disappointment in my efforts to aid in the culture and development of the most lovely of Earth's productions, the spring buds and blossoms of womankind.

No other motive, indeed, could have prevailed with me to enter the field of literature, at my period of life, unskilled as I am in what may be called the science and art of mental horticulture. But I have been persuaded by the solicitations of friends, that a long and intimate acquaintance with polite society, as well in foreign capitals and courts, as in the circles of our own country, joined to my habitual association with, devotion to, and study of, the most fascinating of the other sex, has fitted me, in a peculiar manner, to impart useful advice to the young sisterhood, now entering upon the untried scenes of the world. I am solicitous to repay, in the only way now left to me, some part of the obligations I owe to their predecessors; and if the performance should not correspond to the expectations of those who have encouraged the attempt, I trust to meet with some indulgence, not only on account of my laudable design, but in consideration of my having foregone the accustomed aids of natural grace and elocution, which contribute so much to the charm of polished conversation, and which I have been accounted to possess to an enviable degree.

The young lady who makes her debut in the world of fashion and of pleasure, is generally occupied with one, or both, of two great objects—to wit—to secure the admiration and homage of our sex, and to form an advantageous alliance with some favored suitor, before the close of her day of triumph. Very few succeed in attaining both the glittering prize, and the substantial reward, of feminine ambition. Too many, alas! fail to make sure of either: but, like the unlucky sportsman, who fires right and left to no purpose at the retreating covey, she is left to deplore the lavish expenditure of caps and powder, without the satisfaction of displaying a single feather of the birds so long and anxiously pursued. Some, indeed, convert themselves into human revolvers, and go off, in rapid succession, with random shots at every point in the compass: but, notwithstanding much noise and smoke, the aim of these weapons is too unsteady, and their range too short, to be effective, without the help of extraordinary accident.

I have already remarked, that few are so fortunate as to attain both of the great aims of female ambition. She, who is followed and courted by a multitude of admirers, is not often to be envied in her choice of a protector for life. There is much wisdom in proverbs. We are told by the highest authority, that the race is not always to the swift: and we are often reminded of the homely illustration, the heroine of which, after fastidiously rejecting all the straight canes in the forest, is at last obliged to be content with a crooked stick, picked up at the end of it.

And there are causes obvious enough, which conduce to this result. The love of admiration is an appetite which grows by indulgence, and which, like other morbid appetites, seeks gratification, rather in the quantity, than the quality of its food. The belle of the day is invariably surrounded by a crowd of fops and flatterers, whose only chance of attracting notice is to flourish in the sphere which her presence illumines. The rules of social intercourse oblige her to receive them civilly: while policy and convenience prompt her to encourage them by particular marks of favor and condescension. They are useful—these exquisites—in their way. They can handle a fan, or a bouquet—they can register engagements for the quadrille—select a box at the opera—have a pretty taste in jewelry and costly books—and sometimes sport fine horses in a new-fangled and dashing equipage. Some can trill opera airs melodiously from beneath a well-dyed moustache: and many more are skilful in the foreign dances, which display to such advantage the voluptuous elegance of form.

Now it seldom happens that a young man of solid merit is distinguished for his proficiency in these arts of the petit maître. Some possess such happy quickness and versatility as to acquire a competent share of graces and accomplishments.

without sacrificing the more important objects of manly pursuit. But these are few in number: and even they cannot afford to waste day after day, in dancing attendance upon female caprice, and offering fresh incense at the shrine of female vanity. By far the greater part of those who are destined to future usefulness and honor, are eclipsed in the salon by the ephemeral butterflies of fashion. The reigning beauty, who must contrive to bestow a smile, a word, or a playful tap of her fan, upon each of half a hundred admirers, has not time to discover and appreciate the real worth of the two or three, who are alone worth knowing. They have gold enough to furnish out a myriad of their rivals: but it is not wrought into the tasteful and fantastic shapes, which the eye of beauty loves to rest upon.

Lost in a crowd of competitors whom they despise—perhaps mortified by the sense of defeat—they return, with increased zeal, to labor and to study. In time, they meet with more congenial spirits—women who, in the absence of beauty and wealth, and of the frivolous crowd which these attract, have developed the higher qualities of their nature, acquired a just estimate of themselves and others, and become fit for the companionship of intelligent and high-minded men. And thus it turns out, that the belle of many seasons, admonished by her mirror that she has already passed from the spring time of life into its summer, bestows herself reluctantly upon some veteran dangler, whom she has twenty times rejected: while the true prizes of the matrimonial scheme fall to the lot of their less brilliant contemporaries.

My fair readers cannot fail to understand the lesson I would teach. If they prefer solid happiness to short-lived triumph—if they desire, as a husband, the man of worth and character, rather than the well-bred and agreeable coxcomb—they must sacrifice the homage of the many for the respect of the few,—must be content with less flattery, and truer worship.

So much by way of general admonition: a few particulars occur to me, as worthy of notice in detail.

I need not dwell on the importance of mental improvement. The subject has been so often and so well discussed, that every body yields a ready assent to the claims of its advocates, although every body does not act up to the convictions so expressed. A large proportion of parents are much more solicitous on the score of accomplishments, than of mental discipline and useful acquirement. Professors, (for there are no teachers now-a-days,) of music, vocal and instrumental, of dancing, and other ornamental arts, take precedence of all other instructors. Next in rank are the lecturers on mineralogy and metaphysics, botany and political economy, anatomy, hydrostatics, natural history, and the Encyclopædia in general. After these, come the masters of languages, ancient and modern, the mother tongue excepted: and so much is the young mind engrossed with the greater studies, that it seldom has room for more French and Italian, than will suffice to carry them through a chanson or a bravura. As to reading, writing, and arithmetic, to say nothing of needlework and other domestic knowledge, they are obsolete branches: if learned at all, they are either picked up by chance, or forced upon the pupil in after life by that stern monitress, Necessity.

But we will suppose the education completed—our young ladies can repeat Racine or Dante, with more than French volubility, more than Italian softness—they have revolved through the whole circle of the sciences, and gathered a great many hard words in their orbit; more than all, they can dance, sing and play with an excellence surpassing the most sanguine hopes of their respected parents.

Accomplishments are very desirable things to possess: a word or two upon the use of them.

The legitimate use of accomplishments, (so far as others are concerned,) is to contribute to the entertainment of festive or social assemblies. For this reason, the subjects chosen for their display, ought to be such as the majority, at least, of the company can understand and enjoy. A discourse on astronomy, or a lesson in crewel work, would doubtless be highly interesting to some individuals, who might be found at a large party. But it will not be denied, that either of these would be an intolerable bore to the rest of the company, ignorant of, and indifferent to, the subject under discussion. And it seems obvious that the same rule may very justly be applied to the exercise of musical and other talents, under the same circumstances. Some part of the auditory will, probably, be qualified, by means of an educated ear, to appreciate the refined and elaborate music of the German and Italian schools—to admire the artistic skill, and the physical power, which enable the fair vocalist to overcome the studied difficulties of the opera—vibrating for five minutes, like a hovering hawk, over the trembling heads of two innocent notes, and anon leaping, like Byron's live thunder,

“From peak to peak, the rattling crags among!”

Many more will affect to be enchanted, because they would fain be esteemed amateurs. “Brava”—“bravissima”—may resound on all sides, as the “hear—hear!” and the “great applause,” are thrown in by the friends of a candidate, when he harangues at the hustings. Of course, no signs or sounds of discontent will be seen or heard. But, after all, the great mass of listeners hear with more patience than pleasure. They do not comprehend, and their sympathies are untouched. The highest triumph of song is, at the same time, to charm the senses, and subdue the heart. To this end poetic sentiment, pathos, and natural feeling, must unite with the power of melody. And if the words be those of an unknown tongue—or a flat and insipid translation of some foreign rhapsody—if the music be of that artificial character, which requires for its enjoyment a particular study, training, and acquired taste—the performance must fail of its due effect upon most of those for whom it is intended. Nor is it unworthy of remark, that those, who are capable of appreciating, are most likely to be fastidious critics, even in their own despite. They have heard much of this kind of music—they are familiar with the style and manner, the execution and expression, of the signoras who have conferred celebrity on the favorite airs of the opera. They cannot choose but remember Madame Bishop and Tedesco, and the comparison will scarcely be advantageous to their imitators in society. Perhaps, if the critic be very good natured, the opinion may be suppressed: but the desire of showing off one's taste and judgment is very seducing; and if the critic chance to have a singing niece or daughter, or happen to be a rival herself—the temptation to detract is irresistible.

Let me not be understood as proscribing all the music of continental Europe. Perhaps no nation is without its share of music, whose power will be every where felt and acknowledged. And, certainly, this must be true, in an eminent degree, of those countries where it has been so highly cultivated. English composers have often transplanted and naturalized the flowers of foreign melody, and fed them with waters from the "well of English undefiled:" nor can our obligations be denied, until we forget "Away with Melancholy," "Home, Sweet Home," "Hope told a Flattering Tale," "Moore's National Melodies," and the thousand rich exotics that we have borrowed from Italy, and elsewhere, and taught to flourish on our own soil. On the other hand, the wild beauty and tenderness of the Scottish muse was recognized by Beethoven, the great master of Germany: and he did not disdain to employ his genius, in reducing her unwritten melodies to the printed score, and adding the finish of consummate art to the unstudied grace of nature. Let us then be neither ungrateful debtors, nor servile dependants. Let us cherish the music of our ancestors, Scotch, Irish, English—aye, and Welsh also, for though little known to us, they are near of kin. From these sources we derive our laws, our customs, our manners, and our literature; with all of which, and especially the last, our taste for melody has been transmitted, in intimate connexion. Let us adopt whatever we find good in the lays of other lands—whatever wakes "the soul of music" within us, and appeals with true eloquence to the heart—not those laborious efforts of skill which convert the human voice into a mere organ of sound, and simply astonish us, by the marvellous extent, to which they can task the powers of the instrument. The criterion—the touchstone—is at hand. Moliere, it is said, always read his comedies to his housekeeper, and augured the success or failure of particular scenes, from the sympathy or indifference of the old woman. We may resort to a standard, somewhat higher indeed, but not dissimilar. Whatever is acceptable to the great body of educated people—whether educated by books, or by intercourse with others—whatever moves their sympathy, and attracts their liking—is almost sure to possess real merit, and to be enjoyed even by the most refined amateur. And on the contrary, those songs, which are commended only by technical critics, professional musicians, and travelled pretenders to science and bon ton—however well they may be received by the select few—will be little admired by the untaught multitude, a multitude embracing by far the larger portion of our families, friends and intimate acquaintance.

What has been said upon the subject of singing might be repeated, to some extent, in relation to instrumental music. It must be admitted, however, that the tendency, in this direction, is much weaker. To master the complicated and rapid passages of Herz, Czerny and the other gentlemen with crooked names, requires an amount of severe and long continued practice, which discourages most pupils. And I am not sure, but their industry needs to be stimulated, quite as much as their taste to be corrected. The best instrumental music is unquestionably to be found in the compositions of Italy, Germany and France. With a few exceptions, in the English school, we have no other. For the most part, young ladies rest satisfied with the achievement of light waltzes, polkas and the like: pleasant trifles enough, but not comparable to the rich variations, spirited overtures, and full concertos of the same schools. Perhaps I may be met here with my own objection—that these pieces would not be relished by the majority, whom I have chosen as critics. But I am persuaded that many selections could be made, which would favorably impress even the untutored ear, and become popular, as soon as they were known.

The dance! "Lightly tread! 'tis hallowed ground." I almost wish I had not stepped into it, for I am by no means sure of my footing, and am somewhat apprehensive that I may be compelled to "walk Spanish." There are difficulties on all sides. It is clear, we can never go back to the Highland Fling, the Strathospey, or the Irish Planxty. We should be as little at home in them, as if we had got into the plate armor of Froissart, or the ruffs and farthingales of queen Bess. Nay, even more recent fashions are long since obsolete. Where be now the country dance (contre-danse), the Minuet de la cour and the Gavotte de Vestris? Vanished—all vanished! Even the cotillon, stigmatised by the Spectator as an outlandish and indecent exhibition, has survived the reproach of its youth, and acquired a respectable character, as it grew too old for the times. The quadrille has succeeded—the waltz—the mazurka—the polka—the redowa—and what new figure may be in the ascendant, when these pages shall have attained the dignity of print, no man, or woman, can foretell. It is impossible to pronounce with confidence on the politics of France, the shape of a bonnet, the tie of a cravat, or the cut of a caper, longer than twenty-four hours after the last steamer has been telegraphed. Such being the tumultuous agitations of this class of public affairs, I may well be excused from attempting to lay down any specific laws for the dance. There is a general principle, however, which should be of universal application, and of lasting influence, through every change of fashion.

Dancing is said to be the poetry of motion. Like other poetry, it is capable of portraying a great variety of feelings, some of which might perhaps be omitted, with no great detriment to the public morals. The peasant's rejoicing at May Day or Harvest Home—the stern and savage hate of the Indian brave on his war path—the innocent and frolic glee of childhood—the voluptuous abandon of Eastern dancing girls—all these, and a hundred other feelings, find ready and forcible expression in the dance. Its character and expression, therefore, are the things to be determined: and upon these depend the question of its propriety. If a young lady finds, either in her own consciousness, or in her observation of others, that a fashionable dance calls up any thought or feeling, which she would blush to acknowledge, for her at least that dance is improper. Nor will she act unwisely, if, even without such experience of her own, she yields to the objections or the prejudices of those, whose interest in her confers the right to advise. It is better to forego pleasure and admiration, than to purchase them at the cost of even the least portion of the respect which is her due. What is innocent in itself may become odious through the license of others, and deserve to be shunned no less, than if the vice had been inherent. These suggestions leave a wide margin, as the merchants say, for the exercise of individual discretion. That discretion must necessarily attach to every question of morality and propriety: to none more especially, than to one which turns upon considerations of delicacy, and in which the consciousness, upon which it depends, cannot be delegated to another person.

The conversation and demeanor of a young lady, more than all other things, determine the figure which she is to make in society, and the place she is to fill. And, here, the two great requisites are modesty and simplicity: by the latter of which qualities is meant the absence of all affectation. The first entrance into company is generally accompanied by a certain degree of timidity and embarrassment. To disguise these, the fair debutante often indulges in some little artifice, some trick of manner, which in no long time grows into a confirmed habit, and continues through life. One has a lisp, another a mincing gait; a third fingers her jewelry, or her neck-dress, and a fourth is perpetually arranging curls that are absolutely faultless. Some, more deliberately artful, affect characters that are thought attractive. The romantic class is almost extinct. Shepherdesses and heroines belong to the last century, or, at the latest, to the generation which has preceded us. Since the days of Cherubina, we have not known a damsel worthy to tread the vale of Tempe, or the passes of the Pyrenees. But there are other follies extant. Flavia studies wit and sarcasm—delights in satire and repartee: almost daily she loses a friend, or makes an enemy, and gains nothing but a reputation for rudeness and malice, which she does not altogether deserve.

Ellen, on the contrary, is gentle and timid in the extreme: her tones are soft, her manner always placid and subdued: her eyes never sparkle—no emotion finds expression in them, save a humid sensibility—and she would be entirely irresistible, if she were not perfectly insipid.

Priscilla is a girl of spirit, (what the cockneys call "a fast lady.") She despises prudery. Above the silly prejudices of her sex, she loves the reputation of an esprit fort, and ventures boldly upon topics and expressions, that are usually reckoned among the propria que maribus. She glories in calling a spade a spade—

"In fair and open dealing where's the shame?
What Nature dares to give, she dares to name."

This humor, as it is the most disgusting, is fortunately the most uncommon, of affectations. It has its source in a depraved fancy, and corrupted feelings—and their pitiable possessor is sure to find herself avoided, in the end, for the very qualities, which attracted on first acquaintance. Most young men are willing enough to be amused for an hour or two, by the piquant familiarity of a young lady who "has no false shame:" but, just in proportion as she sinks in their respect, she loses the true magnetic influence that belongs to woman, and the repulsive force of aversion takes its place.

Other masqueraders are to be seen, in endless variety. Here is a specimen of innocent playfulness, whose face wears an invariable smile, and whose tongue utters incessant nonsense—there a learned lady, profoundly read in philosophy and the sciences, or at least addicted to belles lettres and periodicals, perhaps a contributor—this is a Di Vernon, with no greater abatement of her beauty and talent than we might reasonably expect—and that, an interesting invalid, who has begun by feigning to be nervous and fragile, and will probably end by becoming so. Pass a season in any large city—throw yourself into the current of gay life—and your own observation will far exceed my imperfect descriptions.

Every affectation is a blemish. Patches and paint recommend a face to no one, whose taste is not sadly vitiated. A woman may be handsome through all such disguises: and she may be fascinating, in spite of foibles and caprices. But they add nothing to her merit, or her power to please. They may be sometimes diverting, but the laugh is too much at her expense. If I had but one word to say to my fair readers, by way of maxim, it should be this—"Be natural—be yourselves! Correct your faults, if you can: but at all events, appear just what you really are, and never affect to be any body else."

Few things are more important than a modest dignity of deportment in public. The exuberance of youthful spirits, and the excitement of the ball, or the theatre, too often betray the thoughtless into noisy levity, which disturbs their neighbors and provokes invidious remark. But this is not the worst. Sometimes we see super-added a bold spirit of coquetry, which, mistaking notoriety for admiration, sets at naught the laws of decorum; sometimes an arrogance, which seeks to display its fancied superiority, by disregarding the rules of common politeness. Ladies of this turn of mind become restless and attitudinize—talk and laugh loudly—make a liberal use of lorgnettes—utter audible criticisms on those whom they deem their inferiors—transgress the regulations of the place—and manifest, in every way, a contempt for the rights, the convenience, and the feelings, of other people.

Such airs are conspicuous among the new fashions: those, who have just effected a lodgment on the outer edge of "the upper crust," and are striving to work their way into more noticeable positions. They may be observed, too, not unfrequently, in some of the provincial gentry, who know little of the world, beyond the contracted circle of their own local influence and reputation; and who presume on the faded lustre of aristocratic names, which half the people around them have long since forgotten. Thus do extremes meet: and the mushroom celebrities of to-day shoot up alongside of suckers from the decaying roots of the old fathers of the forest.

True elegance of manner, no matter how animated, is never boisterous. It does not challenge the eye and ear of the multitude. Its very essence is a quiet self-possession, a graceful ease, joined to a considerate respect for others; which nothing would so much disturb, as the consciousness of having unduly attracted the public gaze. The opposite feeling properly belongs to the heroines of the stage: whose hard lot obliges them to the public display of their talents and charms, and compels them to labor for the applause of the audience, to whom they look for their daily bread. Far from the daughters of Virginia be the reproach, which the caustic pen of an English satirist inflicted upon his countrywomen a hundred years since—

"Britannia's daughters, much more fair than nice,
Too fond of admiration, lose their price:
Worn in the public eye, give cheap delight
To throngs, and tarnish to the sated sight."

A wise admonition! too little heard or heeded, either at that day, or in this. Yes! the true sphere of woman is at home. There her loveliness is pure, bright, and unfading. There her presence fills the dwelling, however humble, with light and happiness, and the hearts of the dwellers therein with joy, and gratitude, and love. There is she most highly honored and beloved. There will she be sought and admired, wooed and won, by him who is worthiest of her affection and her trust.

And now, dear young ladies, as your sincere friend and servant prepares to make his bow and take his leave, he feels an uncomfortable doubt as to the impression which he may leave behind. On the one hand, his self love, (fed by the consciousness of good intentions,) prompts the hope that you may discover some tincture of sound sense, and wholesome counsel, in his desultory lecture. On the other, he is not without apprehension, that his departure may be felt as a relief from the penance of constrained politeness, and that a repetition of his visit may be less desired, than that of some younger and more agreeable acquaintance. However this shall be, he prays that you will remember him with indulgence, if you deign to remember him at all; and with the most earnest wishes for your health, happiness, and honor, he bids you all farewell.

THE BAPTISMAL OF DEATH.

MR. EDITOR :—Being on a visit, last Autumn, to one of the most beautiful and pleasant cities of New England, the residence of "AMIE," I availed myself of the opportunity to pay my respects to her. Hitherto, her retiring modesty, not to say extreme diffidence, has kept her from becoming as widely and favorably known as the purity of her private character and the excellence of her writings, some of which have occasionally appeared in print, will, I think, be found fully to justify. Having recently (in fulfilment of a promise made at the time I called,) been honored with copies of two or three of her pieces, "selected (as she observes in her note inclosing them), from a heterogeneous mass of unpublished papers, not from any favoritism, but as a specimen of the whole," I have thought I could not do better than offer one of them for publication in the Messenger. She adds: "I would hardly dare subject articles to your particular notice, were it not that you have seen and kindly commended those written long since, when I was even less able than at present, to express the manifold thoughts, rushing through my mind, swiftly, silently—changing ever, like clouds in the twilight heaven. I have written much during the past year, yet little to which the gay world would listen; for the music that echoes from the 'sanctuary of sorrow,' is too dirge-like for the happy and light-hearted." The allusion here is to the loss of a brother and two sisters, all of whom died within a short time of each other.

But let the following lines speak for themselves. The appeal, I am confident, will not be in vain.

K.

Washington, D. C.

Oh! Mother, I had a sweet, sweet dream,
 When you laid me to rest last night—
 I but lost your dark eye's loving beam,
 For a purer, a holier light.
 I thought I wandered to gather flowers,
 In the woods where I often stray,
 Where the merry sunbeams in golden showers,
 O'er the glossy, dark leaves play;—
 But it looked as if a radiant glow
 To every thing was given,
 Sweeter than all we here may know—
 Like what we dream of Heaven!
 The air, as a mirror, seemed to fling
 A form where each light breeze play'd,—
 Till I almost thought I saw its wing
 Go fitting through the shade.
 And the trees above their branches threw,
 As the holy light swept down,
 Till each had won from the realms of blue,
 A glittering silvery crown.
 And I thought as the flowers their perfumes shed
 So silently and sweet,
 Of the holy oil with which you said
 They bathed the Savior's feet!
 I sat by a stream, flowing calm and still,
 And a garland of fair buds twined,
 While the oriole's song, with a music-thrill,
 Trembled out upon the wind.

And as I bent o'er the mossy side,
 Something softly breathed my name,
 And it echoed sweet o'er the sunny tide,
 As if up through the blue it came.
 I know not why, yet the swift tears flowed
 O'er the waves, thro' my golden curls,
 But beneath the waters they blent and glowed,
 Like a wreath of living pearls!
 And richer the music upward stole,
 Till an angel form appeared—
 And a thrilling joy swept o'er my soul,
 For oh! I nothing feared.
 And the Angel breathed as he took my hand,—
 "Thou art happy, and gay, and free,
 And I've come with a gift from a holy Land,
 That thou ever thus may be!—
 There's many a shade with earth's brightness blent,
 Too dark for thy sunny eye,
 And I with a power divine am sent
 That they pass thee harmless by."
 Then he led me down thro' the crystal stream,
 Till the pure waves kiss'd my brow,
 And trembling above with a sparkling gleam,
 As he whispered, "safe art thou!"
 And rainbows of glory were arching bright,
 From the streamlet to the sky,
 And seraphs there seemed borne in light
 To their happy home on high—
 And I softly slipp'd from the sacred stream,
 In joy with my Angel guide,—
 But, I woke, to find it all a dream,
 And you smiling at my side.

'Twas a bright, a joyous summer-day,
 And the child was in the wood—
 The sunbeams and zephyrs were out at play,
 To gladden the solitude.
 Down the dreamy shadows the rich light broke,
 In streams of flowing gold,
 And the air was hush'd, tho' the light breeze spoke
 And in music its gladness told.
 The sweet child in joy thro' the wild-wood glanced
 All merrily along,
 And the dewy flowers with her light feet danced,
 To the wild bird's echoing song,
 She gathered rich blossoms as on she sped,
 But a whisper broke on her ear,
 And she passed with a lighter, a holier tread,
 Where a stream rushed calm and clear.
 On the mossy bank, with a dreary air,
 She softly bent the knee,
 And a sacred hush, like a wordless prayer,
 Swept o'er the waters free—
 'Neath the weight of holiness she thrilled,
 And in thought-like silence wept,
 And her tears like dew o'er flowers distilled,
 In her eye's clear sunlight slept.
 The violet's breath came sweetly round,
 And the waters murmured by,
 Till whispering echoes wreathed each sound
 To seraph-minstrelsy!
 Farther she knelt o'er the bank's green side,
 Sweeter rose the stream's soft flow,
 And each lily that waved above the tide,
 Seemed an angel's wing below!—
 The blue waves played with her curls of gold,
 And kissed away her breath—
 She pass'd to a Land of light untold,
 From the Baptismal of Death!

GOV. MCDOWELL'S SPEECH.

The greatest speech of these latter days, is that just delivered in Congress by Gov. McDowell. Governor McDowell we style him, after the fond and somewhat proud fashion we have in Virginia of continuing this designation to all who have once presided over the State, even after they have acquired for themselves national rank—thus claiming for ourselves the lustre of their celebrity, and perhaps intimating that there is no dignity superior to that of the chief magistracy of the Old Dominion.

The transcendent character of this effort has been established beyond the reach of criticism. Never have we read such unmitigated plaudits as have filled all our papers. The Washington correspondents seem to be almost insane. "It is the greatest speech of the season—it is the greatest ever delivered in either house of Congress—or any where else!—it is the greatest in the English language—it has the power of Chatham, the point of Sheridan, the polish of Addison, the patriotism of Henry!" &c., &c.

Now what does all this mean? Why, that the speech must be all this and more too if possible, to account for its having produced in the Hall of Representatives, a sensation, an excitement, a bouleversement, without a parallel in the history of American deliberative eloquence, and not surpassed by any thing which we have an account of, as happening elsewhere in ancient or modern times. An eye-witness, (a member of Congress,) thus describes the scene:

"To-day the House went into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union on the Post Office Appropriation Bill, and Mr. Turner having made a speech against the Southern Address, the floor was taken by Gov. McDowell, for a speech upon the question of a State government for California. At the conclusion of his hour, the House, with one accord, called on him to proceed, and he continued to occupy the attention of the Committee for three-fourths of an hour longer, in delivering perhaps the most eloquent and effective speech ever delivered in the Representatives' Hall. Many members were in tears, and among them the Speaker of the House, (Mr. Winthrop,) more than once during the delivery of his speech. For a quarter of an hour after he had concluded, so great was the sensation in the Hall, that no business was done. . . . "I never in my life heard such a speech as that of Gov. McDowell. 'I will not attempt to describe it,' Mr. —, a whig member, remarked to me at its conclusion, when his face was still wet with tears," &c. &c.

Another writer speaks of the House as dissolved in tears.

General attention from the lower House of the American Congress, to its speakers, is, we are sorry to say, an unusual compliment, and an eloquent speaker who addressed the house some days before Mr. McDowell, thought it incumbent on him to pause in his remarks, and return his thanks for it; to suspend the hour rule, was to shew that they were in a transport—but to be dissolved in tears! The lower House dissolved in tears! "Think of that, Master Brook, think of that!" We have seen men shed tears in church, and sometimes in the jury box, but in a legislative body, never. We confess that we would have been hardly as much surprised to hear that the American Union had been dissolved into its integers, as we were to hear that the American Congress was dissolved in tears. The cool New Englander—the haughty South Carolinian—the Texan Ranger from his ranche—the atrabilious Mississippian—the rough roarer from Arkansas, blistering with their pearly drops the Congressional documents on the desks before them! Well, it proves that our people have hearts, and hearts in the right place; of which we never had any doubt,—and it proves another thing too, which many had begun to doubt, viz: that true eloquence is a reality, even in modern times. The face of society has changed so completely, that some are beginning to imagine that the heart of man has changed too. Chivalry has certainly gone, and Royalty seems to be going, and some talk as if Poetry was a humbug, and Eloquence a tradition—that because Macaulay writes such splendid prose, there is no room for Poetry—and because our most successful stump speakers mingle in equal parts conversational argument, pointed anecdote, and florid declamation, that there is no height above for the orator—that Demosthenes, and Chatham, and Henry, if they could speak to an audience in the 19th century, would be obliged to curve in the swoop of their wings. But not so—man is in body, mind and moral nature, the same being that God made him at first, and ever will be. It is true, that men have not of late been much stirred by true eloquence, but it is because we have not had the orators to do it. The harp is silent as well when no master hand sweeps the chords, as when the chords are broken. But ever and anon, we have something to keep us from yielding to the melancholy conviction that the divine art of eloquence is gone. This speech is an unimpeachable witness upon the point just now.

Nor is the notion which we are combatting merely a false speculation. It is hurtful in practice. Let men have low, creeping ideas of eloquence as an art, and our public speakers will rapidly deteriorate. What the present style of popular speaking is, we have briefly indicated already; and if this is to be held up as the best and most effective style, our young men will presently come to look upon any thing beyond as unreal, fantastic and unbecoming—ill suited to present affairs as the subtleties of Thomas Aquinas. Colleges will yield to the pressure, and the studies which have for their object the cultivation of some of the highest powers of the mind, together with the taste, and the power of expression, will be set aside as not sufficiently practical. But let it be understood that while clever, effective popular speaking has its place, its merit and its reward, there is a something above this, that there is a mens diviniore atque os magna sonaturum, and we shall see our men of real power, striving for this real eloquence, and not as now, purposely under speaking themselves, from a supposed necessity of meeting the requirements of the age.

If any thing can contribute to this change of opinion and practice, we think Gov. McDowell's speech is likely to do it; as well by presenting a specimen of real eloquence, as by showing that such eloquence will be appreciated and duly honored, as much now as it would have been at any former time.

Nor let it be supposed that there was any thing special or accidental connected with this speech, which will go any distance in accounting for its marvellous effects. The subject was certainly a momentous one. There never was a great speech delivered upon any other than a great subject, as from the nature of the case there never could be. Hercules himself could put forth no more strength than another man in lifting up a pin. The subject was surely great, but other distinguished speakers had spoken upon it, and by their efforts had gained great praise in the papers and elsewhere; but we observe of them all, that when the Speaker's hammer fell, they were allowed to take their seats. By-the-by, the greatest speech before Mr. McDowell's in point of time, and the next after it in celebrity, was delivered by Mr. Preston of Montgomery. Mr. Preston is a near kinsman, (first cousin we believe,) of Mr. McDowell. The Senator from Missouri, who speaks as Achilles fought, is his brother-in-law; and William C. Preston, the champion of South Carolina in her time of need, and still her pride, though borne down by affliction, is by a complex relationship, his brother-in-law and cousin. The family relationship between these distinguished speakers is a curious coincidence worth noting. Nor is the applause which has rung through our land the outcry of a party cheering a successful partisan effort. No reliance can ever be put upon a party estimate. If you will exhibit to the gaze of men their cherished idols, even a silversmith's harangue is enough to make them cry out for the space of two hours, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." But Gov. McDowell's speech was not made to a party, nor is it extolled by the one party more than by the other. Neither does it possess any thing of that ambiguousness which sometimes causes both sides to exclaim "a second Daniel come to judgment." It is a southern speech, so far as it is allowable to designate truth as sectional, and its doctrines can be acceptable to the abolitionists only when they confess their sins, and what is harder their egregious folly.

We are not then to look to any thing temporary or accidental connected with the delivery of this speech for the secret of its unparalleled success. We are shut up to the conclusion that its vis insita accomplished the wonder.

So much for the speech as spoken. Of its character as such, one who had not the fortune to hear it can only speculate as we have done, taking as our basis the impression which by general consent it is agreed that it made. But as to the written speech, the case is different. We have it in our hands, we can read and read again—we can criticise, we can judge. As soon as the speech was delivered, and the mighty explosion of praise reverberated through the country, every one exclaimed almost simultaneously, "No speech in the world can sustain this weight of commendation;—when it is published, every one must of necessity be disappointed." But the fact that such an opinion was universal, proved that it was erroneous; for it showed that all were prepared to make the proper allowance for the difference between a spoken and a published speech.

Indeed almost every one has so often verified this difference for himself, that nothing is more familiar. We read the thunders of Demosthenes against Philip, and the invectives of Cicero against Cataline with admiration certainly, but without emotion. Such fragments as have been preserved of Lord Chatham's speeches are grand, but there must have been in them something more than meets our eye, to have subdued as they did the English Parliament. Our own Henry stands secure and eminent among the great masters we have named; but he stands upon tradition rather than upon what has been reported from his lips. And so of the speeches of Burke and Pitt and Fox—the Warren Hastings speech of Sheridan and McIntosh's defence of Peltier; and so of the sermons of Chalmers and Hall—read them and you feel their power, and see the light of genius flashing from every page, but if they were not something more to others when spoken, than they are to you when read, then those who were so moved by them were enthusiasts, or you are deficient in sensibility if not in sense. Of all modern speeches with which we are acquainted, Mr. Webster's national orations, as the one on Bunker Hill and the one on Jefferson and Adams, seem to come up when read nearest to their high-water mark. Mr. Clay's give no just idea of his power over an audience. In accounting for this great and well known difference between the effect of the same speech when spoken, and when read, it is usual to dismiss it with the summary remark, that the charm of delivery is absent in the latter case. Good delivery is a great thing we know, but it must be much greater than we are willing to allow, if it covers the actual difference between a House of Representatives melted into silently gushing tears, and breaking up in a kind of oblivious disorder, and the solitary reader, absorbed it is true with swelling breast, a moist eye, and a choking sensation about his throat, but still master of himself, and ready as soon as he finishes reading, to eat his dinner with an appetite unimpaired. We say that to account for the diminished effect there must be the absence of something more than delivery merely. What this something wanted is, it would lead us too far to attempt to explain fully; but we may be allowed a single word. Mainly then, we would say the circumstances are widely different in the two cases. The Greek dreaded Philip as his foe—the Roman saw Cataline with his dagger drawn against the heart of the city that was his home. Those who heard the sublime apostrophe, "Give me Liberty, or give me Death," felt that the alternative was presented to them too—and when the son of West Augusta, in thrilling words, half entreaty, half demand, all steeped in love, and winged with truth, called upon Massachusetts for a sister's charity and a sister's duty, Speaker Winthrop and every Massachusetts Representative there felt that appeal knocking at the door of their hearts. The reader cannot feel this, and therefore cannot feel as they did. Let us add to this, the power of sympathy, the infection of feeling, the circulation of sentiment, and if we have not fully accounted for the difference between hearing and reading, we have at least indicated what has five times as much to do with it, as what is usually meant by delivery. Nor is it true we believe that all the great orators were noted for their powers of delivery. However this may be, we are sure that Gov. McDowell does not possess a delivery of that magic, irresistible power which certainly does wonders sometimes. His manner is good—positively good; we are not certain that it is much more. It is satisfying, but not compelling—it sustains his high efforts, but cannot be said to add essentially to them. Gov. McDowell possesses a commanding person, over which he has a graceful control—a handsome face, with that unmistakable blended expression, which denotes the equal combination of high intellectual and moral characteristics; and a voice clear and true, but not remarkable for tone or power, though of varied modulation within a certain compass. In his utterance and in his pronunciation he is nice to fastidiousness, and his gesticulation is natural, but limited. Where all these qualities are found, it secures a manner that no one will find fault with, but at the same time this manner may lack what in our college days we used to call vim. We despise a ranting manner—contortions of the countenance—falsettos in the voice up and down—starting backwards and forwards and sideways—the supplisio pedis et percussio femoris. But there are tones which curdle the heart's blood; there are gestures which open the way for a mighty thought, and there is about some orators a Niagara rush that carries all with it. Gov. McDowell, gifted as he is, does not possess this power. Not therefore, we repeat, to the subject of this speech, not to anything accidental, not to the powers of elocution are we to look to find wherein its great strength lies—but to the speech itself. Let us then look at it a little as a work of art. It is of course unnecessary to give any synopsis of a production by this time so well known; and for the same reason we will spare ourselves the trouble of making any extracts from it. Any reference that we may make, will be sufficiently intelligible to every reader.

What strikes us most in this speech, is the simplicity of the materials of which it is constructed. The centre proposition about which it revolves is that our country is in eminent peril, and that it is in the power of Congress to avert that peril; the feelings to which he addresses himself are those of patriotism and sacred brotherhood; the example he proposes for imitation is that of our forefathers, exhibited in the compromise character of the constitution, and illustrated by the magnanimity of the South, then and since; and the main argumentative proposition is that the North is entirely mistaken in supposing that the extension, so called, of slavery will tend to its increase, or the contrary policy to its final extinction. Now all these ideas are, we say, simple and not new. They are simple, but they are grand; and that is just the characteristic of sublimity. Look at the greatest works from the Iliad, with its speciosa miracula, down to the present times, and you will find that where they are most simple, they are greatest. Look to all who, as speakers, have swayed the sentiments of men, and you will find that they have done it upon obvious propositions and simple principles, and it cannot be otherwise. Truth is natural and straightforward.

In nine cases out of ten, the strongest reason is the most obvious one; and when as the exception it is otherwise, all men, except judges on the bench, entertain with distrust an opinion founded upon a wire-drawn argument. Is every one then a great speaker who takes up obvious topics? By no means; as any one may convince himself who will take the trouble to look over the reported speeches of the last, or of any previous session of Congress. What is wanted is the power of the reasoner to connect admitted premises with disputed conclusions, and the genius of the orator to give to a deduction of reason the reality, the vitality, and the solemn sanction of a rule of conduct. To do this in its full measure, that old requirement of the books, and older one of nature, must be met. The orator must himself believe the truth of what he is uttering, and be under the impulse which he would communicate. This unaffected sincerity is the next general characteristic of this speech, and it colors every page. We see the man before us—not the partisan—not the demagogue—not the Buncombeite, but the patriot, the statesman, the scholar, the God-fearing man, pouring out of his heart feelings which have their constant home there.

Another thing to be noted, is the moderation which reigns throughout the whole. He does not claim perfection for the measure he supports, but freely admits that it is liable to objections, which under other circumstances might be fatal. He does not deny that there is evil connected with slavery, and he does not pour unmitigated denunciation on his opponents. Only upon two topics has he sublimely spurned limitation; and upon these two, faint words are falsehoods—the value of our union and the solemn duty of defending it. To leave this general survey and notice some particulars, we would say that the introduction seems to us to be a master-piece. It is not like some of Cicero's, artificial and ornamented, but like many of Demosthenes', plain almost to poverty. We confess that we were at first disappointed. We expected something solemn and grand, about the circumstances of the occasion, whereas we met with what looked like the commencement of a dry constitutional argument. But we presently saw the intent. The orator meant to treat this subject upon high grounds, and it was necessary to lift the discussion to the level which he had chosen. In order to do this, he gives a lucid argument, positive without dogmatism, and brief without obscurity, and fortified moreover with the authority of Mr. Madison, to show that there are no constitutional impediments in the course proposed, and thus the field is open for him to press his appeal to the high motives which ought to actuate every lover of his country. The cool movement of the introduction heightens moreover the effect of what follows. This value of contrast, great orators understand, as well as great painters, and conscious of power, sometimes tantalize the hearers with less than a full measure. Not that we suppose that Governor McDowell thought for a moment of the artistic effect of contrast; he proceeded, according to the most natural mode, to develop his ideas, but it happens here, as it often does, that the dictates of nature are coincident with the highest rules of art. Speaking of happy coincidences, we cannot forbear noticing the luck, if we may so call it, that made the allotted hour run out just where it did. Governor McDowell had just announced the proposition of a close resemblance between the American Cavalier and the American Roundhead. To hear that resemblance traced by such a speaker, the House, in the transport that it then was in, was ready to suspend not the hour rule merely, but we verily believe a small fraction of the Constitution itself. It was just the breaking off in the Arabian Nights of Scheherazade, at a point where the Sultan cared more for the story than he did for his fatal law.

Where Governor McDowell speaks of the effect of the non-extension policy, we see the matured opinions of a mind long accustomed to view the subject of slavery in all its lights. His position in relation to some late movements has not failed to be the subject of remark, and most men would have deemed the occasion one which would have justified some personal explanation; not so, Mr. McDowell. He felt that the themes he was handling were too high and holy to allow that any one man should thrust his individuality among them. And he was right. Let the Representative explain his course if necessary to his constituents in their primary assemblies, or through the papers if he will; but he who attempts something national must forget himself or he will soon be forgotten by others.

We think that all readers, North and South, will be struck with the grouping which he gives of the series of legal acts proceeding more or less directly from the hands of Southern men and Southern States, all of which have gone to restrict the institution of slavery, both in its limits and its political strength; and we know not how any one can resist his conclusion, that all parties ought to be thankful for what has been done, and ought to leave all else to the controlling and natural course of events.

Were we, however, called on to name what seems to us the most effective passage in the speech, we would select that in which Massachusetts is reminded of what Virginia did in the matter of the Boston Port Bill. It is the sublime pointing of Manlius when charged with sedition to the capitol he had saved. How the spirit of the past rebukes the chafings of the present! When we think of the mighty surge of danger which, with brave brother breasts, our forefathers confronted then, how next to nothing seem the interposed rivulets that would make us enemies now!

But we must hasten to the orator's conclusion, as we find that it is the only way to get to a conclusion of our own. Every one knows that the winding up of a speech is a perilous thing—facilis descensus, is not true, in one sense at least, in oratory. Mr. McDowell escapes the danger of a fall, by not coming down at all. According to those fanciful stanzas by Longfellow, after height upon height has been gained, and at last all is over, a sound falls down from somewhere supernal, bodying the world "Excelsior." This is the aptest allusion which occurs to us to illustrate the Governor's finale. What is a little singular, he selects for this hour of need, a steed that he had ridden before—a gallant one it is true, and able to do double work, if ever there was one. He re-delivers verbatim the conclusion of his celebrated Princeton Address. Of course it was familiar to every one in the House, for it had gone through the length and breadth of the land, and we have seen it besides fitted into other settings, and it was not a thing to be forgotten. We can hardly say whether we like it or not. It was just the thing that was needed here, and perhaps no other man in the Union could furnish any thing else as good. Perhaps Mr. McDowell himself could not, and therefore he has used it, as he had a perfect right to do, seeing it is no felony to steal from one's self. Still it looks like literary adultery, to have the same peroration married to two living speeches. At all events, to change the figure, we are sure that as the conclusion to the Princeton Address it will ever hereafter have to us the rather unpleasant look of something born out of due time.

One word as to the mere style. We have heard some persons say that they were very much struck with the brilliancy of the illustrations and the allusions; we cannot say that we were particularly. It has been our good fortune often to hear the Governor in easy conversation, for hours together, throw off extemporaneously, bright, apposite things of this sort, fully as good as the best in the speech, and a good deal better than the "open sesame" one and some others. Let us be understood to put in a saving clause in favor of the West Augusta conclusion. We take off our cap to this and hold it to be among illustrations what the Ode on St. Cecilia's Day is among lyrics. As to the language, who does not praise it! Still we would be no true critic did we allow it to be perfect, and we would be much better critic than we aspire to be, could we point out wherein it could be amended. It is pure, elegant and classic, but with a slight tendency to expletiveness—it is exact without pedantry, and picturesque without mannerism—nevertheless, had it a trifle more about it of the rough Anglo-Saxon jar, it would please our ear better—but, nevertheless again, we would not advise Gov. McDowell to attempt any change in the language, unless he can get better authority than ours, that it would be an improvement.

We have confined our notice of this speech to its character as a specimen of eloquence. What may be its political influence, we pretend not to estimate. The bill it advocated did not pass, (we wish the vote had been taken as soon as it was finished.) But what then? Men may vote one way and think another, and the secret conviction of this year may turn into the vote of the next. An old writer has said of affliction, as connected with the reception of religious truth, "when the ground is soft the plough will enter." So let us think of the truth conveyed in this speech. There were many hearts softened in the Hall of our National Legislature. May we not hope that, in that sacred hour, impressions were made whose hallowed tendencies will be to remove suspicion, to lessen jealousies, to restrain strife, and to heal the hurt of our country by melting the hearts of her sons into a blessed brotherhood?

THE ISTHMUS LINE TO THE PACIFIC.

Before presenting to our readers the following letter of Lieut. Maury on the subject of a line of improvement across the Isthmus to the Pacific, we have a word to say with regard to the Convention proposed to be held at Memphis on the fourth day of July next. The objects which this Convention has in view, are briefly set forth in a circular letter of invitation, addressed to us by a committee of gentlemen at Memphis. We transfer it to our pages.

Memphis, Tenn., March 1st, 1849.

Sir: The attention of the people of the Union has recently been directed to the consideration of the expediency of constructing a RAIL ROAD from the valley of the Mississippi to California, for the double object of rendering still more valuable our vast possessions on the Pacific, and placing within our grasp the commerce with Asia—a dazzling prize with maritime nations for more than twenty centuries.

St. Louis, in Missouri, and other points still further north, have been designated as most suitable for the commencement of the proposed work. The citizens of Arkansas, at a recent public meeting, at their Capital, in which the leading men of the State participated, considering the national character of the work, with entire unanimity suggested the point opposite Memphis as being most nearly central to the whole Union; below most of the great tributaries of the Mississippi; below the frost bound regions of the North, and in a direct line of connection with another grand scheme of improvement,—the Atlantic and Mississippi Rail Road; and with the view of eliciting an expression of public sentiment on the subject, they have recommended that a convention be held at Memphis, on the fourth day of July next.

Our citizens, in public meeting, have promptly and cordially seconded the movement made in Arkansas; and, in pursuance of the objects of that meeting, the undersigned have been appointed a committee of correspondence.

In the discharge of our duty, we invoke your aid and influence in directing public sentiment towards the great design; and invite you to be present at the proposed convention.

We are respectfully,

John R. Thompson, Esq.

We shall look with great interest to the result of the deliberations of this Convention, fully persuaded, as we are, that Memphis is in all respects the most desirable spot for the eastern terminus of the great American railway to California. That this railway will be constructed speedily we consider as a foregone conclusion. And in this view of the matter we desire most respectfully to make a suggestion to the Convention itself.

In Lieut. Maury's letter to the Hon. T. Butler King, published in this magazine in April, 1848, the striking fact was stated for the first time, that a straight line let fall on a common terrestrial globe from Panama to Changhai in China, so far from passing directly across the Pacific, would pass through the Gulf of Mexico and the State of Louisiana towards Oregon and cross the ocean many thousand miles to the north of the Sandwich Islands. This fact, so easy of ascertainment to all and yet so little known until stated by Lieut. Maury, excited great surprise everywhere. Recurring to this great Commercial Circle, Lieut. Maury now shows that when the line from Memphis to California and the improvement of the Isthmus shall have been completed, the United States will be in the direct route of travel from the South American States on the Pacific to China. We respectfully suggest therefore to the Memphis Convention some prompt action on the connection across the Isthmus, with a view to securing the travel across the American continent, making it indeed the Highway of nations. This object is of course subordinate in point of time to the great railway across the country to our California possessions, but as the design of the Convention is rather to fix the terminus of a road already resolved on, than to consider upon the propriety of the road itself, we should be pleased to see it take steps towards the construction of the Isthmus line as a work of the highest importance and as calculated in an eminent degree, to augment the usefulness of the Continental scheme.—[Ed. Mess.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 7th, 1849.

Sir,—Your letter of the 5th inst. has been received. You ask my opinion as to the comparative advantages of a rail road across Tehuantepec and Darien to the Pacific, and desire my views as to the effect of such a communication upon commerce and navigation.

Whatever of information this office affords concerning the great interests of Navigation is at the public service.

Your letter opens before me the whole subject of a communication with the Pacific. It is a most important one, and as wide as important. Though my time is very fully occupied with other duties of the office, I should be glad to devote several days exclusively to the subject. But you call for a speedy reply. Therefore I must content myself with giving such information only as I happen to have at hand. I could wish it were better worth the having.

An impression has been made upon the public mind that the depth of water on the bar across the mouth of the Coatzacoalcos river, which empties from the Isthmus of Tehuantepec into the Gulf of Mexico, is 20 feet or more. Two charts have been published recently by this office of the mouth and bar of that river from surveys made by order of Commodore Perry in 1847 and 1848. These surveys agree in giving it a depth of not more than 12½ feet.

With regard to the draft of water here, Commodore Perry writes me under date of January 25th, 1849—"I have crossed the bar several times myself sounding both ways, and have had three several surveys made, and the average depth in the channel has not exceeded 12½ feet."

This bar is open to the north; and of course the northers, which are so terrible in the Gulf, have their full sweep at it. The swell which they raise, assumes, when it arrives off the bar, the shape of rollers, which break across it in such a manner as to render it impracticable for any vessel, however light her draft, to go in or to come out.

During the season of the northers, the approaches to the mouth of the Coatzacoalcos and all that part of the Mexican coast are very dangerous, for if a vessel be caught there, you will see by examining the coast line which is in the shape of a horse shoe opening to the north, that they would have a lee shore, and be embayed without any harbor or port of refuge to which they could flee for shelter. From these causes alone, independent of the difficulties on the Pacific side, the communication between the sea and a rail road or canal across Tehuantepec would be attended with difficulty and danger. It would moreover be liable to frequent and annoying interruptions from time to time during four or five months of the year when the northerly winds prevail.

These winds sometimes blow a week or more without ceasing, during which time the waves of the sea are so heavy as to make it impossible for any vessel to cross the bar. The Mississippi steamer, during the Mexican war was caught off that coast in a northerly. She was at anchor on the outside, and yet the sea ran so high as to cause material damage to that leviathan of a ship. The tops of her wheel-houses are some 25 or 30 feet above the water line, yet such was the force of the waves that they swept away from the tops of them her boats which had been stowed up there for safety. The ship herself was also damaged.

On the Pacific side; this Isthmus is washed by what is called the Gulf of Tehuantepec. The shores of this Gulf embrace a coast line of some 300 miles in extent; about 250 miles of which, including the proposed Pacific terminus of the communication across, resembles in its geological features the coast line of our Southern Atlantic States. Like them it has a chain of long narrow islands or promontories, now joining the main land and again separating from it by sounds or sheets of water as Pamlico, Albemarle and the like. There are frequent inlets between the links in this chain, but all of them have the word "Bar" as a prefix or affix to their names.

The "Boca Barra," literally "the mouth Bar," connects the lagoons into which the Chicapa empties with the Pacific, and this is the proposed terminus, on that side, for the Tehuantepec route.

I have now before me a chart of the west coast of Central America, published by the English Admiralty with corrections up to 1843. By this it appears that from a point nearly opposite to the city of Guatamala to another near that of Tehuantepec, say 250 miles, there are twenty-odd inlets and breaks in this chain of islands, and there is only one among them whose name on the map is without the word "Bar" attached to it.

There are also on this chart the surveys of nine ports or roadsteads in and about the Gulf of Tehuantepec from the surveys of Captain Sir Edward Belcher, R. N., in 1838, and others. That officer surveyed the open roadstead of Ventosa within 20 miles of Boca Barra, and other places in the vicinity, but I cannot find that the Boca Barra is by him, or on any chart, or by any other nautical work of authority among navigators, once mentioned or alluded to in any manner whatever as a place into which vessels may enter. I have consulted all the English and French Admiralty charts on the subject, and from all I can learn I am forced to the conclusion that the depth of water at the Boca Barra does not exceed six or eight feet, if there be that much.

One of the first steps therefore in the opening of a way across this Isthmus for passing the commerce from one ocean to another would be the construction of a harbor on each side. The difficulties in the way of this I consider insurmountable unless with the expenditure of immense sums.

The Delaware breakwater, though constructed when a sailor would say, "the water is as smooth as a mill-pond," and where there are none of those ocean waves and heavy rollers that came from the sea to interrupt the work, cost an immense sum. But such a work as the Delaware Breakwater, as stout as it is, is not at all calculated to withstand the heavy seas that come across the broad Pacific ocean gathering magnitude and strength as they come.

In order rightly to appreciate the practical difficulties of making harbors on the sea coast where nature has refused to form them, or has shut them up, consider the difficulties of forming harbors on the northern lakes where there are none; consider how the commerce of North Carolina has been broken up by the closing of the inlets on that coast. Sir Francis Drake, you recollect, passed with his fleet into Roanoke Inlet, which has barely water enough now to float a skiff. Plans have been proposed for reopening it; but the attempt has yet to be made. The Eddy Stone light house is a work exposed to the full force of the sea; that work, though its cost was so enormous, is held up by all nations as one of the greatest monuments that the world affords as to the powers and skill of the engineer over the waves of the sea—and yet that work is a work of pigmies in comparison with what is required to open a harbor in the Gulf of Tehuantepec.

Eddy Stone is built on a rock—Tehuantepec rests on the sand.

Numerous streams empty into the Gulf of Tehuantepec, and as is the case on our Atlantic coast wherever such streams empty directly into the ocean, bars, sand spits and islands are the consequence. The sediment that is brought down the Mississippi, the Roanoke, &c., is met at the mouth by an opposing current from the tide and swell of the sea. Here it is arrested in its course and held in still water for a moment, when the process of deposition immediately commences. It is this deposition which, in the course of time, forms these bars, &c. The indications are conclusive, that the same geological or drift agencies which formed the chain of islands along the coast of Carolina and Georgia are now at work in the Gulf of Tehuantepec.*

* See a valuable paper on the subject of drift, formation of shoals and the like by Lieut. Chas. Davis, U. S. N., read before the society of the American Association. Philadelphia, 1848.

These in my mind are the principal of the physical difficulties in the way of a communication across Tehuantepec—and until some practical plan be suggested for removing or overcoming them, it is useless to look further, for there is no doubt that with money enough the continent may be cut in twain here both by Rail Road and Ship Canal.

But the great difficulty does not consist in cutting the continent in two: it consists in gaining access from the sea to and from the high-way across. At Darien there is safe anchorage with sufficient water on both sides. On this side we have "Navy Bay," or by the old Spanish name, the Bay for 74s; also Puerto Bello, or the "beautiful harbor." On the other, there is the safe roadstead of Panama. The distance across in a direct line from the head of Navy, or "Limon Bay" to Panama is rather less than 45 miles, which is about one-third the distance across Tehuantepec. The distance there in a direct line from sea to sea being 139 miles.

From New York and the Atlantic ports, Navy Bay is a little further in point of distance—say 100 miles—than the mouth of the Coatzacoalcos, and it is proportionably further in time also.

But suppose, for the sake of running out the parallel, that the harbors of Tehuantepec were as good as those of Darien; that we had the right of way across Tehuantepec as well as Darien; and that it were left to the government and people of the United States to select either one of the two routes for a commercial highway, which one of the two would be most conducive of the general interests—taking general interest to mean the welfare of the whole country?

This is the point which I now prefer to consider. But in the consideration and discussion of it, I wish it to be borne in mind that I do not for a moment lose sight of a rail road through our own country, from the Mississippi valley to the Pacific ocean. This is a work which the public will have sooner or later, and any other route across the country I hold subordinate to this. Therefore, in running the parallel between Tehuantepec and Darien, I shall take it for granted that the Mississippi and California rail road will be in process of construction at no very distant day. It must be built. I take it therefore as a postulate.

Bearing this postulate and these facts in mind, the question may be asked, what, since we are to have a rail road through our own country, do we want with a portage across the neck of land between the Oceans? Ans.—We want it for the transportation of those articles of merchandise which cannot pay freight over a rail road 1500 miles long, but which would find it cheaper to pay the portage across the Isthmus than to incur the freight and time of a passage around Cape Horn. This merchandise would consist of the products of the whale fishery in the Pacific, which in bone and oil, amount to five millions and a half of dollars per annum. It would consist of cotton and woolen goods and the coarser manufactures of all descriptions for which the merchant can find markets in any of the ports of Pacific America. It would consist also of butter and cheese, rice, bread, and such like perishable articles for the Pacific squadron, that I have seen condemned and thrown into the sea at Callao and Valparaiso, by the ship load, owing to the damages incurred in the long and hoisterous voyage around Cape Horn. These are some of the principal articles only, for if I were to go into details I might make out a list of them as long as the manifest on board some of the ships for California, which we are told are many fathoms long.

Navy Bay and Coatzacoalcos are about the same distance in point of time from the Atlantic States. But to the Gulf States, to California and Oregon, Tehuantepec is much nearer. This fact, if it were the only one upon which the choice of routes hinges, would be decisive. But unfortunately Tehuantepec affords no harbors and no right of way; and if it did, there are other points upon which a right decision of the question would turn.

Communication is wanted, I apprehend, to other markets besides those of California. There are the South American Republics which border on the Pacific with their eight millions of people, all of whom want things that we have to sell. Panama is to them nearer by many days sail under canvass than Tehuantepec.

A sailing vessel from New Orleans might deliver her cargo at Navy Bay and return with another before one could be sent under canvass via. Tehuantepec to Panama, so uncertain are the winds in the Pacific side between Tehuantepec and Panama.

Panama is so nearly in a straight line from the coasts of Chili, Peru and Ecuador to New Orleans that the detour is not more than 100 miles.

The freight across the Tehuantepec road would be nearly treble, for the distance across is three times as great as it is over that of Panama.

Five cents per ton per mile is about the average charge for freight over the rail roads in the United States; competition has brought it down perhaps within this estimate. But I suppose neither a rail road across Tehuantepec or Darien could afford transportation at any such rates. Perhaps ten cents would be nearer than five to the mark; let us therefore take ten cents per ton per mile as the average rate of freight to be exacted of the merchandise over these two routes. The Tehuantepec road, supposing both to be run on a strait line, is 95 miles the longer, and a ton of American merchandise to pass this road would have to pay $9 50 per ton more than the Panama road would exact of it. A tax of $9 50 per ton upon American commerce for ever for the mere advantage of shortening temporarily the time for passengers bound hence to California, for one week, would, it appears to me, be paying too dearly for a little time. For when the rail road is built across from the Mississippi, no one from South America bound to California will think of going by the way of Tehuantepec. A tribute forever to Mexico of $9 50 per ton on commerce, the extent of which cannot be foreseen, for the privilege of saving seven days for seven years or there away in the time to and from California! Why, sir, this is a tax far more onerous and odious than the famous Chinese "Cumshaw" which had from time immemorial been exacted of all "Barbarian" ships, and the abrogation of which was hailed with so much delight on both sides of the Atlantic. Its abrogation is a prominent article of the China treaties both with the States of Europe and America; and it, with the free ports, is considered as the chief good which has resulted from the wicked war of England upon China.

At this rate of 10 cents, a ship carrying 1,000 tons of merchandise would have to pay $9,500 more to get her cargo across Tehuantepec than she would to get it across Panama. Few indeed are the cargoes that can pay such a "Cumshaw" as this.

The charge at 10 cents the ton a mile would be, via. Panama, 44 miles—$4 40; via. Tehuantepec, 139 miles—$13 90—difference $9,500. The site of Panama is quite as convenient to the market ways over the Pacific as Tehuantepec. But little is due therefore to any advantages, to be gained by the one over the other on account of a more central terminus on the Pacific side.

Let us now see whether such merchandise as is usually sent around Cape Horn to the South American markets, could afford to pay the expense of portage over either of these two routes across the continent.

The space allotted on board ship to a ton of merchandise is 40 feet. Estimating the average rate of freight on cotton to Europe at one cent the pound, and 1,350 pounds as occupying the space of a ton, and the average distance across the Atlantic, from the cotton ports at 3,500 sea miles, we have 3.86 mills as the average rate of freight of cotton per ton per sea mile under canvass. But cotton pays the freight both ways, for the ships which take it generally come empty. From this estimate and explanation we get one mill and ninety-eight hundredths of a mill (1.98) as the average rate per ton per sea mile for the transportation of merchandise across the ocean under canvass.

The average distance which a vessel under canvass has to accomplish, from New York to Lima, may be taken in round numbers at 13,000 miles (sea,) which, at 1.98 mill per ton per mile gives as the average rate of freight thence $25 74.

To satisfy you as to the degree of confidence due this estimate, I may remark that since making it out I have consulted a gentleman who has been engaged for many years in the Lima trade. He informs me that until Guano was introduced as an article of commerce, the usual rate of freight from New York to Lima was between $25 and $30 per ton.

Guano pays heavy freight. Vessels that go there are now certain of a return cargo, and the outward rates at present rule at $15 the ton, equal to 1.15 mill per ton, per sea mile.

This rate I adopt for the following comparative estimates as to the cost of the transportation of a ton of merchandise from New York via Cape Horn, Tehuantepec and Panama. The distance to be accomplished under canvass is stated at 4,300 miles via Tehuantepec and 3,700 via Panama.

| | Via Cape Horn. | Tehuantepec. | Panama. |
|---------------------|----------------|--------------|---------|
| Cost by Sea, | $15 00 | 4 94 | 4 25 |
| Rail Road, | | 13 90* | 4 40 |
| Total sea and land, | $15 00 | 18 84 | 8 65 |

Now taking one kind of merchandise with another we may safely assume the average value of it to be $2 50 per ton.

The passage around Cape Horn is three months longer than it is across the Isthmus, and it is therefore proper to charge the Cape Horn route with the interest on $250 for three months, which at six per cent is $3 75—making the whole cost around Cape Horn $18 75 or 9 cents less than by Tehuantepec, and $10 20, more than one hundred per cent greater than by Panama. From this statement it appears that we may go and come with our merchandise via Panama with less freight than we can now go, outward bound alone, via Cape Horn.

The average length of a voyage under can-

* $13 90. In consequence of the greater distance across Tehuantepec, a rail road there for obvious reasons could afford to charge a smaller rate of freight per ton per mile, than a shorter road. Suppose 20 per cent less. This would make the freight over the Tehuantepec road to be $11 12, and including the sea voyage $16 06, or nearly double the Panama route. Deduct $2 78 from the Tehuantepec estimates and you will observe that Panama has greatly the advantage as to cost, to every point mentioned in the estimate.

vass from New York to San Francisco is, via Tehuantepec 4,800 miles, via Panama 6,300.

Comparative statements of the freight of a ton of merchandise at 10 cents per ton per rail road, and 1.15 mill per ton under sail.

| | Via Tehuantepec. | Via Panama. |
|--------------|-------------------------|--------------------|
| By Sea | $5 52 | $7 25 |
| " Rail Road, | $13 90 | $4 40 |
| | $19 42 | $11 65 |

Difference in favor of Panama $7 71.

Statement of the freight by each route from New Orleans to San Francisco, the sailing distance being, via Tehuantepec 3,700 miles and via Panama 5,700.

| | Via Tehuantepec. | Via Panama. |
|--------------|-------------------------|--------------------|
| By Sea, | $4 25 | $6 55 |
| " Rail Road, | $13 90 | $4 40 |
| | $18 15 | $10 95 |

Difference in favor of Panams $7 20.

With the man of business, time and money are correlative terms, for he counts time as money and reckons money according to time.

These figures are all, except the 10 cents per ton for rail road freight, drawn from actual statistics. But treat them as you will, you must allow nearly three times as much freight for the Tehuantepec as for the Panama route, perhaps in consideration of having to load and unload, at the Isthmus, a larger rate of freight should be charged by sea under canvass than around Cape Horn. But that rate may be trebled and still give the advantage to Panama over either Cape Horn or Tehuantepec.

The freight on goods per ocean steamers is double that by sailing vessels. It is only the more costly articles of merchandise and those of a particular kind that go by steamers. These consist of new styles and patterns of the finest description of dry goods. The steamer U. States has just arrived with such a cargo, it consists of silks, laces and caps, ribbons and bonnets—fibs and furbelows—making up the spring fashions for the whole country.

But sea steamers, like rail roads depend greatly upon passengers for their profits.

Calculating by weight, 7 passengers, with an average allowance for baggage of 150 pounds each may be stated as a ton weight. In the English steamers to New York and Boston, a ton of passengers pays about $1,200, whereas a ton of merchandise pays only about $24. The former require no handling by stevedores, coopers or draymen; no ware-house when they arrive in port for storage, &c. They unload and load themselves.

The experience of the world with regard to ocean steam navigation, both authorizes and justifies the conclusion, that whatever be the revolution which a rail road across the Isthmus would create in the course of trade, as at present conducted, sailing and not steam vessels would continue to fetch and carry the bulk of the merchandise passing across the Isthmus.

There is a line of steamers on the route from Panama to Valparaiso, Law's line from New York, &c., and Aspinwall's from California, connect with this line at the Isthmus of Panama, and the merchandise to be transported by these lines, will be the fashions for the western American markets, and the costly articles corresponding to those which are brought from Europe by the English steamers for the "Modistas" there.

The population of the South American States which border on the Pacific, may be stated in round numbers at 8 millions of people; we have seen the advantages of the Panama route for communicating with them, and how these people, with their markets and their wants, would be brought two or three months nearer to us than they are now. It is difficult rightly to estimate the national advantages of lifting up eight millions of people and setting them down as it were within 30 or 40 days of our markets, instead of having them removed at three or four times that distance, as they heretofore have been. We see the like in our own country, only on a smaller scale, when, by rail roads, canals or other internal improvements, three or four hundred thousand people who before were days off, are brought within a few hours of our commercial marts and great market towns.

The results in such cases have invariably defied calculation—producing changes and benefits to a degree and extent that were neither anticipated or imagined. Under such changes of facilities to markets we have cities springing up as if by enchantment. Then what may we not expect when we move millions instead of thousands with the commercial lever.

The history of the world does not afford strictly a parallel case.

Venice you know was a flourishing city through the trade of caravans with the East. But the passage around the Cape of Good Hope destroyed her prosperity, carried her wealth away and placed it within the gates of other cities. A rail road to Panama, will be to the passage around Cape Horn, what Vasco de Gama's discovery was to the caravans across the deserts of Arabia.

Communication and transportation will be cheaper and more frequent. The Panama link would bring the markets of South America as near to us as those of Europe were before the ocean steamers began to run; and for all the purposes of commerce the Panama rail road would place our Lake country as near to the South American ports as those of the Mediterranean now are to New York.

By the act passed two or three years ago, and known as Mr. Pratt's bill, merchandise intended for the Canadian markets, is allowed a free duty transit through the United States.

And what has been the effect? To supply nearly all Canada West with imports through New York instead of up the St. Lawrence. The importing of these goods benefits the city of New York, because it brings business there: it benefits the state also and the people, because it gives employment to men and vessels, and pays tolls for the use of wharves, canal, &c., &c.: and bringing goods it brought Canadian merchants to look after them, and who, being in New York, found inducements to buy, that they knew not of. In the language of a New York dealer, "those Canadians buy immensely."

Only two or three hundred thousand people are supplied in this way, yet both the Empire State and the commercial emporium of the United States feel, appreciate and value the effects of it.

What, therefore, shall it be when 8 millions of people are connected with New Orleans and the South by similar ties.

The Peruvian merchants, like the Mexicans coming to New Orleans, will there find offered to them, on suitable terms, all the purchases they desire to make. Like the Canadian in New York, the South American will close his bargains without going any farther. The immediate effect of this new state of things will be to give activity to the New Orleans markets: to cause the European houses in the South American and Mexican trade, to ship in the vessels coming for your cotton, whole cargoes to be deposited in the ware-houses of New Orleans and distributed thence via Panama among the markets of the Pacific.

The warehousing system, under proper regulations, would not fail greatly to promote the amount of commerce from England via New Orleans and the Cotton Ports, across Panama. At the end of three years, from the completion of the Panama rail road, I should expect to see regular lines of sailing packets plying to and from not only between that Isthmus and the ports of the United States, but also of South America.

Such a course of trade would not fail greatly to benefit the southern planter, for all the goods intended for the eight millions of South Americans would be brought over in the cotton ships, which now come empty and thus the South Americans, &c. would be made to divide with you the freight on all your cotton that goes to Europe.

I therefore urge this Panama rail road, not only as a great national measure, but also as a great southern measure. It is one which will again make Charleston the half-way-house to market, of the advantages of which position, she was deprived when Dr. Franklin let down his thermometer into the sea and discovered the Gulf Stream.

If you will stretch a string on a common terrestrial globe, from Panama to China, you will find that it passes not far from New Orleans: therefore when that rail road to the Pacific shall be built, New Orleans will be the thoroughfare of travel between South America, California and China. It will be several days nearer to California by this route than it will be up the Coast on the Pacific side.

In this view of the subject I regard the Panama route an important link in that system which is to connect the Mississippi Valley with the Pacific Ocean and make the United States the thoroughfare of travel between the East and West Indies, South America and Asia, Europe and China.

The Tehuantepec route would not bring the travel to and from South America through New Orleans or the United States—for a steamer bound from Panama to San Francisco could land her passengers in California sooner than they could get there, even if the Tehuantepec harbors were good, by landing at Boca Barra, crossing the Isthmus, steaming up the Mississippi and taking the rail road thence to the Pacific. After leaving Panama for California, by steamer, it would be nearly two days out of the way to touch at Tehuantepec.

I regard the Panama rail road, therefore, as a most important link to lengthen out and make complete the rail road from the Mississippi valley to the Pacific: it is so nearly on the great circle route, or an air line from Cape Blanco, the western promontory of South America to New Orleans, that the difference, though the length of that line is nearly 4000 miles, does not amount to 100 miles.

The Panama link instead of retarding the road across our own country would hasten it. The prosperity and enterprise given to the country, by the Erie Canal produced the Erie rail road and has served greatly to stimulate the settlement of the Lake States.

It is obvious that a rail road across Panama would also greatly advance the settlement of California; stimulate the enterprise and promote wealth there. And is it in the nature of the people of this country to stop half way? The passage to California when the Panama Rail Road shall be completed, will still be 25 or 30 days with three or four prices. A rail road from the Mississippi Valley across to California will bring San Francisco within 2 or 3 instead of 25 or 30 days—as across Panama it must be.

To shorten the passage between New York and Boston an hour or two, the Long Island rail road was built alongside of the Long Island Sound at a cost almost equal to that of a rail road to Panama. Seeing, therefore, that the business men of this country are ready to set up millions against the saving of an hour in time day after day, what will they not do when days and weeks are thrown into the scale? Complete the Panama link and extend the line from the Mississippi river to California and the time is not distant when that Valley will teem with a population enjoying the blessings of freedom, wealth and prosperity to an extent that has never been witnessed by the eye of man.

The effect of a rail road communication with Panama, would, therefore, in my opinion, be to unite the two oceans by ship canal. With the rail road, the world would see the amount of commerce, seeking portage here. The rail road would soon be found insufficient to transport it and a ship canal would be the result. Thus I regard the proposed rail road, somewhat in the light of a demonstration which the world requires first to be made, in order to give practical proof as to the necessity and benefits of a ship canal.

Respectfully, &c.

M. F. MAURY.

HON. S. BORLAND,
U. S. Senate Chamber.

A POEM ON THE ISTHMUS LINE.

A pretty, little, gilt-edged book of poems lies before us, in which the Isthmus Connection is discussed in verse. The book was printed, we believe, for private circulation, but we propose to give the stanzas to our readers as a specimen of high lyric fervor, and as an appropriate companion to Lieut. Maury's letter.

The reader will naturally ask, "who is the poet?" We answer, the distinguished Professor Francis Lieber, the friend of Niebuhr, the editor of the Encyclopedia Americana, the recently conspicuous figure on the floor of the German Parliament, and now acting President of the College of South Carolina.—Ed. Mess.

THE SHIP CANAL

FROM THE ATLANTIC TO THE PACIFIC.

An Ode to the American People and their Congress, on reading the Message of the United States President in December, 1847.

Rend America asunder
And unite the Binding Sea
That emboldens Man and tempers—
Make the ocean free.

Break the bolt which bars the passage,
That our River richly pours
Western wealth to western nations;
Let that sea be ours—

Ours by all the hardy whalers,
By the pointing Oregon,
By the west impelled and working Unthralled Saxon son.

Long indeed they have been wooing,
The Pacific and his bride;
Now 'tis time for holy wedding—
Join them by the tide.

Have the snowy surfs not struggled
Many centuries in vain,
That their lips might seal the union?
Lock then Main to Main.

When the mighty God of nature
Made his favored continent,
He allowed it yet unsevered,
That a race be sent,

Able, mindful of his purpose,
Prone to people, to subdue,
And to bind the lands with iron,
Or to force them through.

What the prophet-navigator,
Seeking straits to his Catais,*
But began, now consummate it—
Make the strait and pass.

Blessed eyes, that shall behold it,
When the pointing boom shall veer,
Leading through the parted Andes,
While the nations cheer!

There at Suez, Europe's mattock
Cuts the briny road with skill,
And must Darien bid defiance
To the pilot still?

Do we breathe this breath of knowledge
Purely to enjoy its zest?
Shall the iron arm of science
Like a sluggard rest?

Up then, at it! earnest People!
Bravely wrought thy scorning blade,
But there's fresher fame in store yet,
Glory for the spade.

What we want is naught in envy,
But for all we pioneer;
Let the keels of every nation
Through the isthmus steer.

Must the globe be always girded
Ere we get to Bramah's priest?
Take the tissues of your Lowells
Westward to the East.

Ye, that vanquish pain and distance,
Ye, enmeshing Time with wire,

* Catais or Cathay and Zipango were the names given to the eastern part of Asia, toward which the greatest of navigators directed his westerly voyage, as Marco Polo had reached it by an eastward journey. Columbus having found that a continent debarred him from continuing his westward course, persevered in searching for straits which would allow him a passage to his wished-for Catais.

Court ye patiently for ever
You astarotic ire!

Shall the mariner for ever
Double the impeding capes,
While his longsome and retracing
Needless course he shapes?

What was daring for our fathers,
To defy those billows fierce,
Is but tame for their descendants;
We are bid to pierce.

We that fight with printing armies,
Settle sons on forlorn track
As the Romans flung their eagles,
But to win them back;

Who, undoubting, worship boldness,
And, if baffled, bolder rise,
Should we lag when Grandeur beckons
To this good emprise?

Let the vastness not appal us;
Greatness is thy destiny;
Let the doubters not recall us;
Venture suits the free.

Like a seer, I see her throning,
Winland,* strong in freedom's health,
Warding peace on both the waters,
Widest Commonwealth—

Crowned with wreaths that still grow greener,
Guerdoa for untiring pain,
For the wise, the stout and steadfast:
Read the land in twain!

Cleave America asunder,
This is worthy work for thee;
Hark! The seas roll up imploring—
"Make the ocean free."

* May I not for once bestow upon our nameless country this good and plain Saxon name, which was given to it by its first and Teutonic discoverers, long before Columbus and Vesputius? The poet, and all who desire to speak with fervor and brevity, stand in need of a name more comprehensive and concise than that which conveys the idea of a mere political relation. Above all, they stand in need of a name for the country, and not only of an official designation, however honorable or historical—a name around which cluster associations of the heart as well as of political and international transactions. When the heroic Nelson felt that he must animate his fleet to the highest pitch of battle-work, his signals did not proclaim "The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or, His Majesty King George the Third, expects every man to do his duty," but the flag-ship signalled: "England this day expects every man to do his duty;" and in that brief dissyllable, England, centered every thing that could stir the men and swell the breasts of officers—honor, wives, sweethearts, parliament, newspapers, fields, farms, fox-hunting, peerage, habeas corpus, brown stout, pudding, Christmas merriment, and all. Columbia, which has become in some sort the poetic name for the United States, is not sufficiently specific; and Alleghania, which has been proposed, has, besides its unwelcome similarity with alligator, a character of newness without freshness, like whitewashed walls or a shining hat. It sounds made, and as if made, too, for a school geography; yet, why should we take even a book-name from that small and very partial ridge of hillocks? We have gone too far beyond it. The name of Winland, on the contrary, is old, idiomatic, simple, and requires only to be resumed; it would adapt itself to all the needed grammatical formations, (or as the late Mr. Duponceau would feely have said, is malleable;) it is brief, and seems every way sound.

FROM OUR PARIS CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS, March 20th, 1845.

One night last week a pull at the bell of my outer door startled me from profound slumber.

Waiting a moment that another pull might assure me it was no dream, the next moment found me en robe de chambre hastily seized, groping my way to within speaking distance of my unseasonable visitor.

With hand upon the key, but before turning the bolt, I demanded—

"Who's there?"

"Are you M. M——?" replied a voice from the other side, without answering my question.

"Yes."

"It is I!" replied my interlocutor, without farther hesitation, now that he was assured of my identity—"It is I, André, from the barrière de Fontainebleau."

"Ah! bien! come in," and I opened the door.

"They have commenced preparations at the Rond Point," continued André. "The workmen arrived about two hours ago! I have been talking with one of them. He says it will be all over by six o'clock!"

"What o'clock is it now?"

"Almost three. Make haste, Monsieur, you have not much time to spare: the barrière de Fontainebleau is full three miles off."

"I know it is. Here, let me conduct you to a seat: then I'll dress, and be with you in a very few minutes."

I had not yet seen my visitor, having hastened to the door in answer to his summons before lighting a candle: and it was impossible to discern even the outline of a human form amid the complete obscurity in which the apartment was involved. But I had recognized him to be a man of the lower orders whom I had seen once before, some four or five weeks ago and whom I expected to see once again upon a certain occasion which we knew would soon occur; but knew not exactly when.

The occasion had now arrived.

Taking hold of his blouse—a sort of blue overshirt almost universally worn by men of his class, I conducted him to a seat.

My toilet was quickly made and we descended into the street. The night was dark. It was not raining, but low thick clouds brooded heavily over the city, so that not a star was visible. All was still. The stillness of a mighty city is more impressive perhaps than that of the forest. Not a sound was heard but the rumbling of a heavy carriage over the Place de la Concorde upon the other side of the Seine. From the midst of the Place du Palais Bourbon, upon which we entered upon leaving my door, and dimly seen by the rare gas lights which surround the square, rose like a giant spectre, the colossal plaster figure of Liberty; and farther on gleamed the bayonet of the sentinel on duty before the gate of the Palace of the National Assembly. All was still. But did all sleep in this vast and populous city? Care and pain and guilt abound in Paris: and to them the hours of the night and those of the day are alike—sleepless! Did the prisoners of Vanvres alike sleep!

As we crossed the Place to the hack-stand on the opposite side, the large clock over the arched gate-way above the palace struck three. I shall never forget the awe which amounted almost to shuddering, with which its solemn tones fell upon my ear. Perhaps the consciousness of the nature of our errand in the deserted streets of Paris at so unusual an hour contributed to this effect.

We found the hack-stand vacant. The sentinel told us that the last coach had left an hour before.

"There's no hope for it," said André; "you must go afoot."

"En route!" said I. "Lead the way: I'll follow you;" and we struck at a round pace up the rue St. Dominique to the residence of a friend, for whom I had promised to call. To reach the rend point at the barrière de Fontainebleau, whither we were going, we had to traverse nearly the whole of the city, and thread a quarter whose reputation is as little enviable as that of any other of Paris. It abounds in narrow, dark streets; and teems with the lowest and most turbulent of the laboring classes. It was one of the principal seats of the insurrection of June, and the last to yield, before the celebrated faubourg St. Antoine. Misery and guilt find here their impenetrable hiding places; and crime in all its grades is of almost daily occurrence. André was a denizen of the quartier St. Marcel, and was the first to allude to its evil reputation, frankly admitting that it was quite deserved. André's face, it now occurred to me, was not the most prepossessing that might be seen, and I will not assert that it was with unmixed satisfaction that I regarded the heavy bludgeon which he bore in his hand and which he took, he said, at his wife's instance, upon leaving home two hours before. It was a very natural association of ideas by which I now thought of a loaded pistol I had left hanging over my mantle-piece, and of a stout cane behind the door. I had not been so provident as André; and it was not because I did not know the way as well as he that I told him to take the lead and I would follow. I observed that in all the obscure and narrow streets André kept the middle of the street. It is from the corners and dark recesses formed by the gate-ways that the evil-disposed dart suddenly upon the passer-by and consummate their purpose of robbery or murder. I eschewed the side-walks with equal care—following hard upon André's heels. It was not, I confess, without excitement and a certain feeling of insecurity that I found myself afoot, east of rue St. Jacques, threading at this dead hour of the night the ill-famed Quarter of St. Michael. All was quiet here as in the faubourg St. Germain which I had just left. A few patroles, a half-dozen dimly seen figures flitting hastily by, some country carts proceeding to market, and two immense vehicles performing their nightly round to receive the contents of the sewers, were the only signs of life that we met with on the way. At last we gained the broad and gloomy boulevard of St. Jacques. The city walls reared their dark mass on our right. We had proceeded beneath the deep gloom of the trees, unbroken by gas-light or lamp, for ten minutes, when André, who had constantly kept about five steps in advance of us, suddenly turned and said—

"La voila! Messieurs, nous sommes arrivés."

We were now at the barrière de Fontainebleau. Before us on our right, and on a line with the city walls were discerned the dusky outline of two symmetrical buildings. They were connected by a strong and high iron railing. In the centre of which was one of the gates of the city. That was the barrière, called of Fontainebleau, or of Italy, because from it commenced the road leading from Paris to those places. We had just entered upon an open circular space in front of the gate, within the walls, about one hundred yards in diameter. This was the rend point; upon which were still making the preparations, of the commencement of which André had come to notify me.

In the centre of the rend point had been reared a singular structure, about which, by the light of numerous torches, the forms of ten or twelve men were seen busily moving. A large body of troops were already upon the ground and were now forming in triple lines around the structure at the distance of eighteen or twenty feet. We approached. The arrangements were nearly complete. In fifteen minutes more the workmen had retired.

First there was a platform ten feet square, at an elevation of five feet.

From the centre of the platform rose two upright posts fifteen feet high and two feet apart. They were connected at the top by a cross-piece. Lower down within three or four feet of the platform was another connecting cross-piece formed by a piece of plank a foot in width, in the lower part of which was scooped out a semi-circle about six inches in diameter. Still lower down near the floor of the platform was another cross-piece with a similar semi-circle scooped in the upper part of it. And it was seen that if these two pieces were made to approach they would form a whole with a circular aperture six inches in diameter cut in the centre. A flight of eight or ten steps led from the pavement to the platform. And it was so placed that one mounting the steps looked out of the gate of the city upon a large white house that rose on the right a short distance beyond the gate. Upon the platform between the steps and the two upright posts, appeared a perpendicular, wide plank about as high as a man's shoulders, but it seemed to move upon a pivot about two feet from the floor, so that the perpendicular plank could be made, at will, to assume a horizontal position at right angles to the upright posts.

Steps, platform, cross-pieces, plank, all the wood-work that met the eye, was painted a dull red. It was a gloomy looking thing seen by the light of the lamps which the workmen had left beneath and upon the platform. Between the two upright posts, about two feet below the top cross-piece, appeared a heavy mass that seemed to be of lead or iron. It was fixed now: but there were grooves cut in the inner side of the uprights in which it was evident the heavy mass could be made to move up and down along their whole length. The lower part of this mass seemed armed with bright sharp steel inserted so as to present an oblique lower edge. It gleamed in the light of the lamps below like the sharpened edge of a huge broad-axe.

It was the Guillotine which I saw before me!

In that large white house, seen from the platform on mounting the steps, just beyond the gate, were foully murdered, on Sunday, 27th of June, during the insurrection, Gen. Brea and his aide-camp, Capt. Mangin. The murderers were tried by a court-martial and five of them were condemned to death. Three of the condemned have had their sentence commuted into labor at the hulks for life. But two of them, Dair and Lahr, are to be executed this morning. It was supposed, as they had been tried by a court-martial, that the criminals would be shot. They themselves earnestly desired it. But death for political offences having been abolished by the Constitution, Government was unwilling to sanction any thing that would seem to establish a distinction between these criminals and ordinary assassins. The army too protested against the application of the more honorable military mode of execution to the murderers of Gen. Brea. They are to die therefore by the guillotine, and upon the spot where the crime was committed. The usual secrecy as to the time of execution was observed upon this occasion; but secrecy was impossible after 12 o'clock, when the workmen arrived and commenced the erection of the terrible machine. The news spread rapidly, through the adjacent quarters; and, from a mile around in all directions, the men en blouse and the women were flocking to the ronde point of the barrière de Fontainebleau. Arriving almost the first upon the ground, we chose a stand close to the triple line of soldiers forming the circle around the instrument of death. The day had not yet dawned, but the crowd was becoming thick around and behind us. Up came a squadron of mounted gendarmes!

"Farther back! Messieurs, farther back!"

And we were pushed twenty or thirty yards farther from the centre of the place. Day dawned. The mass of spectators was now thick upon the whole of such portions of the ronde point, as the armed force permitted them to occupy. An ordinary cart drove up. The ranks opened. It took position close along side the platform on the right; the horse facing the barrière. A small square wicker basket half filled with saw dust was placed at the foot of the two upright posts just beneath the two cross-pieces, in which the small semi-circles were scooped out. Another long basket, also half filled with saw dust, was placed on the platform near the wide plank that moved upon a pivot; so that when the plank should be made to assume a horizontal position, it and the long basket would be side by side. In the small square basket the head was to fall. The headless trunk was to be rolled from the wide plank into the long basket. The cart was to carry them off to the burying-ground. Two regiments of the line now came up to take position upon the place; and the commanding officer gave orders to clear the square! A second battalion of the mounted gendarmes trotted round, causing the place to be entirely evacuated by all who were not in uniform. The guillotine is now surrounded throughout the whole extent of the ronde point by a dense mass of soldiers. The spectators driven back, blocked up the entrance of all the streets opening upon the barrière, crowded the windows and roofs of the adjacent houses, and pressed close and heavy against the iron railing from without. Driven back with the crowd, we were congratulating ourselves upon having secured a favorable stand next the railing, when more troops and a regiment of lancers arrive by the outer boulevards!

"Farther back! Messieurs, farther back!" and with the crowd we were compelled to retreat yet twenty yards.

It was now broad day-light, and we were momentarily expecting the arrival of the sad procession. But the military arrangements were not yet complete. A regiment of artillery, with a battery of four pieces, matches lighted, came up from the banlieue and occupied the barrière and the head of the principal streets. Twenty-five thousand men were under arms upon this occasion at the rend point, and in the immediate neighborhood.

Parallel to the boulevards by which we had reached the barrière de Fontainebleau, and separated from it only by the city walls, is a broad road called the outer boulevard. It was by this outer boulevard that the prisoners were expected to arrive from the fort of Vauxes. All eyes are anxiously turned in that direction. It is a quarter past six! An ordinary one horse coach approaches. Way is made for it: it stops at the barrière. A man in ordinary citizen's dress steps out and proceeds directly to the guillotine. It is the chief executioner of the Seine. He mounts the scaffold and examines carefully the machine; and then descends. In five minutes after, a low murmur running through the crowd, and the clatter of horses' feet, announce that the end is approaching. They come up at a round trot! A company of lancers—a squadron of cuirassiers—two close, box-like, covered vehicles, containing the prisoners and their confessors—an ordinary carriage containing the assistant executioners—lancers—cuirassiers, composed the procession! The military stopped at the gate. The carriages passed slowly in, and moved on through the opening battalions to the steps at the foot of the scaffold. Another minute and the executioner is seen to mount the scaffold—Daix quickly follows attended by his priest. He stands close to the wide plank! His head is uncovered—his shoulders are bared—he is bound to the plank! There is a moment's pause. Daix is protesting with a firm and loud voice, that he dies innocent of the death of Gen. Brea, whom he wished to protect—that he dies for the people! The plank moves upon its pivot—his head is beneath the axe—one cross-piece descends—the other rises to meet it, and his neck is inclosed in the fatal circle. The executioner in citizen's dress raises his hand. Every eye is fixed upon the axe. It moves—it falls! The head drops into the little square basket—the trunk tumbles heavily into the long basket; and the bloody axe is seen slowly moving up the grooves to be ready for another fall! Lahr has already been placed upon the scaffold. His sinking form is bound to the plank. He declares in a weak voice to those around him that he dies a Christian; and with the names of Marie! and Jesus! upon his lips, bows his head to the stroke! The axe falls again—the baskets receive their double charge: they are tossed into the cart; and within five minutes from the arrival of the prisoners upon the place of execution by the outer boulevard, their headless bodies were being carted along the inner boulevard to the cemetery of Mount Parnasse!

The troops remained in position for half an hour, keeping back the crowd anxious to rush up and obtain a nearer view of the fatal machine. Assistants with sponges and buckets of water washed from the axe, and other parts, all traces of blood; and then numerous workmen commenced the labour of removal. Within an hour after performing so effectually its fatal functions, the machine itself, taken to pieces, and laden upon carts, was on the way to its usual place of deposit in the faubourg du Temple.

It was perhaps only a wise precaution on the part of government, to surround this execution with so imposing a military display. We don't know what attempts at émancipation and insurrection may have been prevented. There is a large party in France, and it has its representatives in the assembly itself, which is in the daily habit of expressing its sympathy with the insurgents of June, and speaking of them as political victims worthy of a better fate. These men would renew those frightful scenes of civil war, if the inattention of government should afford them the slightest hope of success. Upon the present occasion, however, not the slightest symptom of disorder was to be seen. Silence and decorum as perfect as would characterize any equally numerous assemblage in the United States prevailed throughout. The crowds seemed composed of about the same class of persons as flock to public executions with us. The proportion of females was perhaps greater here. A rather savage curiosity seemed here, as upon similar occasions, all over the world, to be the leading impulse of the spectators: and nothing, save the vast military apparatus which accompanied the execution, would have induced the stranger to ascribe to it any political significance.

PARIS, March 24, 1849.

When I last touched upon politics, France was on the eve of its first presidential election. My anticipations as to the anti-republican result were more than realized: and the march of events since has only tended to confirm me in the opinion, that republican forms will be abandoned after an essay of much shorter duration than that of fifty years ago. France is profoundly democratic, but not republican. An empire founded upon the popular will, and very slightly limited by a written constitution, is the form of government that best suits France of the nineteenth century. It is the only form of government that can be stable. It is the only one that is honestly praclicable. Constitutions have ever been a lie in France. The actual constitution is so. Devise an absolutely perfect system of republican government: suppose it to be administered, throughout all its departments, by men of the patriotism, purity, and good sense, of Washington himself: set it to work in France and it will not exist one year. Why? Because there are three distinct monarchical parties in France, which have never honestly accepted the republic: and only seemed to have done so for a moment. There is, besides, the socialist, terrorist, red republican party. Neither of these parties would frankly and sincerely submit to the will of France expressed at the ballot-box. Each is watching the moment to impose itself upon the nation by fraud or force. Each in itself forms but a small minority. Together they constitute the majority of France. The rest are indifferent, or honestly republican. But I ask, is republican government practicable under such circumstances? Is not government forced in self-defence to invoke the aid of arbitrary despotic procedures? But then it ceases to be republican. Fact is at hand to support what I say. Pass without question the various forms which have existed since the revolution, up to the election of M. Bonaparte:—if governments at all, they certainly were republican in name only. But M. Bonaparte was elected by virtue of a constitution, and it is pretended that he inaugurated in France regular republican government. Well, his first act after the appointment of his ministers, was an admitted violation of clear written law. He gave to Gen. Changarnier sole command of the whole military force of Paris, uniting in his person, contrary to law, the chief command of the National Guard, with an active command in the army. His ministers pretended to justify the measure (this was the honest Odillon Barrot) upon the plea, that circumstances made it necessary, and that it was only a temporary provision. The temporary measure is still maintained however. Again Art. 8, of the new constitution is in these words. Citizens have the right of association, of assembling peaceably and without arms, of petition, and of expressing their thoughts by means of the press or otherwise. The exercise of these rights is limited only by the rights and liberty of others, and by the public security."

In face of this provision of the constitution, the National Assembly three days ago voted the closing of clubs, at the request of ministers who stated government to be impossible, unless the stringent regulations, to which clubs were subjected by previous legislation, were converted into actual prohibition. This I believe, with the ministers, to be literally true. And what does it prove? Why, that a liberal constitution in France can only be maintained (pardon the paradox) by perpetual violations. This outrage, however, provoked a fearful parliamentary storm, and gave rise to the most revolutionary scene we have witnessed for several months. The indignant minority refused to vote upon the remaining articles of the proposed law, retired from the Assembly in a body, and in another hall consulted upon their subsequent course. Some were for withdrawing permanently from the Assembly. But the more moderate representing that this course would leave the Assembly without its quorum of 500, and would produce its immediate dissolution, to be followed almost certainly by coups d'Etat, insurrection and revolution in a monarchical sense, prevailed upon all the seceders to return to the Assembly, and upon the greater portion of them, to continue to vote: it being considered most expedient, upon this occasion, to content themselves with a solemn protest.

Government has just given, too, a death blow to the pestilent red republican cheap journalism to which I have alluded in former letters. A new police ordinance forbids, after the 1st of April, the sale in the streets of journals, prints and caricatures, except under such restrictions as amount to prohibition. This measure I admit to be necessary. But is it republican?

The Assembly passed last week the new electoral law, under which the future Legislative bodies in France are to come into existence. It might be wished that the great and wise republican principle, which keeps distinct and independent the Legislative, Judicial, and Executive functions had been more strictly observed; but the law is, upon the whole, a good sound republican document, which will, if honestly carried out, realize those reforms, the want of which was made the pretext of the revolution of February 1848. It gives, in imitation of the English law, cabinet ministers admission into the Legislature: as also several high judicial, administrative, and military officers. It gives, too, instead of the per diem allowance usual with us, a fixed salary of 9000 francs (about $1,800) to each member of the Legislature. This will make the pay of members amount to the annual sum of $1,350,000.

Speaking of salaries reminds me of another instance of political chicanery, and gross disregard of the constitution, of which honest Odillon Barrot has been guilty lately. This time he has not the excuse of necessity that knows no law. I must mention it as one of the most significant signs of the times. We think General Taylor pretty well paid for a republican President by the salary of $25,000 per annum. But the great French Republic must not play the niggard. She must pay her President magnificently: so the Constitution fixes his salary at 600,000 francs ($120,000) per annum. But though this sum was deemed sufficient by the Assembly to maintain the dignity of the republic, it was considered by the President himself quite too paltry—just half enough. Wasn't he the nephew of the Emperor, and did'nt he hope to become the actual Emperor one of these days? It might suffice for absolute necessities, but nothing more. So the obedient and ready minister was commissioned to procure for him another $120,000 per annum.

"But," said the honest M. Barrot, "the Constitution fixes your salary. How is it possible in despite of it to ask more for you?"

"Pooh! are you serious Monsieur Barrot? Come, come,—you are a lawyer of some note: exercise your professional ingenuity, and procure for me fifty thousand francs more a month. Upon my soul! I shall not be able to pay my washerwoman if you dont."

Thereupon M. Barrot introduced a bill appropriating to the use of the President, under the title of "Expenses of Representation," that is, for balls and entertainments to be given by him, and for supporting generally the dignity of his station, the additional sum of fifty thousand francs per month! The bill was passed! And thus the French republic which, for lack of money, has been forced to commit an injustice (equal to repudiation) with regard to thousands of needy depositors in the Savings Bank, has been able to vote to its President the princely income of $660 per day!

The elections will be held throughout France for members of the new Legislative Assembly on the 13th May. The new Assembly will meet, and the actual Assembly dissolve, on the 28th of the same month, after an uninterrupted session of twelve months and twenty four days.

What will be the political complexion of the new body?

I cannot doubt, that it will be much less republican than the Constituent Assembly, to which it will succeed. Few of the members of the mountain will be returned. The elections are now the engrossing occupation of the country. All parties are active. All have their central electoral committees, in Paris, for the purpose by correspondence with the provinces, of insuring efficiency by concert of action. Reaction has made rapid strides since the elections of December. All disguise is thrown off by the boldest Legitimist and Imperial committees. They loudly assert, that the republic was imposed upon France by a coup de main, skilfully applied by a contemptibly small minority; that the question, "Republic or Monarchy?" has never been put to the people; that the sanction of the people was not asked for the Constitution, because it was feared the anti-republican people would reject it: and the hope and belief is expressed, that a great majority of open monarchists will be returned. "Take from all your candidates," say the Legitimists, "the formal engagement to procure an appeal to the people upon the question, Republic or monarchy?"

"The barricades of July 1830 are no more justifiable than those of February 1848. The barricades of February 1848 are no more justifiable than those of June 1848. There is but one public law—one principle of eternal justice and sovereignty—it is Legitimate succession!" And then their organ, the Gazette de France, musters the Legitimist forces in France, by which it is made to appear, that they have an undisputed majority in ten departments, and as large a vote as any other one party in sixty other departments. For my part, I cannot believe that the Bourbons, so often driven from France by the people and reimposed by foreign bayonets, will ever be recalled by the free vote of the people.

Of the audacity and hopes of the Napoleonists, you may judge from the fact that one of their electoral committees, at the head of which is a man very assiduous in his attentions at the Presidential mansion, and well received there, if reports be true, has published a circular, and distributed it freely in the provinces, wherein it is urged upon the voters, to "require from candidates a declaration of devotion to the Napoleon family which alone can save France!" Another circular recommends the people "to hold on to universal suffrage, as the means of establishing an elective decennial empire which alone can save society!"

The Orleans party have no distinct avowed electoral committee: but the famous revision of the rue Poitiers, composed of reactionist representatives, at the head of which is M. Thiers, is pursuing the same wily equivocal course which it adopted for the elections of December. It does not avow its penchant for the younger branch, but in the composition of its electoral committee that penchant is so manifest, that several of the more decided Legitimist and Bonapartist members have withdrawn in disgust.

The republicans on their side are not idle. They will not succumb without a manful struggle at the polls: though they are openly accused of having, by a tour de main, saddled the Republic upon France. Though greatly in the minority, they will not I fear give up without another struggle in the street. They have been making during the last month most insidious and persevering efforts, to gain the army over to the cause of the democratic and social republic. Their efforts have not been without a certain success. Many officers and soldiers have been subjected to discipline, for manifesting sympathy with this party: and, in some instances entire regiments have been removed from Paris, which is the grand centre of the socialist and democratic propagande.

Temporary barracks for the accommodation of twenty thousand men are being constructed with the same view at St. Maur in the environs of Paris. By the way, there is an American socialist in Paris, fraternizing with his French brethren, La Grange, Pierre Leroux, et id genus omne, at all their banquets, and speechifying at their clubs. It is Mr. Brisbane of New York. I have heard him once, and heard of him repeatedly. He is not doing much harm here to be sure.

The red republicans are running, as one of their candidates, a simple sergeant of the 20th regiment of the line, named Pujol. He, it seems, is a democratic socialist republican, and drew upon himself the discipline of his colonel, by attending and speaking, at the political banquets of his party. He has been finally sent to Africa, in one of the companies kept up there for the punishment of soldiers, whose general conduct has rendered them obnoxious to censure. It is hardly possible that his party will be strong enough to elect him.

BURKE.

BY H. T. TUCKERMAN.

To the cotemporaries of a great statesman it is of vital moment to decide whether his opinions agree with each other and if his course be loyal. But to the reader of a future day, his writings are chiefly attractive for the truth they contain and the resources of thought and style they exhibit. No public character escapes animadversion, for if there is nothing in his actions which party hatred can execrate, there is always room enough for base surmise in regard to his motives. Happily the graces of composition, the pleadings of humanity, the serene effulgence of wisdom, survive such transient and local warfare. True eloquence, like poetry, is hallowed by enduring admiration; and as we attach an inestimable value to a portrait by Titian, although the very name of the original has perished, so the warm and exquisite hues of noble fancy and the effective light and shade of ardent thought continue sacred long after the questions upon which they were expended have been forgotten, and the temporary ends they subserved no longer obtain. Depth and clearness of reflection and beauty of style are the grand preservatives of the rhetorician's labors. They even render classic the subject to which they are devoted. In the Forum at Rome we think of Cicero's invectives against Cataline; in the American Senate Chamber, of Webster's defence of the Union; and in Westminster Hall, of Sheridan's speech at the trial of Hastings. To illustrate the sources of rhetorical power, there is no more felicitous example than Edmund Burke. His life was remarkably transparent, unobscured by mystery and unembarrassed by violent contradictions. We clearly descry his image and easily trace his career. The means and appliances that promoted his development were in no degree extraordinary; they are within the reach of thousands. His habits were simple, his purposes undisguised, and the nature and extent of his cultivation amply revealed in his writings. His outward experience was comparatively uneventful. Of Irish descent, his youth is associated with a residence near the ruins of Spenser's dwelling—where much of the Fairy Queen was written,—with the salutary discipline of a Quaker school and the usual college instruction. Like most boys of intellectual tendency, his health was not robust and he dallied with the muses. By the former contingency he was rendered more impressible to the influences of nature, and by the latter experiment his taste for beautiful expression was revealed.

When his academical education was completed, like most young men of active intelligence, he vacillated awhile between several projects. He applied for a Scotch professorship and meditated emigration to America. Meantime pursuing his law-studies in London, he increased his father's yearly allowance of two hundred pounds, by contributing to the periodicals of the day—a habit which gave him variety of practice in the art of expression. Occasional journeys for needful recreation, miscellaneous and unremitting reading, professional study, attentive visits to the House of Commons and the theatre, and social enjoyment of the best kind, quickened his powers and informed his mind. He contracted a happy marriage with the daughter of his benign physician, and thenceforth domestic life was the balm of his spirit. His philosophical taste and love of beauty found scope in the "Enquiry into the Sublime and Beautiful;" and the historical article which he now regularly furnished the Annual Register afforded the most desirable initiation possible into national affairs and political questions. Assimilating these various influences, practical and contemplative, he was unconsciously trained for the career of the rhetorician. From nature, books, the courts, parliament, the drama and society, he constantly gleaned ideas; the amenities of a united family softened the intensity of reflection, and the habitual use of the pen on comprehensive topics as well as oral discussions with the superior men of the day, gave him new facility to that power of language with which he was endowed by nature. That he recognized this general and accurate knowledge of men and things, and an acquired felicity of utterance as the requisites of his vocation, may be inferred from the opinion he gives Barry, the painter, in regard to the old masters,—which is equally applicable to verbal expression. "If I were to indulge in a conjecture, I should attribute all that we call greatness of style and manner of drawing, to the exact knowledge of anatomy and perspective. For by knowing exactly and habitually, without the labor of particular and occasional thinking, what was to be done in every figure they designed, they naturally attained a freedom and spirit of outline, because they could be daring without being absurd; whereas ignorance, if it be cautious, is poor and timid; and if bold, it is only blindly presumptuous."

It is essential to a great rhetorician that he should be endowed not only with quickness and discernment and capacity to retain and assimilate facts and principles, but that a basis of strong natural sense should underlie both his acquisitions and facilities. Otherwise he degenerates into a mere special pleader; his arguments are ingenious rather than profound, and his view of any subject liable to be more acute and visionary, than true and comprehensive. It is this justness of perception, this original clearness of insight which the word sense best though vaguely indicates, that leads to an habitual reference to first principles, to confidence in primary truth and to a calm and earnest reliance on inductive wisdom. It was to a remarkable degree the characteristic of Burke. He seems to have been a conservative in the best signification of the term—without bigotry or fanaticism, yet with singular tranquillity of conviction and liberality of feeling. He joined, indeed, the dignity of the conservative with the generous spirit of the reformer. He was a zealous advocate for progress, but for progress in a certain direction and under established influences. In the spirit of our great revolutionary orator, he seemed ever ready to exclaim, "I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided, and that is the lamp of experience; and know of no way of judging of the future but by the past:" thus Patrick opened the celebrated speech in which he so eloquently advocated resistance to Great Britain, boldly suggesting the greatest of national innovations by an appeal to the unsatisfactory result of patient endurance. It was not a familiar precedent, however, but a great principle that justified his cause. Thus Burke in his writings on France and America manifests the liveliest attachment to existent institutions and a faith in them as the result of ages of human conflict and thought—but it is on the fundamental principles involved in them and on the natural instincts whence they spring, that he relies. It appears to us that the great elements of Burke's rhetoric may all be traced to this philosophic habitude. He never lost sight of the facts of human nature and human life—of the everlasting laws by which they are regulated. The phenomena, however imposing or winsome, never drew him from the law, the form from the substance, the transient phase from the original element. Hence his deep aversion to the substitution of theoretical for practical intelligence, his recoil from all attempts to regulate actual society by metaphysical opinions, to let a doctrine take the place of a sentiment, or a visionary speculation of a long tried expedient. It was this view that led him to perceive so distinctly the error of American taxation and the inapplicability of French philosophy to human well-being. It rendered him sagacious because it carried him below the surface of things to the mind and heart of man as developed within to his consciousness, aroused to his observation and in history to his reflection. Hence, also, his remarkable prescience. He was a good prophet in national affairs, on the very same ground that Shakespeare is the most effective of dramatists—a constant recurrence to the natural, and therefore the inevitable, springs of human action. Thus he asks, in his "Reflections on the Revolution in France," "Why do I feel so differently from the Rev. Dr. Price, and those of his lay flock, who will choose to adopt the sentiments of his discourse? For this plain reason—because it is natural I should; because we are so made as to be affected," &c. The same idea in another guise, re-appears in all the arguments and expressions of this celebrated essay; for instance, "We shall never be such fools as to call in an enemy to the substance of any system to remove its corruptions, to supply its defects, or to perfect its construction." One of his brief phrases strikingly exhibits how completely he identified reasonable obedience to the instincts and sentiments of human nature, with civilization, and how destructive he deemed all experiments not based upon their primitive teaching. "Nor as yet," he says, in allusion to the philosophical atrocities then enacting in Paris—"have we subtilized ourselves into savages." His first published work of celebrity—the Treatise on the Sublime and Beautiful, is the best evidence of the reverence and curiosity with which he looked into nature for essential truth. In this composition he did so as a mental philosopher; in his after public career, he adopted the same method as the only legitimate test of justice and utility.

He wished to "move with the order of the universe." "I have endeavored," he says, "through my whole life, to make myself acquainted with human nature; otherwise I should be unfit to take even my humble part in the service of mankind." And again, "wise men will apply their remedies to vices not to names; to the causes of evil which are permanent, not to the occasional organs by which they act, and the transitory modes in which they appear." But it is needless to multiply instances. In dwelling upon this invariable deference to the first principles of our common nature—to the great and unalterable facts of humanity, as the philosophic element of Burke's character, we desire to suggest the process of his efficiency, to show that no vague and chance aptitude to which under the name of genius the indiscriminate refer all mental results is necessary to account for his power. He proceeded in discussing a public question exactly as in a scientific analysis; he brought the same recognition of facts, the same lucid arrangement and rigid induction to his commentary on the French Revolution as to the problem of the Sublime and Beautiful. In both cases it was what God had written on the mind and implanted in the heart of man that he strove to desecry, and according to which he argued and inferred. We do not say that therefore his conclusions were infallible, but to this comprehensive yet searching method, we confidently ascribe the wisdom that men of all parties find in the writings of Burke. We believe it is thus only that any perennial light is shed on momentous themes. The view thus eliminated may be incomplete, it may be partial, but as far as it goes, it is a genuine and distinct revelation and an infinite help towards unusual truth. It gives a certain grandeur to statesmen, historians and poets when they apply essential principles to immediate occurrences, try the elements of the hour in the crucible of the Past, and, undisturbed by the noise and smoke of the conflict around, calmly guide their steps by patient and trusting observation of the eternal stars. This lofty habitude cramped Burke, except in great questions, as a parliamentary orator. He was obliged sometimes to begin with a coaxing appeal or startling expression to win the requisite attention. His style of thinking was eminently adapted to contemplative minds. The superficial were impatient at its depth. Burke excelled in furnishing reasons, so clearly expressed and so justly deduced as to fascinate by their bright and orderly array, if they did not overwhelm by their intrinsic power.

There is a permanency attached to views thus based upon long experience and drawn from the primal facts of man and nature, that prolongs their interest and value. However inadequate they may be as representing all the ideas involved in political and social science, no reflective mind can fail to perceive that they have essential meaning; and will, therefore, be continually reproduced. Two revolutions have occurred in France since Burke's celebrated Reflections appeared. The last publication of note relative to the duty and prospects of that country, is a pamphlet by Guizot.* We are struck with the coincidences of thought, the identity of argument of these two treatises—written at such intervals of time and at such different stages of human progress. "I confess to you, sir," says Burke, "I never liked this continual talk of resistance and revolution, or the practice of making the extreme medicine of the constitution its daily bread." "A society may be tortured, perhaps destroyed," says Guizot; "but you cannot make it assume a form or mode of existence foreign to its nature, either by disregarding the essential elements of which it is constituted, or by doing violence to them."

"Had fate reserved him to our times," says Burke, alluding to the tyranny of Henry VIII.,

"four technical terms would have done his business and saved him all this trouble,—he needed nothing more than one short form of incantation—Philosophy, Light, Liberty, the Rights of Man." "Nothing," says Guizot "has a more certain tendency to ruin a people than a habit of accepting words and appearances as realities. While the shouts of unity and fraternity resound among us, they are responded to by social war," &c.

A train of reasoning in favor of distinct orders and an established church runs through the two works, and a kindred appeal to innate human affections and moral responsibility. It is probable that the terms of science and the imagery of literature will perpetually vary with new discoveries and the advance of social refinement; but there is an identity in human nature, in its laws, wants, endowments and tendencies that renders just inferences from them, especially when made with perspicuity and elegance of style, interesting to the thinker of every age. Hence the renown of Burke as a philosophical essayist on government and society.

The next source of his rhetorical gifts was various and precise knowledge. In early life his reading was desultory but incessant. He seems to have intuitively known the applicability of all truths to human culture; for while he perused with zest history as the storehouse of the past, he equally cultivated poetry as quickening to the sympathies and suggestive of the beautiful. His observation had the same range. He noted a mill not less than a minister—the one taught him a principle in mechanics and the other in architectural beauty. He recorded the statistics and delighted in the practice of agriculture, while, with kindred intelligence, he made a taste for the fine arts a careful study. It was the same, too, in conversation. No one he encountered failed to contribute to his stock of ideas. He could discuss a portrait with Sir Joshua, a question in philology with Johnson, an elocutionary point with Garrick, manures with a farmer and costume with a lady. Thus despising no source of information, continually storing his mind with every kind of facts, natural, historical and social, when he meditated upon a topic, illustrations rushed from his memory and were readily marshalled to sustain an argument, or combined by his glowing fancy into brilliant and striking metaphors. It was from this exuberance and variety of knowledge, that his fluency as an orator, in part, arose, as well as the spontaneous richness of his conversation; and that immediate recognition of his superiority which led the surly lexicographer to say that encountered under a shed in the rain, he would be known at once as an extraordinary man. The quickness, indeed, with which he appropriated facts is evinced in his speeches and writings on France, America and India. One who had dwelt long in those countries could scarcely speak of them with a more graceful familiarity. He explored not only the data but the associations of every subject; and his acquisitions came forth with a fullness and alacrity that rendered them doubly impressive. He had an emphatic manner of introducing incidental pictures which vivified all the facts previously cited—as in the memorable allusion to the unfortunate queen of France, the description of Miss McCrea's murder and of the New England whale fishery.

* Democracy in France.

Comparison is one of the most effective of rhetorical weapons, though rarely encountered in perfection. A striking metaphor arrests the uncultivated mind, while a beautiful one gratifies the refined taste. Burke excelled in both. His images indicate sometimes peculiar ingenuity and sometimes a poetical imagination. They are invariably effective, and add greatly to the living charm of his oratory. Open at any page, and we meet them. Let us quote at random. "After all," he says in a letter, "a man will make more by the figures of arithmetic than the figures of rhetoric, unless he can get into the trade winds, and then he may sail secure over Pactolean sands." In a speech, referring to the apathetic condition of the Spanish monarchy; "What can we expect of her?" he asks, "mighty, indeed, but unwieldy, vast in bulk but inert in spirit—a whale stranded upon the sea-shore of Europe." His description of Chatham's administration is felicitous in another vein: "a cabinet so variously inlaid, such a piece of diversified mosaic, such a tessellated pavement without cement—here a bit of black stone and there a bit of white—patriots and courtiers, kings, friends and republicans, whigs and tories," &c. In relation to the English clubs of French sympathizers, he says: "do not imagine that our contemptuous neglect of their abilities is a general mark of acquiescence in their opinions. No such thing I assure you. Because half-a-dozen grasshoppers, under a fern, make the field ring with their importunate clink, while thousands of great cattle, reposing beneath the shadow of the British oak, chew the cud and are silent, pray do not imagine that those who make the noise are the only inhabitants of the field, that, of course, they are many in number, or that, after all, they are other than the little, shrivelled, meagre, hopping, though loud and troublesome insects of the hour." The withering sarcasm of this figure is only equalled by that of Sydney Smith, who said, speaking of an insignificant but mischievous person, that—"in a country surrounded by dykes a rat may inundate a province."

But the significance and brilliancy of a metaphor is diminished by gleaming it from the context; and this is especially true in regard to those of Burke. The mind is warmed for their reception by previous argument or appeal; and they often rise in majestic beauty from the tide of his glowing rhetoric like Aphrodite from the sea.

We have spoken of the mental and verbal characteristics of Burke, but to form an adequate idea of the man or even of his rhetoric, it is indispensable to consider his physical temperament and his moral nature. The former was of that sanguine, nervous kind, both active and susceptible, which gives force and vivacity to expression. Indeed, we ascribe Burke's preëminence, in no small degree, to the happy blending in his constitution of English and Irish traits—the one imparting vigor of thought and the other tenderness and enthusiasm. He has been called "a terrific accuser"; but combativeness is essential to an effective rhetorician. Its excitement, when the case justifies, is absolutely necessary in the attack and defence of opinion, in the arraignment of the guilty and the vindication of the injured; but not less desirable is its latent influence—giving a certain firmness, precision and energy both to ideas and style. We see its bracing effect in all Burke's elaborate efforts. There is an aim in each, of which he never loses sight and toward which every flight of fancy, and ebullition of satire, and pathos of appeal is ardently directed. Yet the tenor of his writings evinces a generosity of feeling, warm affection, loyalty and a certain nobleness especially captivating when contrasted with the pettiness and chicanery that usually deforms political aspirants. The permanency of his early attachment, his liberal and unostentatious kindness to indigent genius—as exhibited in the instances of Barry and Crabbe, his "desperate fidelity" to Hamilton, and his intense parental anguish indicate how sincere was the sensibility and devotedness that breathes in his works. Even Johnson's arbitrary will was soothed to courteous abeyance by Burke. Few passages in the latter's writings are more characteristic than his defence of nobility. His veneration for the time-hallowed, the renowned, the sublime in nature and association, is revealed by his reflections, as a youth, on first entering Westminster Abbey; and by the solemn beauty of his pleadings for the sacred and the venerable. It was not a trick of rhetoric for such a man to lament the decline of chivalry. Noble sentiments were his birth-right, and he knew from experience the mortification of realizing that the age in which he lived denied them scope, and that the people with whom he mingled often exhibited a hopeless incapacity of recognition in their behalf. He intuitively discerned, also, the cold selfishness of a mere theorist—"nothing can be conceived," he writes, "more hard than the heart of a thorough metaphysician."

But the excellence of Burke's heart is most admirably evinced in his eloquent advocacy of sentiment—in its highest significance, as essential to the dignity and progress of man. This is one of those peculiarities that distinguish the universal from the partisan writer and justify the declaration of Mackintosh that Burke was the most philosophical of statesmen. It also explains why the most satisfactory revelation of his genius was colloquial. There was too much nature in him for acquirement to overlay or for diplomacy to pervert, and the less artificial the medium the greater the exuberance of his mind. He recognised the normal not less than the temporary in humanity; and felt that the beautiful and endearing in social existence was not less a vital interest of his race than the principles of government. Hence he reproaches the French innovators in terms of the most attractive yet lofty wisdom: "all the pleasing illusions which make power gentle and obedience liberal, which harmonized the different shades of life, and which, by a bland assimilation, incorporated into politics, the sentiments which beautify and soften private society, are to be dissolved by this new, conquering empire of light and reason. All the decent drapery of life is to be rudely torn off; all the superadded ideas furnished from the wardrobe of a moral imagination, which the heart owns and the understanding ratifies as necessary to cover the defects of our naked, shivering nature, and to raise it to dignity in our own estimation, are to be exploded as a ridiculous, absurd, and antiquated fashion."

It is generally admitted that the most successful oratory disappoints in the reading, not only from the absence of elocutionary charms, but on account of the somewhat exaggerated terms which though orally impressive, will not bear the calm eye of meditation. One of the greatest proofs of Burke's originality as a rhetorician, is that his speeches are so effective on perusal. There is substantial thought enough to sustain whatever ornament he chooses to display; and the direct manner which the habit of public address induces, only gives vitality to his writings, without, in the slightest degree, lessening their dignity as deliberate compositions. The philosopher and the poet are co-evident in his most felicitous efforts; the reason and the sentiment of the question alternate; and we often enjoy while communing with him the delightful consciousness of having our judgment convinced and our sympathies won, at the same time. This union of delicacy and power is almost unprecedented. To be vivid and profound is seldom the distinction of the same writer. We instinctively separate in literature the two characteristics, and turn to one class of authors for emotion and to another for thought, as if to invent and to argue equally well, were scarcely to be expected from the same individual. From Burke, however, may be gleaned the most dry and perspicuous collocation of facts, the strongest array of reasons, the most imaginative conceptions, and the most touching pictures. His most universal charm is a style so copious as to enrich the student's vocabulary by the aptitude and flow of words, to gratify the taste by its elegance and the ear by its musical periods. Withal it is a manly style. Burke is not fastidious in his choice of epithets or illustrations to the extent of weakening his force of statement. He can use the most homely as well as the most classic phrases and figures. He does not sacrifice truth to beauty, but aims to render them mutually illustrative. Few English writers boast passages that exhibit so clearly the dignity of the language, its facility of application, and its persuasive grace. It is on this account that meagre extracts do him little justice. Thus read, he might be sometimes thought bombastic, sometimes verbose and occasionally too colloquial or too stilted; but perused consecutively, the language and manner keep pace so deftly with the course of the argument and the successive phases of the question, that the entire effect is singularly harmonious and satisfactory; and the mind is animated and tempered as by a lofty strain of melody, uttered by a deep, yet sweet voice, "when on the singer's lip expires the finished song." To this union of consummate ability with earnest and just feeling is referable the extraordinary balance of fancy and sense, the practical and the poetical in Burke. His mind was essentially speculative, he delighted in curious observation, his range of inquiry was broad and refined; yet to public affairs he brought a calm, practical judgment, a sobriety of mood, a perception of the actual relations of things and the absolute claims of an exigency, as if he had been wont to deal only in matters of fact and had drawn every lesson from stern experience. This is the more remarkable in one who could, at pleasure, indulge in such excursions of imagination and sentiment. An able critic has declared that in the latter regard he was "unapproached by any orator;" and the wonder is that the reasoning acumen and profundity co-existed with this capacity, in equal power. To this uncommon alliance of gifts we ascribe his moderation. When the views of Fox and Pitt were quoted in opposition to his own, he said—"I prefer the collective wisdom of ages to the abilities of any two men living." He would go all lengths with no party, nor yield im-PLICIT faith to any mortal. He was too comprehensive to please a faction; and the more general his subject and the less connected with temporary objects, the more triumphant his discussion of it. There was, therefore, no little truth in the famous line in which Goldsmith summed up the career of his illustrious friend:—"he gave up to party what was meant for mankind;" for the reader of the present day, to whom many of the questions to which he was devoted are comparatively indifferent, cannot but lament that historical, ethical or philosophical themes of vast and lasting interest, had not exclusively employed his pen. The essay on the "Sublime and Beautiful," and the work on the French Revolution by their immediate reference to natural and social truths, elicited his finest powers; and eloquently suggest how admirably such discussions were adapted both to his abilities and his taste. Here and there, indeed, throughout his speeches, opportunities arise for expatiating on a universal truth or an important principle, which he always seizes with the avidity of a mind to which isolated details and transient causes are a hindrance, and the perspective of great ideas a necessary inspiration.

THE SPIRIT OF POESY.

As the dew-drop to the rose,
As the sun-beam on the sea,
As the stars unto the night,
Shining with a cheering light,
Art thou to me
Blessed Spirit of Poesy I
Full of light and full of gladness,
Full of sweet serenity,
Lighting up the mists of sadness
Till they melt themselves and flee
Blithesomely and airily;—
As the storm-clouds darkly rolled,
At the sunbeam's dawning ray,
Brightly smiling float away
In shapes and colors manifold.

What art thou? not a fleeting dream,
The eager phantasy of youth
That passeth with our morning's beam,—
Like dew-drops on a lily's breast
Trembling in their sweet unrest—
To me thy very being wears
The fadeless light of truth.
Yes, thou wert with me long ago
When singing mid the summer flowers,—
Or when beside the rippling stream
Musing in a voiceless dream
Through the golden sunset hours,
Restless thoughts would come to me
Whispering to my haunted mind

Of a form I might not see,
Of an unheard melody,
Strange, and dim, and undefined;
Till half in love and half in fear
I turned me to the quiet skies,
And deemed that in each beautiful star
Shining faint, and distant far,
I met the glance of angel eyes;
And heard amid the wind's low sigh
A strange and fitful harmony.

And thou art with me still—thy smile
Is as a glory round my way,
Guiding through the lonely night,
Where without that cheering light
My wayward steps had gone astray—
Stooping to the lowly places,
Fainting by the common way.
Seeming deathless joys there be
That blossom like the autumn flowers,
Blossom for a few brief hours,
Soon to perish utterly;
Until we turn amid our tears
Yearning for the coming years
Though burthened with a deeper care—
For then we deem that higher powers
And sterner wisdom shall be ours,
Making grief less hard to bear:
But now—I have no fear for thee,
So beautiful, so bright thou art,
So full of sweet divinity,
That death in thee can have no part—
Thyself art immortality.

At times thou comest unto me
In the semblance of a fairy,
Borne on pinions light and airy,
Smiling with a sunny glee.
And I follow as I may,
As with light Psychean grace
Through illimitable space
Thou tak'st thy pathless way.
Thou leadest me to lonely woods
And to the sea-girt strand,
Where all throughout the moonless night
The plunging waters hoarse and white
Beat on the ribbed sand;
And the ships go sailing by,
Sailing on the shadowy sea
Like the pale stars in the sky,
Silently—silently,
To fairy founts, and haunted rills,
Welling forth forevermore
From the silent hearts of lonely hills,
'Mid fluted shell and sparry ore,
And many a lovely flower that dwells
Unseen, beside the fountain's brim,
Or in the rocky niches dim,
Like gentle nuns in their cloister-cells
Singing ever a holy hymn:—
Or where, in some deserted isle,
Standeth an old Cathedral pile,
'Neath whose matted ivy-screen,
Peer from corners dusk and dim,
Carved forms and faces grim,
With feathery fern and lichens hoar
And richest mosses mantled o'er,— Richest moss of rarest green!
And then it is a joy to me
'Mid those ruins lone and hoary

Thus to stray with thee ;
Listening to some ghostly story—
Story of the sainted time,
Or some wild and monkish legend
Weaving into rhyme.

Thy joyousness is like the glow
Of the sun-beams on the sea,
As they sparkle to and fro,
Laughingly, laughingly.—
But beneath, in caverns deep,
Calm and still the waters sleep;
Far too mighty and profound
For flashing light—for rippling sound—
Thus thy soul lies calm forever—
Silent in its deep emotion,
Hushed as to a still devotion,
While it seemeth changing ever.
A quiet sense of moveless might,
Of calm and still serenity,
A love too deep for smiles or tears,
An earnestness of thought that wears
The stamp of immortality,
These are a part of thee.
Thou mak'st my life so beautiful,
That I can bear to be alone ;
Thou singest ever a soothing song
Where lies no secret moan,
No melancholy undertone,
But lovely as the strains that fell
'Mid the stillness of the night,
Melting through the pale starlight,
On the spirit of the maid
Kneeling at the holy shrine,
And hearing as she meekly prayed,
Strains of harmony divine—
Strains of angel-melody,
With a sweetness most intense
Steal on her enraptured sense—
Lovely, sainted Cecillie !
And never die these tones away,
But evermore they come to me
With a low-toned melody,
Singing ever night and day ;
As the sparkling waters run
Through shady wood and sunny valley,
Singing in a quiet tone,
Singing ever musically
Down unto the restless sea—
Where the sounding billows pour
Singing on the lonely shore—
Thus thou singest unto me,
Evermore !

I may not tell the fancies wild
That whisper to my heart,
When oft amid its solitude
Musing in half-inspired mood,
I question what thou art.
At times thou seemest unto me
A part of mine own being—
Its life, its immortality,
That deathless and far-seeing
Reaches from the bounds of time
Through the past's forgotten clime,
And through far eternity.
Such as I deem it might have been Amid the bowers of Paradise,
Gazing above with radiant eyes
Undarkened yet by sin,
A guardian-angel by my side

An exile from a purer clime,
With whom the melodies abide
Of some sweet Eden-time,
Whose echoes from the past prolong,
Tuning life's discord into song ;
And seeming as it wanders by
A strange unbidden memory
Of something heard, of something seen,
Of something loved we know not where—
Of something that we feel hath been
In a more heavenly atmosphere.
Thou art a mystery,—a thing
To shrine within my secret heart
And love with silent wondering,
Scarce knowing what thou art ;
For in thy purity divine
Thy life is too remote from mine
To tarry human questioning.

Oh leave me not alone, alone !
For I am but an earthly child,
So lonely in my soul's unrest,
So passionate, and weak, and wild,
I should be nothing without thee,—
A bark upon a stormy sea
Tossing ever restlessly ;
Or sleeping on a breezeless ocean
Without ripple, without motion—
Sleeping on so wearily !
I am so utterly alone,
What should I love if thou wert gone ?
Naught hath thine angel purity,
Thy sweet and soothing sympathy,
Blessed spirit of Poesy !

THE INSPIRATION OF MUSIC.

ALFIERI often before he wrote prepared his mind by listening to music ; " Almost all my tragedies were sketched in my mind either in the act of hearing music, or a few hours after,"—a circumstance which has been recorded of many others. LORD BACON had music often played in the room adjoining his study : MILTON listened to his organ for his solemn inspiration, and music was even necessary to WARBURTON. The symphonies which awoke in the poet sublime emotions, might have composed the inventive mind of the great critic in the visions of his theoretical mysteries. A celebrated French preacher, Bourdaloue or Massillon, was once found playing on a violin, to screw his mind up to the pitch, preparatory for his sermon, which within a short interval he was to preach before the Court. CURRAN'S favorite method of meditation was with his violin in his hand ; for hours together would he forget himself, running voluntaries over the strings, while his imagination in collecting its tones was opening all his faculties for the coming emergency at the bar. D'ISRAELI.

FOUR NEW ADDRESSES.*

If Mr. Joseph Hume were a citizen of Republican America with all his statistical propensities in full play about him, we can imagine that much the greater portion of his time would be consumed in learning the arithmetic of our pamphlet publications. It is quite likely too that after pushing his investigations to the farthest possible extent, with a view to arriving at the exact number of addresses published in any given year, he would at last give up in despair and the rest of his days would be embittered by the utter impossibility of even obtaining the result. The name of such publications is Legion. The greatest fecundity of the German presses is nothing in the comparison. Leipsic itself become Lilliputian when so regarded, and

"If Holland old, or Holland new,
One wondrous sheet of paper grew,"

and all of it should be pressed into service at once, it would not furnish a sufficient supply for our market. Baccalaureate addresses have become more plentiful than the berries of the laurel, and the autumnal leaves of collegiate orations strew the post routes of travel with more than Vallambrosan profusion.

Among this multitude of red, green and yellow pamphlets, there is of course every tinge in sentiment as in cover. They are called forth by the most various occasions and touch on the greatest variety of topics. One young gentleman in our immediate vicinity ventures, perhaps, to throw the light of research upon the aboriginal developments of the North American Continent. Another has been invited to celebrate the completion of a Lyceum on the banks of the Wabash. A third indulges in unstinted abuse of the Southern States before the Anti-Slavery and Negro-Stealing Society of Doolittleville "in the State of Connecticut." to the great delight of the spinsters thereof. Meanwhile hundreds are engaged from Nova Scotia to New Mexico in speechifying before college debating clubs and reading-room associations. Indeed the speech at college is the pièce de resistance of literature; and we doubt very much if a Master of Arts can be found in the country who has not published his pamphlet. Nor is it confined to such as have taken degrees. Semel insanivimus omnes, in this particular we have all sinned, and one peccadillo is preserved in obscure garrets or have been long since "used up" as wrapping paper for "merchandise."

For this latter mode of speechification, if indulged in by undergraduates or Alumni, a prescribed formula may be laid down. They are all alike. There may be an apparent diversity in the subjects selected for discussion, but the thoughts are always made to flow through the same channel. Your orator begins far back in the dim twilight of tradition, before Homer, (or the band of vagabond minstrels, according to Wolf,) had uttered the majestic poetry of the Iliad,—he gradually progresses to the palmy day of Athenian supremacy, looks at Rome pillaged by the Visigoth, does up the dark ages in very respectable gloom, traces the departure of the Moors from Spain, and after a few flourishes on the French Revolution, with some grandiloquence touching the guillotine, at last reaches America and, as in duty bound, glorifies her gloriously. So much for the matter. The ornaments to set it off, the tinsel of rhetoric and the pomp of metaphor, are also invariably the same in all. The old myths are revived. Pallas comes forth again from the front of Jove and Niobe weeps afresh. Then follows two quotations from my Lord Byron, with four paragraphs of "fine writing," made up of eagles, pyramids and other trumpery of Mr. Charles Phillips, and the performance is ended "and your orator will ever pray, &c." Speeches made after this recipe are reproduced in large quantity, month after month, by a great multitude of orators, to whom

"The mob of gentlemen that wrote with ease," in the days of the merry monarch, was but an inconsiderable number.

As soon as the type-setter of the town, where the address (one of the genus we have been describing) has been delivered, has "composed"

the composition,—taking hold of the author's thoughts and "turning them to shapes" that Aldus or Caxton never dreamt of,—the press strikes off a certain number of presentation copies, which are distributed at once with the autograph and compliments of the author among a select circle of friends. These friends are placed thereby in an unpleasant predicament. They are indeed sadly perplexed. Two duties, growing out of the friendly relation, are imposed upon them and these sometimes involve violence to their inclination and an outrage upon truth. First, they must read. Second, they must praise. We have somewhere seen an excellent suggestion for evading this difficulty by a letter to the author, acknowledging in polite terms the receipt of the address, and expressing an intention of reading and the expectation of being delighted with it.

Now, to write a good address, which shall both please an auditory and make a respectable appearance in print, is a much more difficult matter than is generally supposed. The critic, who may have been warmed by the glow of declamation in a spoken discourse, or lulled into an indulgent mood by the musical lapses of a fine voice, becomes more fastidious in his closet with the glittering periods before him divested of all adventitious aids. The charm of manner is beyond the reach of the black art. Looks and tones cannot be printed. Gestures are incapable of publication. The surest fascinations of oratory are thus lost forever, the biographer of Henry cannot fix upon his eloquent pages that gift of expression, which in the "forest-born Demosthenes" so melted and moved by turns his enraptured audiences, and the reporters fail to transmit the grace with which Mr. Pinkney drew off his gloves in the midst of an argument before the Supreme Court. We have known, indeed, in our own limited experience, an address to be received with the most decided manifestations of delight, which, in pamphlet form, has sadly injured the author's reputation. To hear and to read is not unfrequently like witnessing a ballet on the night of its first representation and seeing it again at rehearsal the next morning. "The babbling and remorseless day" discloses tawdry spangles and vile daubs where the soft lustre of the foot-lights had exhibited diamonds and oriental architecture, and the divinity of the spectacle who seemed a thing of gossamer in the moonlight, turns out to be a vulgar, rouged and bedizened woman on the wrong side of forty.

But while the mass of publications of this character can not bear close scrutiny, and while to our young friends who are tempted to print a college speech we would universally commend the advice of Burns,—

"Conceal yourself as weel's ye can Frae critical dissection,"—

there are yet many noble exceptions to the general rule, constituting a class of literary efforts, honorable alike to their authors and the age we live in. From the large accumulation of pamphlets with which our table is loaded down, we select four addresses at this time for favorable notice. We shall endeavor, with the help of the scissors, to set before our readers some passages from each of these, as excellent specimens of the eloquence of the desk. They belong to the better sort, the 'ei ayaboi of speeches.

We begin with the address of Mr. George Frederick Holmes, the newly-elected President of the University of Mississippi, delivered on the occasion of the opening of that Institution. Mr. Holmes has long been well-known to the South as a profound scholar and as one of the most forcible and elegant reviewers of the day. We do not assign him too high a rank when we place him in connection with the best writers of the English Reviews. Those who have read his scathing critique of the "Wandering Jew," published in the Southern Quarterly Review some two years since, and the admirable article on "Bulwer's Lucretia," contributed to this magazine for April and July 1848, will agree with us, we think, in the opinion, that they establish his reputation as a writer of the first rank of merit.

Mr. Holmes was Professor of Political Economy at William & Mary College in this State, at the time when recent unhappy occurrences terminated in a temporary suspension of the exercises of that venerated seat of learning. Mr. Holmes having resigned his chair, was elected President of the new University which the people of Mississippi had just endowed. In his address, alluding to the day of inauguration and enlarging on the prospects of the University, President Holmes says,

"It is, indeed, a day to be remembered in the annals of the State. 'The erection of a great College, dedicated to the study of the nature of all things, whereby God may have the more glory in the workmanship, and man the more fruit in the use of them.'—this was more justly regarded by Lord Bacon, 'as the noblest foundation upon earth, and the lanthorn of that kingdom,' whose magnificent, though unfinished proportions, attest the amplitude, profundity and sagacity of his mind, as fully as the Novum Organon itself.

"It is his declaration, too, that 'there is not any more worthy act than the further endowment of the world with sound and fruitful knowledge!' But in the creation of a new University by the act of the people, and with the funds of the people, the State has exercised its liberality not only in fostering the study of the nature of all things, not merely in securing the further endowment of the world with knowledge—but, above all, in providing for the dissemination of the learning which may be in the world—in extending its treasures to all who may be willing to receive them—and in assuring to each rising generation adequate and full instruction in that science which has been so highly estimated.

"This institution, thus created by the munificence of the State, is a creation speedily evoked from the silent womb of things possible: but its works are as perennial as the benefits of knowledge. The lapse of years, which undermines and obliterates all things, will deal indulgently with this, and only add renovated vigor, and a more ample capacity for good, to the veneration which will gradually hover over it; unless ruthless circumstances should mar the work which time would be reluctant to destroy. For this erection of a State University is a great deed, which needs to be but once performed—opus magnum semel operandum—one from which, when done, an unfailling stream of all that most ennobles and adorns a people, will continue to flow with increasing volume through countless generations, enriching each, and aiding each in the great race of progressive development of the human family. Its creation has demanded no long time, and, when compared with its prospective results, no great expenditure of means, but its fruits endure for ever, and will continue to be prodigal of blessings to the present and all coming time.

"That this is no vain boast—this promise of continued life and health—may be readily proved from the experience of the past. The Universities of Oxford, and Cambridge, and Paris owe their birth to the night of the middle ages, and survive in increased energy and renown. The University of Rome, founded under the earlier successors of the Cæsars escaped the perils of the Hun, the Goth, the Vandal and the Saracen—lived through the wars of the Lombards and the Franks—was left erect after the dissensions of Guelph and Ghibelline had passed away—and remains the most splendid monument of the innate strength and persistency of great Institutions of learning. But a nearer and more recent instance is at hand. With one of my colleagues I have come from a venerable College, to which the long protracted circle of a hundred and fifty years had only given higher honor and larger sphere of influence. Her alumni had gone from her halls to the Bench and the Senate Chamber—from her, they had gone to the command of armies, and to the Presidency of the Union—her graduates had controlled the fate of nations, and changed the destinies of the world. Founded under the rule of the Kingly government, she had witnessed the growth and presided over the struggles of the Colony in its youth—she had influenced and survived the storms of the Revolution—and had blossomed at its close into full promise and a higher existence. Her horizon was widening around her—and her glorious career was expanding before her, promising a yet noble destiny in future, when the sacred ark of learning which had been wafted over the floods of time, was shipwrecked by the rude and unholy hand of misguided men."

While we trust that the University of Mississippi may attain all the eminence that Padua or Oxford has reached, we may be permitted to question the taste of the last paragraph of our quotation. We disclaim in advance the expression of any opinion with regard to the unfortunate dissensions at Williamsburg. We desire to say nothing whatever with relation to a matter with which we have nothing to do. But we regret that Mr. Holmes should have employed terms of harshness in referring to the late bouleversement. Whatever may have been the effect of the action of the Board of Visitors, we must insist that their intentions were good and their motives above suspicion. Nor do we at all agree with Mr. Holmes in regarding the disasters of the college as amounting to "shipwreck." The good ship has indeed sustained losses. In parting with him, we think it lost an able captain. But (if he will allow us to borrow his figure) it has been hauled up and repaired, its tackle has been refitted, new and strong hands have been enrolled in its service, and now once more ready for a cruise, unlike the rickety and misshapen vessel which Milton has described as it stands out bravely to the summer's sea. Bon voyage to it!—Fair breezes and successful adventures! But we can talk better in less figurative language. We say then, that in the distinguished gentlemen who have been called upon to succeed the retiring professors, we see the best assurances of increasing usefulness for an institution around which cluster the fondest associations of colonial and revolutionary greatness.

"Built in the eclipse and rigged with curses dark,"

Mr. Holmes proceeds to discuss the systems of common school and Collegiate Education in their bearing upon each other, and says,

"This intimate connection between the higher and lower grades of education has been too frequently overlooked—and in consequence a pernicious hostility has arisen between their respective partizans, which has retarded or defeated the success of one or both. To prevent, as far as may be within the power of one man the growth of any such dissension in this state—and, by preventing this pernicious antagonism, to expedite and ensure the fullest success for the public education of Mississippi—and also to supply, in some measure, the void which has too often been left in the discussion of the importance of State appropriations for public instruction, I shall beg to detain you with a fuller exposition of the functions of collegiate education in ministering to the practical requirements of the present age.

"The belief that there is a distinction or even an opposition between the highest intellectual desires and the practical wants of men, is a popular fallacy very current in the present day. No delusion can be more dangerous or more false. It is one, however, which has not even the doubtful merit of novelty, which has been boastfully claimed for it by its advocates. It has been frequently preached, practised, tested and exploded before. Once crushed, it has often reappeared in various periods of the world's history, and is likely to reappear frequently again. In the days of Reuchlin, classical erudition was persecuted as impiety: and the pursuit of Latin and Greek was decried not merely as a vain and unprofitable study, but as closely connected with magic and other black arts. Yet these were the very studies that paved the way for Kepler, Galileo and Bacon—and led indirectly to the discovery of the New World. The prosecution of science, partly owing to the indiscreet pretensions of its votaries, was punished with the fagot and the stake, and regarded as necromancy—yet it was the commencement of the sciences of Medicine, Chemistry and Astronomy—and to the Alchemists and Astrologers of the Dark Ages we are remotely indebted for all our modern arts and manufactures. Yet the error, which experience has so completely exposed, still infests the minds of many and refuses to be eradicated.

“Paradoxical as it may appear, there is infinitely more truth contained in the converse of this erroneous proposition. The highest intellectual difficulties of the day, and the most recondite speculations of which the age is capable, are in reality those from whose solution the most practical benefits may be anticipated. Experiments in electricity were long regarded as curious and amusing, rather than useful—yet from them we have derived galvanic plating, the electro-type, and the Magnetic Telegraph. Investigations into the elasticity of vapor were to all appearance sufficiently remote from any practical application—they have given us the various forms, and the unlimited powers of the steam engine. An inquiry into the oxydation of metals is sufficiently difficult and recondite—thence, however, we have derived the Daguerrotype. Wherever we turn we shall find fresh confirmation of Bacon's remark, that ‘experimenta lucifera’ are to be preferred to ‘experimenta fructifera’—for they will be ultimately productive of the largest amount of valuable and practical results.

“If we are anxious to confirm confirmation, and to make conviction doubly sure, we need only cast a hasty glance over the studies pursued in a Collegiate education, and trace their direct practical influence. If we begin with the classic languages and even omit all mention of their efficacy in training, forming, educating and ennobling the mind and heart—they furnish us with the laws of universal grammar and with the highest exemplars of grace, beauty, strength and order in composition—they supply the keys to unlock the literatures, the languages and the laws of all modern nations:—and they contain, buried in their vast bosoms, exhaustless treasures which can be drawn from no other source. They are the lasting monuments which prove most cogently the ennobling influences of free institutions on the mind and the genius of man. In them, too, is locked up the history of the world from Solon to Cromwell. And above all, they contain the record of the covenant and the archives of our faith. It will not suffice to reply to this, that Latin and Greek books may be read in translations. Not a thousandth part of the riches imbedded in those languages has ever yet been translated—no translation from an ancient author can be any thing more than a caricature of the original—and moreover, those who neglect to acquire the classic languages themselves will rarely have recourse to translations. In addition to this all the important incidental advantages to be derived from the study of these languages are wholly lost by the substitution of translations.

“If, then, on these numerous accounts the Latin and Greek are worthy of our attention they merit for the same reasons diligent and persevering study. They are the true Pierian spring, from which, if we would drink, we must drink deeply and largely. The benefits we have pointed out are the rewards of long and intimate familiarity, and are not to be gained by a hasty and superficial acquaintance. We must learn to think in their own language as the Greeks thought before we can truly inhale the glorious and inspiring atmosphere of Athenian wisdom—and we must learn to feel as the Romans felt before we can become participants in the profound and practical sagacity of ancient Rome. When this familiarity has been acquired we will discover in the tongues of Greece and Rome the avenues to an immense continent of knowledge which Greece and Rome had never explored.

“To pass on to the physical sciences. The immediate practical benefits derived from the application of natural science to arts, manufactures and agriculture are the cause of most of our modern prosperity, and are so continually submitted to our daily observation as to be perfectly familiar to all of us. We owe to the founder of our modern philosophy the maxim that the limits of our knowledge of nature constitute also the limits of our power to render her operations subservient to human wants; and that the further we can push back the former so much the further do we extend the latter. It is needless to exemplify the manner in which the physical sciences have ministered to the satisfaction of human requirements—the steamboats that cover our waters—the factories that are spread over the land—the railroads that link together the ends of the country with their fetters of iron—the telegraph that outstrips the sun and bears our tidings on the wings of the lightning; these and a thousand other modern miracles bear hourly testimony to the fact and the mode of its accomplishment. But steamboats are built and railroads laid down by those who are wholly unacquainted with the profound mysteries of science; and many wonderful inventions have been due to the genius and perseverance of men whose knowledge scarcely extended beyond the rudiments. From these admitted facts it may be erroneously supposed that profound scientific acquirements are unnecessary for the practical requirements of the times. Not so: each great practical invention by whomsoever it might ultimately be made, has yet been due to anterior investigations carried on from the pure love of speculative truth in the most abstruse and recondite regions of human knowledge. Millions both before and since the Marquis of Worcester had seen the lid tremble on the boiling kettle, but the steam-engine was due to researches into the expansibility of gaseous bodies. The electric fluid had been coming round the world since the stars first sang together, to one American we owed the recognition of its existence and properties, and to another we owe the invention of the magnetic telegraph, though a few years since electricity was considered so far removed from the possibility of practical application, as to be regarded merely as a field for curious and amusing experiments! The security of our lives and properties at sea is in like manner dependent upon trigonometrical calculations, and upon the highest and most difficult speculations of astronomy. Thus the stars which gem the blue depths of heaven lend themselves to the common wants of men; and the ends of knowledge are brought together to render us habitual service."

We might profitably continue our quotations from Mr. Holmes' Address, but our limits bid us turn to the second publication which we propose to notice. This is the Introductory Lecture of Professor De Bow on taking the chair of Political Economy, Commerce and Statistics in the University of Louisiana. Professor De Bow's taste in polite letters and accustomed lucidity of style, (as shown in the editorial management of the "Commercial Review,") had prepared us to expect no little gratification from this lecture, nor have we been at all disappointed. The design of it is an exposition of the studies pursued in his peculiar department of the University, and he proceeds to give a most interesting sketch of the History of Commerce from the earliest ages. Of English commercial enterprise, Mr. De Bow says:

"Edward III. was the father of English commerce. Before his reign no advances of any character had been made in that country to extend its foreign intercourse, but Edward set himself in earnest to build up and establish the kingdom. He invited over from Flanders artisans and workmen, who may almost be said to have originated the manufacturing system of England. It is not a little curious to consider the motives which were held out to this enterprising body of men, as they are furnished for us in a venerable record. They were told that in England "they should feed on fat beef and mutton till nothing but their fullness should stint their stomachs, that they should have buxom wives, seeing the richest yeoman in England would not disdain to marry their daughters unto them." The products of the labors of these craftsmen, feeding upon "fat beef and mutton," to respectable copulency, became soon known, and famous in the markets of all Europe.

"Feudalism began now to totter in the rapid progress of the merchant interests, and went out in that last battle on the heath of Gladsmoor, when Warwick, its great representative—the proud Baron—the "King maker"—fell, like a huge tower, under the vigorous stroke of the Merchant King.

"Ho! what a gigantic struggle was there—grander and more awful, says Bulwer, than all individual interests, were those assigned to the fortunes of this battle, so memorable in the English annals; the ruin or fall of a dynasty, the fall of that warlike Baronage of which Richard Neville was the personation—the crowning flower—the greatest representative, and the last; associated with memories of turbulence and excess it is true, but with the proudest and grandest achievements in our history—with all such liberty as had been achieved since the Norman Conquest, with all such glory as made the island famous—here with Runnymede, and there with Cressy—the rise of a crafty, plotting, imperious despotism, based upon the growing sympathies of craftsmen and traders; and ripening, on the one hand, to the Tudor tyranny, the republican reaction under the Stuarts, the slavery and the civil war; but, on the other hand, to the concentration of all the vigor and life of genius into a single strong government; the graces, the arts, the letters of a polished Court; the freedom, the energies, the resources of a commercial population, destined to ride above the tyranny at which it had at first connived, and give to the emancipated Saxon the markets of the world."

Referring to our own country Mr. De Bow most justly claims for her the proud supremacy of the seas—not indeed as riding the waves with the greatest navy, or boasting more guns than the older governments of Europe, but as directing the keels of a thousand argosies upon missions of peaceful adventure, and effecting those interchanges of products with distant climes, which do more than treaties can ever accomplish, to cultivate kindly relations among the many branches of the human family. In this regard we are confessedly the first nation on earth. Mr. Burke and the ill-natured English tory magazine of our day admit our pre-eminence as the carriers of the world. After alluding to the amazing growth of New York and New Orleans as the two great emporîa of TRADE, Mr. De Bow thus sums up the influence and importance of the merchant classes:

"Whether for Britain, for France, or for Russia, for the South Seas and the Pacific, or for Republican America, there is but one voice now, and that cries for TRADE. Buy or sell are the pregnant words in every language under heaven. The Rialto is the centre of the world's negotiations. For this navies float upon the ocean—for this grave embassies receive audience from the Tamahamah of the Pacific, or talk Chinese with the potentates of the Celestial Empire!

"Commerce is a natural guardian of the arts and sciences. Under its influence the highest results have been stimulated. To what, for instance, can the astonishing progress and perfection to which astronomy has been carried be attributed, more than to the ever-arising wants of navigation? The solution of the problem of the latitudes and longitudes has been promised, at different periods, the highest premiums of government. It has set astronomers at toil which only terminated in brilliant discovery. The various problems of navigation even now demand the highest labors of these men in every country, and the mere tables of a nautical almanac—the calculation of eclipses, occultations and parallaxes, calls into action a degree of scientific skill which can scarcely be appreciated by the uninitiated. The mariner's compass, quadrant, or chronometer, are miracles of art as well as of science. For every nation in the world, commerce has brought together her trophies, and laid them at the feet of science. Without leaving his closet the student of nature may arrive at profound results in the investigation of animals, plants, shells, and minerals, scattered over the whole globe—above the earth and under the earth, and down to the depths of the sea. Every art and science acknowledges its large indebtedness to the hand of commerce for the influence it is enabled to wield over nature in extending the empire and dominion of man.

"Commerce is the parent of civilization. We are acquainted with but one agency which excels it in perpetuating peace and good will among men, and elevating national character, and that agency is Christianity. But even the heralds of the cross, with all their noble and inspiring theme, have not penetrated further into the depths of savage wilderness or among the fiercest islands of the ocean, have not crossed mountains and deserts more desolate and terrific, have not plunged more fearlessly in the midst of horrid idolatry, cannibalism, and semi-demonism, than have these men of bales and merchandises in their search after trade. They have gone hand in hand with the missionary, where they have not acted as his pioneer. It was thus in the early history of America. Marquette and Allouez, fathers in the Roman church, were even distanced by the adventurous La Salle in the first visits which were made by civilized men to the howling wilderness westward of the Lakes. It is thus with the hunters and trappers of Oregon and California, who, as far upward as the Russian limit and south to Mexico, prosecute trade with the savage, as yet ignorant of his soul and of his Maker. It is most strikingly thus in the case of the Sandwich Islands. Commerce, acting as the adjunct or handmaiden of Christianity amongst the savages there, has transformed them into men and into citizens. We see a trophy won to civilization—a people added to the Christian nations of the earth.

"Let us take the extremest limit of the ocean, the stormiest islet of the sea, struggling against a thousand billows, and what do we find? The sailor and the trader have been there; and the return of the 'white wings' is hailed by anxious multitudes, who bring out their treasures, to be bartered for the veriest trifles of civilization. From the intercourse which arises, new wants are stimulated in their bosoms. They begin to think with the new objects which occasion thought. Their views and ideas are naturally expanded to a wider compass, and they are insensibly moulded in the type of those who have excited their highest admiration and wonder. Mysterious, beneficent and wise are the ways of Providence, when even the interests of men are called into requisition to work out the great problem of their existence.

"Commerce, in fine, is what it has been beautifully entitled: 'The golden girdle of the globe.' It binds together all the great families of men. It teaches that they are creatures of like wants, errors and necessities. It determines them to be component parts of a great and magnificent system which God has devised, and which requires the concurring movements of every part to be preserved in its perfection and duration. It forbids them to treat like the ancient Roman, the foreigner cast upon their shores, as a barbarian deserving of death, or to confiscate his shipwrecked effects, but urges rather the doctrine of humanity and justice. Even the laws which regulate it are based upon the immutable principles of right, and bind upon the consciences of men from their very nature. As Mansfield, the most celebrated commercial lawyer of his age, said of them, quoting the splendid language of Cicero: 'Nec erit alia lex Romæ, alia Athenis; alia nunc, alia posthac; sed et omnes gentes, et omni tempore una lex et sempiterna, et immortalis continebat:'—they are not one law at Rome and another at Athens; they did not fluctuate from extreme to extreme; but amongst all men, and in all times, the laws of commerce are one and immutable.

"I shall not, then, be regarded as overrating the importance of the merchant classes. In England, the degree of Thane was formerly conferred upon the successful prosecutor of three voyages. 'A Prime Minister of France, and several Grand Dukes of Tuscany, are examples,' says Mr. Beawes, 'which might countenance any one remaining in trade.' 'Wise and great traders,' says Mr. Postlewhait, 'have arrived at the dignity of Lord Chancellors of England, have been created peers of the realm, bannerets, and privy councillors,' and he enumerates a long line of such, at the head of which stands Michael de la Pole. It is unnecessary for us to refer to any of the later or more numerous instances, or to those eminent men who have, in all the States of this Union, from the commercial ranks, done so much to elevate our national character and prosperity. 'The splendor, the power, the dignity, being thus raised by trade, it must be unaccountable folly and infatuation to lessen that one article in our estimation, which is the only foundation whence we all, take us as a nation, are raised, and by which we are enriched and maintained.'

"How important, then, that the mercantile classes should be liberally educated for their pursuits, and in a country like ours, that the citizens of every pursuit be possessed, at least, of the general and leading principles of our commercial operations, which are among the most important of the age."

We come now to consider the speech of Mr. Everett, the caption of which we have already given. But before drawing upon his present effort for brilliant gems of thought (as we shall do presently) let us say a word of the author in a general way.

It has been the province of Mr. Everett beyond any other American writer, to dignify and illustrate the business of making speeches. A volume of orations published by him thirteen years ago would sufficiently establish his fame as a orator and a rhetorician, had he produced nothing since; but it so happens that during these thirteen years Mr. Everett has been sending forth the most felicitous oratorical efforts of his life. A distinguishing excellence of Mr. Everett is found in the adaptation of his style to the theme and the occasion; it is severe, or ornate, but never tame or swollen, as the moment demands. Forming himself upon the established models of eloquence of all ages, he has learned from the great Roman master that there is a style for every kind of speaking.* Accordingly he never disappoints the public expectation. It is indeed true that his writings are artificial, but they are so in like manner with the finest productions of the brush and the chisel. Words are but the elements of style and he alone can acquire a perfect command of them who laboriously and patiently studies their arrangement and meaning. The mechanical finish of Powers seems to belong to Mr. Everett and when a composition has received the last touch of his pen, you can no more improve it by alteration or emendation than you can improve the Greek Slave by cutting down her features. The attempt would be equally to mar, in the one case as in the other. Mr. Everett has possessed himself of the spell which unlocks all the hidden treasures of language, he selects always the precise word for the transmission of his thought, and no synonyme can be found for it by the most dexterous critic. With these qualifications for high attainments in authorship, it has exerted surprise and regret that Mr. Everett has never produced a great work. It is possible that at this very time he is engaged upon such a performance. We should consider it a most valuable acquisition to English literature. But when we regard the many elegant specimens of oratorical skill that Mr. Everett has written of late years, and when we consider the large audiences that have been delighted and instructed by him from time to time, we are not disposed to wish that his studious moments had been otherwise employed.

This history of the present speech is as follows:

At an early period of the late session of the Massachusetts Legislature a memorial was presented praying that, when the school fund had reached the limit of one million of dollars pre-

* Nam et causæ capitis alium quendam verborum sonum requirunt, alium rerum privatarum atque parvarum; et aliud dicendi genus deliberationes, aliud laudationes, aliud iudicia, aliud sermones, aliud consolatio, aliud obijurgatio, aliud disputatio, aliud historia desiderat.

Cicero de Oratore.

scribed by law, another fund of one half a million should be allowed to accumulate for the benefit of the Colleges. The afternoon of February 7th was appointed by the Joint Committee on Education for a public hearing, in the Hall of the House of Representatives, of the friends of the Colleges, in support of the memorial. President Hopkins appeared on behalf of Williams College, President Hitchcock on behalf of Amherst College, and President Sparks and Mr. Everett on behalf of Harvard College, with other gentlemen, officers or friends of the institutions respectively.

Mr. Everett addressed the Committee in support of the memorial and made an eloquent exposition of the benefits of the collegiate system. His position are not unlike those of Mr. Holmes, but from the nature of the circumstances are more directly enforced. We are gratified to learn that the efforts of the friends of the colleges have been so far crowned with success that the Joint Committee have reported a bill providing for the accumulation of a fund of $750,000, two thirds to be appropriated to the colleges and the other $250,000 for Normal Schools and other educational purposes. We cannot resist copying the following beautiful passage with reference to self-education. Mr. E. says:

"We hear of untaught men, Sir, of Franklin and Bowditch; and heaven forbid that in the city where one was born, and the other died, their names should ever be pronounced but with veneration. But in the first place to argue from the case of such men as Franklin and Bowditch to the case of the generality of minds, would be like putting a roguish boy apprentice to a wool-comber in order that when he grows up he might write another Hamlet. But what is a self-taught man, and what does he do? He is not an untaught man; nor does he go blazing through life, like a locomotive engine in a dark night, by the light of his own intuition. Sir, a self-taught man is a man of a strong mind and stronger will who, under discouragements and in the face of obstacles, acquires the rudiments of learning; and when he has done so carries on and completes his education, by placing his understanding in contact with the cultivated intellect of other regions and other times. Franklin is certainly a most favorable specimen of a self-taught man. He was a great original interpreter of nature. The History of Science has nothing more sublime than the Courage, with which he sent his armed kite into the thunder-cloud, and drew the electric spark with his finger from the key at the end of the cord. But Franklin was a man of books,—a studious man,—a friend of academical training. Listen to what he says about the learned languages in his project for the foundation of a College, which I quote from the appendix to his life, in the admirable edition of Mr. Sparks:

"When youth are told, that the great men, whose lives and actions they read in history, spoke two of the best languages that ever were, the most expressive, copious, beautiful, and that the finest writings, the most correct compositions, the most expressive productions of human wit and wisdom, are in those languages which have endured for ages, and will endure while there are men; that no translation can do them justice, or give the pleasure found in reading the originals: that those languages contain all science; that one of them has become almost universal, being the language of learned men in all countries; and that to understand them is a distinguishing ornament; they may be thereby made desirous of learning those languages, and their industry sharpened in the acquisition of them. All intended for divinity should be taught the Latin and Greek; for physic, the Latin, Greek and French; for law, the Latin and French; merchants, the French, German and Spanish; and, though all should not be compelled to learn Latin, Greek, or the modern foreign languages, yet none that have an ardent desire to learn them should be refused; their English, Arithmetic and other studies absolutely necessary, being at the same time not neglected.

"Such is the estimate of college education formed by the self-taught Franklin, the poor boy who was born in Milk street, and whose parents fill an humble grave in yonder cemetery.

"Dr. Bowditch was perhaps more than Franklin, a self-taught man. So far is his example from proving the inutility of academic learning, that his first youthful struggle was made to acquire the Latin language; and when we think of the scientific attainments of his after life, it does make one who has had some opportunity of education in early life, hang his head in shame, to see the difficulties encountered by this great man in the outset; the simplest Latin words tamen and rursus, with their signification in English being written in the margin of the books first perused by him, in aid of a memory, which afterwards embraced the whole circle of the mathematical sciences in its iron grasp. And what was the first use made by Dr. Bowditch of the Latin tongue? to read the Principia of Sir Isaac Newton:—a man, if ever there was one among men not technically academic, who was nurtured in academic discipline:—a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge; a professor of Mathematics; a man who passed fifteen years of his life in the cloisters of a College, and solved the problem of the universe from that turret over Trinity gateway, beneath which you, sir, (Mr. Henry Herbert, a member of the University of Cambridge in England,) have passed so often with emotions, I doubt not, of veneration toward the great mind which has given immortality to the spot. This was the kindred intellect with which the mind of Bowditch sought its first communion. In the beautiful memoir of his father, which the son of Dr. Bowditch has presented to us, we read the following interesting anecdote: 'From our venerable University at Cambridge he received the highest encouragement to pursue the career upon which he had entered. In July, 1802, when his ship, the Astrea, was windbound in Boston, he went to hear the performances at the annual commencement of the College; and among the honorary degrees conferred, he thought he heard his own name announced as Master of Arts; but it was not until congratulated by a townsman and friend that he became satisfied that his senses had not deceived him. He always spoke of this as one of the proudest days of his life; and amid all the subsequent proofs which he received of the respect and esteem of his fellow citizens, and the distinctions conferred upon him from foreign countries, he recurred to this with the greatest pleasure. It is, indeed, made the subject of express mention in his will.'

"Dr. Bowditch sent three sons to the University; and as a member of the Corporation, devoted the twelve last years of his life to the management of its affairs, giving them all the force of his transcendent talents; and I think I may add, without doing injustice to any other respected name, rendering to the institution services unequalled by those of any of his associates. Sir, if it were possible to leave the question before you to the arbitrament of Dr. Bowditch, our cause would be gained."

In enforcing the adoption of a large and enlightened policy of public instruction, Mr. Everett alludes to the California Gold-fever, the last epidemic of the day. We quote the passage, which happens to be the conclusion of the speech.

"We hear much at present of veins of gold which are brought to light in almost every latitude of either hemisphere; in fact, we hear of nothing else. But I care not what mines may be opened in the North or in the South, in the mountains of Siberia or the Sierras of California; where-soever the fountains of the golden tide may gush forth, the streams will flow to the regions where educated intellect has woven the boundless network of the useful and ornamental arts. Yes, sir, if Massachusetts remains true to the policy which has hitherto in the main governed her legislation, and is not now, I trust, to be departed from, a generous wave of the golden tide will reach her distant shores. Let others

Tempt icy seas where scarce the waters roll,
Where clearer flames glow round the frozen pole;
Or under Southern skies exalt their sails,
Led by new stars, and borne by spicy gales,
For me —

yes, for me, may poor old rocky, sandy Massachusetts exclaim, land as she is of the School, the Academy, and the College;—land of the press, the lecture-room and the Church,

For me the balm shall bleed, and amber flow,
The coral redden, and the ruby glow,
The pearly shell its lucid globe infold,
And Phœbus warm the ripening ore to gold.

"It matters not if every pebble in the bed of the Sacramento were a diamond as big and as precious as the mysterious Ko-hi-noor, which we read of in the last accounts from India, on whose possession the fate of empire is believed, in those benighted regions, to depend. It matters not if this new Pactolus flow through a region which stretches for furlongs—a wide tract of solid gold. The jewels and the ingots will find their way to the great centres of civilization, where cultivated mind gives birth to the arts, and freedom renders property secure. The region itself to which these fabulous treasures are attracting the countless hosts of thrift, cupidity and adventure will derive, I fear, the smallest part of the benefit. Could they be peopled entirely with the emigrants like the best of those who have taken their departure from among us, and who carry with them an outfit of New England principles and habits, it would be well; but much I fear the gold region will, for a long time, be a scene of anarchy and confusion, of violence and bloodshed, of bewildering gains and maddening losses, of any thing but social happiness and well regulated civil liberty.

"If we will not be taught by any thing else, let us learn of history. It was not Mexico and Peru. nor (what it imports us more to bear in mind) Portugal, nor Spain, which reaped the silver and golden harvest of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. It was the industrious, enlightened, cultivated States of the north and west of Europe. It was little Holland,—scarcely one fifth as large as New England,—hardly able to keep her head above the waters of the superincumbent ocean, but with five Universities dotting her limited surface; it was England, with her foundation Schools, her indomitable public opinion, her representative system, her twin Universities;—it was to these free and enlightened countries that the gold and silver flowed; not merely adding to the material wealth of the community, but quickening the energy of the industrial classes, breaking down the remains of feudalism, furnishing the sinews of war to the champions of protestant liberty, and thus cheering them on to the great struggle, to whose successful issue it is owing, in its remote effects, under Providence, that you, Sir, sit in safety beneath the canopy that overhangs this hall.

"What the love of liberty, the care of education, and a large and enlightened regard for intellectual and moral interests, did for the parent state, they will do for us. They will give us temporal prosperity; and with it what is infinitely better; not only a name and a praise with contemporary nations who form with us the great procession of humanity, but a name and a praise among enlightened men and enlightened states to the end of time."

Our quotations have been so numerous and so extended that only a short space is left us for honorable mention of the lecture of Judge Charlton. This gentleman is favorably known for an educated taste in letters and a very pleasing gift of versification. Regarding him as an ornament to the South, we are gratified to recognise in his recent publication, a pure and chaste style of prose composition. The subject is one which very fitly brings us to a conclusion,—after what we have read of busy traffic and toilsome study,—THE POETRY OF DEATH. The solemn change is what scholar and artisan must alike undergo, and when the silver chord is loosed and the golden bowl is broken at the fountain, we may well turn from the halls of academic learning and the marts of commercial industry to receive a new admonition of the fragility of our being. After depicting in sombre colors and with deep feeling the last moments of existence under different circumstances, the eloquent lecturer says,

"There is another scene which I would fain linger on, but which I feel it is not my province to describe. I speak still of Death—not on the field—not at the stake; I speak of that death which steals upon the frame worn down with sickness and decay; no spirit-stirring scenes are around it to cheer it on; no crowd of spectators to applaud its heroism; debility and pain are its internal and surrounding circumstances; but still you can see, in the dimmed eye, the flashes of an eternal light; you may hear, in the faint voice, the accents of an eternal love! You may view the glorious hope of immortality rising up upon angels' wings; and the last word, the last look, the last breath, tell not of doubt—not of fear, but of unshaken courage, of deathless trust. It is the death bed of the christian; the tearing asunder of the soul, washed in the blood of its Saviour, from the body of sin and suffering that encompasses it. Oh, well might the inspired penman break forth in view of such a scene and such an end, with the dauntless exclamation, 'Oh death, where is thy sting! Oh grave, where is thy victory!'

"And now, my hearers, am I wrong in asserting, that there is Poetry in Death? Surely you will not say so, in view of the pictures that I have presented to you, albeit they are sketched by a feeble hand. Why, what is Poetry? Ask the mere superficial reader and observer, and he will tell you that it is thoughts in rhyme; ask the learned, the acute, keen watcher of human affairs and of nature, and he will tell you that it consists in the beautiful, wherever that may be found; whatever touches the heart, whatever purifies the mind, whatever ennobles the intellect. The sweet look of a blooming maiden, is Poetry; the chivalrous deed, is Poetry; the open hand; the self-sacrificing action; the consistent life; all these are Poetry; lines written by the sweet pencils of nature or of grace; and if I am right here, is not a holy, a beautiful, a thrilling death, Poetry? Ah yes, it is the most sublime; no human pen can write such noble epic—no human tongue can read such glorious verse. We are too apt to couple it with pain and suffering; we are too much induced to think of it as associated with the grave and with corruption. We must take our eyes off this dark picture and look forward and upward; we must never forget that life, with all its afflictions, all its darkness, is nevertheless a great blessing; but we must, at the same time, not cease to remember, that its greatest blessing consists in its being a preparation for another and an immortal state, in comparison with which, it is but darkness; and he who has duly improved the advantages of existence, and feels that he has endeavored with humility and love to perform its duties to his Maker and his neighbor, may break forth, as it sees its and approaching, in the joyful exclamation of the apostle 'the night is far spent,—the day is at hand,' the bright and beautiful morning of eternity!

"If we should regard it as an evil, still it is wisdom's part to look steadily upon it, for all evils may be mitigated by foresight and preparation. It is true that we may not avert this; it is the certain, the inevitable doom of all; we may each apply to ourselves the simple lines of the poet—

'To think of Summer yet to come,
That I shall never see;
To think a weed is yet to bloom,
From dust that I shall be.'

And we may take an enlarged view of it, we may see the mighty hand of our Maker brushing away from the face of the earth an entire generation, and then, calling out to the succeeding race, 'Come again, ye children of men;' and so shall wave after wave of mankind roll on, and roll away, until its last heave is lost in the bosom of Eternity!

EUREKA.

BY MARY G. WELLS.

"I have found it!" quoth the child
With a merry, ringing shout,
Catching what his feet beguiled
The gay, painted butterfly,
And behold—the insect dies
In his grasp, before his eyes!

In the evening's gentle hush
"I have found it" breathes the maiden,
With a softly stealing blush;
"Love, life's sweetest bliss is mine:"
Floeting joy,—she weeps alone
And her faithless lover's gone!

The flush of triumph on his brow,
"I have found it!" cries the bard,
"And what shall deprive me now
Of an everliving fame—
Of the laurel-wreath I crave?"
Lo, 'tis laid upon his grave!

"I have found it!" cries the king,
With a proud exulting smile,
As he clasps the signet ring
And the sceptre to his heart,
And his forehead feels the crown,
Which, alas, shall weigh it down!

"I have found it!" says the sage,
And uplifts his care-dim eyes
From the quaint, black-lettered page
He has scanned for live-long years;
Man! thy lore avails thee not,
Thou must share the common lot.

"I have found it!" with a sigh
Cries the weary of the world,
And my aching head shall lie
On the lap of mother earth,—
He speaks, and mighty death
Bears away his feeble breath.

"I have found it!" he can say
Who is near the narrow tomb,
Who beholds the final day
Disclosing heaven to his view,
And "Eureka!" he alone,
May exclaim with joyous tone.

THE NEW PYTHAGOREAN.

CHAPTER FOURTH.—DELOS.

If Athens was, as the great bard called it, the eye of Greece, the little island of Delos may, with quite as much justness of metaphor, be called the heart of Greece. Not that its soil was the richest of Greece, or its people the most warlike, its fortresses the most impregnable, or its citadel the most defensible. But that island, "longe clarissima, cycladum media, templo Apollinis et mercatu celebrata," was the organ, as it were, of some of the strangest social feelings of the Athenian confederacy with which it was joined. It was their treasury, their Congressional city, the Bethlehem of their purest deities, the Mecca of their pilgrimages; the spot which they purified when their fortunes were, and their deities seemed, adverse; the altar to which they sent their most sacred and mysterious offerings by their fairest and noblest messengers; the port from which the sacred bark must return before even such enemies as Melitus and Lycon and Anytus would compel the hemlock to the lips even of so dangerous a prisoner as Socrates; the sacred isle which Cicero tells us, was safe without walls—sine muro nihil timebat—when the pirates were swarming in the Greek and Italian seas, which Polycrates of Samos spared when he was irresistible on the ocean, and which even the Persians themselves dared not violate in a war which laid Athens in ruins. That island we would see, in whatever sense the vision may be won. Yet a vision of Delos as it lies in the past is the only one which is worth having. As the island now is, there is no voice of glory heard in it save the voice of the memory of far remote centuries. Like Milton's Eden after the deluge, it is but "the haunt of seals and orcs, and seamew's clang." The whole island has been rented as pasture-ground for twenty crowns a year!

Poetry sees and shows and sings Delos rising from the depths of the ocean, drifting in the Ægean sea, and at length fixed in its place, at a critical period, as a receptacle for that unpopular courtesan of the gods, the unwedded mother of Apollo. But the sterner pages of Herodotus and Thucydides exhibit scenes in Delos, in more sober colors, and more sober times, which we would rather have toiled to some high place to witness, than even the emergence of the seeming leviathan, and the smack of the perturbed waves against the sands of Rhenea and Myconos, and the drifting about of the unsteady float, and the air-borne Latona alighting upon it, trembling lest so frail a floor should yet careen with her weight, and again go down; the stroke of Lothario Jupiter's sceptre which made it fast; the relinquished pursuit of foiled Juno, and the scene beneath the sacred olive-tree which gave Apollo and Diana to Greek adoration. Let us rather look upon the Delos of historic times.

There was an annual day, in later times, when the trailing-tuniced Ionians with their children and their modest spouses, from many an Ægean island, assembled at Delos in great, joyous, bustling festal crowds, for contests of pugilism and orchestry and song;* when, among others things which awoke the spirits and gave light to the eyes of the assembly, choirs of the brightest maidens of the islands, arrayed in the most imposing forms of Greek dress, walked in graceful order through the crowd, and uttered the purest sentiments of Greek imagination in tones of the wildest and richest music of the Greek islands.

It was on one of such days—we have a hint of it from the chief actor himself†—while these bands of the fairest maidens were moving through the great crowd with measured step and voice, that suddenly a voice was heard which was none of theirs, blending with their notes, and a half joy and half surprise arose among them, and looks of enquiry and wreathed smiles were exchanged, and one said to another among them: "O girls, what prince of singers is this man who has come among us here?" And when they have seen from whence the voice comes: "This man was announced as a poor stranger and we are all so delighted with his singing!" And when no answer is returned to the enquiry, and the stranger himself has heard the gossip of the merry maidens, he answers for himself: "A blind man and he dwells in rugged Chios."—Rather than any of the scenes of a cloudy mythology, we would see the assembly of that day, with its crowd of Ionian islanders who came there with their spirits steadfastly gazing forward into the then very imperfectly explored realms of human art and intellectual beauty, its bands of Ionian maidens at length collected on the day and at the place for which their highest odes and the sweetest melodies of their voices had been reserved, on the occasion of their purest worship offered to those of their divinities for whom, alone of all the pantheon, the purest cheeks among them need not blush. Suddenly there is a pause in their measured tread. They incline their ears to catch a new voice breathing through the song, as wild souls stricken with the music of the spheres are fabled to incline their ears to the stars at night, and listen to catch more surely the strange melody—and in their own partial silence it is now distinctly audible "new as if brought from other spheres," sweet as if from the lips of Apollo himself, easily confessed to be the voice of a prince of singers. Rather than any secrets of the Hyperborean mysteries on which Herodotus so expatiates, we would have heard the voice of that question—it was doubtless one of the most queenly of the island maidens who uttered it—"who can this prince of singers be, who was announced here as a poor stranger?" Rather than the blazing wheat-straw of the Hyperborean mysteries themselves, we would see that "ἄσπληαυθε σιφίρωε," that courteous, artful, smiling evasion of the others of the choir, as if they would make sign that the strange voice itself must answer; and more than all, the pausing step and voice and the reverting head of the blind man of Chios himself, his sightless eye-balls upturned, and their lost cunning transferred to the portals of the keen ear, while, with half sad, half smiling face, and in the same gentle kind voice which had called forth the question, he answers: "A blind old man, and he dwells in rugged Chios." That scene did linger in the spirit of him who was the jewel of it—HOMER—although it reached him only through the portals of the ear.

Delos on another day within the light of assured history would be worth seeing. It is a scene reminding us of the visions of the beings of the world above, which came to the Hebrew patriarchs of old, and the significant names and monumental places connected with those visions—their Nissi, their Bethel, their Mahanaim. It seems a visible motion, among the mysteries of this life, of a spirit greater than human, greater than Apollo, or Jupiter, or Fate.

It was not lawful either to be born or to die in Delos. Both were held impure. The couch of Latona might be the couch of no one else; in the birth-place of Apollo and Diana, no one else might be born. Those who were approaching † Homer's Hymn to Apol., 165—176.

either of the two forbidden events were to embark immediately for the neighboring island of Rhœnia, which had been devoted to these purposes by a solemn bond. Death and burial in Delos had been sometimes winked at when fortune smiled on the Athenians and adverse fate seemed afar off. Pisistratus had undertaken to purify the island before the Peloponessian war, but Ananias-like, he had deceived the Latoides, and done the work but partially. He had disinterred and removed only the dead bodies which were buried within reach of the eye from the Temple. The conscience of Attic Greece was only partially purified. Thucydides tells us,* that when the Peloponessian war broke out, there was a headlong rush to arms on both sides, each seizing their sharpest weapons, because there were many youths both at Athens and at Sparta who had never seen war, and thought of it only in the hues of its romantic glory, not in those of its crimsoned battle-fields. But at that time a prodigy occurred which checked even the martial fury of the Athenian warriors. Delos was shaken by an earthquake!—as it had not been, in the memory of man, and as it had been supposed that the stroke of Jupiter's trident secured it from ever being. This shook the hearts of the Athenians. Delos then was not acceptable to the gods. The conduct of Pisistratus came into remembrance. Delos was not perfectly purified! And rashly as they were rushing to battle, this earthquake, together with a "certain oracle" to the same effect, arrested their steps, and they sent a solemn deputation to purify the soil of Delos of all the dead who had been permitted there to sleep in the dust of the earth. Perhaps classic antiquity hardly presents another scene in which the mysteries of the moral life of the Greeks stand out so palpably, as on that strange day of resurrection at Delos. It is not summer; the forests are bare except the gloomy cypresses; the fields are not waving with ripe grain, that these groups of men which appear in them, should be thought to be Delian harvesters. Nor are they sportsmen; the precincts are too sacred to permit the rude revelry of field sports. Nor are they funeral processions employed in those solemn ceremonies of respect for the dead, which will release their manes from an hundred years of vagrancy on the hither shore of the Styx. They are not indeed Delians at all; but Attic men, reversing funeral obsequies, disinterring the dead, taking away from this island the odor of death which may offend those Immortal Powers who preside over the destinies of men; obeying the dictate of last summer's earthquake, complying with that deep and strange conviction which has seized on the minds of the Attic statesmen, that all is not right between themselves and the Immortal Impersonations of truth and purity. They are purifying this soil, that they may thus purify the spirit of the Attic confederacy, and prepare it to enter with firm heart into the struggle for existence with proud Sparta. They stand in the sight of all future ages testifying by the singular and significant action in which they are employed that there is an innate moral sense in man, bearing reference to his weal or his woe, distributed by Invisible Powers above. So let every nation purify its Delos.

THE MESSAGE TO THE DEAD.

BY GRETTA.

I heard a lovely legend. It had birth
 Amid that race, that swarthy warlike race
 Once proud Columbia's kings; but over whom
 A tempest's wrath has swept, and given to earth
 The crested warrior and his gentle wife,
 Children and parent, friend and foe alike,
 Save a few stricken hearts that still beat on;
 And which like seeds before that tempest swept,
 Are scattered far in distant covert spots
 To bloom in stealthy loneliness and die!
 That race upon whose sepulchre we rear
 Our temples and our hearth-stones, and whose names
 Written in water, still as Time rolls on,
 Are deep ingulphed within the rushing stream
 Whose sweep is onward to Eternity.
 But this I heard was in the olden time
 When still the azure lake reflected back
 To Indian maids, their dark-eyed loveliness.
 They, in the sweet spring-tide's bright breezy hours
 They wandered forth, and sought an unflieg'd dove
 And caged his callow limbs with gentlest care.
 With dewy flowers, and fruits, and daintiest things,
 They stored his ozier prison, till the dawn
 Lengthened upon his pinions, and his heart
 Throb'd with quick pulse for native liberty.
 But not yet must he go, nor till there came
 At nightfall or at morn, some unseen thing
 And gave the gift of song. Then when it gush'd
 From his full throbbing throat, they bore him forth
 Warbling the while his untaught melodies—
 And on that spot in wild and shaded dell
 Or flow'ry field begirt with murmuring stream,
 Their place of graves, they oped the painted bars
 And gave the panting captive to the skies.
 But ere they said "be free," with soft caress
 They pressed him to their lips, and whisper'd low
 Fond messages of love and tales of grief
 And yearning wishes, hopes and joys and fears,
 And all that made life lovely, all that gave
 To their dark sky its gloom; while fond tears fell
 Spangling his pinions as they fain essayed
 To try their new-born strength. Then when each heart
 Had voiced its deep revealings, the restraint

Sudden was loosed, and lo! to the far heaven
 He wings his onward course; while they below
 Watch in mute faith his far careering flight,
 Like Noah's children when the sign of Hope
 Stretch'd its vast arch above the lifeless world.
 For they believed—these wild-wood denizens—
 Oh! fond belief! that this freed bird would soar
 Onward and on, nor stoop to rest his wing,
 Till far away beyond the walls of earth,
 He saw the rivers in the heavenly land
 And flow'ry groves in bright immortal bloom
 And the Great Spirit's loved ones walking there.
 Then would he pause, and seeking 'mid the throng
 The kindred of the lonely hearts he left,
 Pour forth in song their messages of love.
 Thus held these forest children, year by year,
 Their legend saith, communion with the dead.

And thou my ardent soul
 What message would'st thou give the white-winged dove
 If far away to yon eternal goal
 In hope and yearning love,
 He might go forth with thy fond burden laden
 To the bright dwellers in the distant Aiden?

Go tell the aged there
 (Now in the vigor of immortal youth
 But whose brows here were white with hoary hair)—
 Their wisdom and their truth
 The lights from heaven with which our paths they bless'd
 Have still been with us, now they are at rest.

Go tell the sons of song,
 They are not dead, that even on this earth
 The music deep and strong
 Of their great strains immortal from their birth,
 Still stirs our hearts, and all the songs we raise
 Are but faint echoes of their mightier lays!

Tell them that lovely things
 Born of their breathings linger still around;
 That in the wood, and by the gushing spring,
 Shapes of bright beauty, angels may be found
 Which they drew down, and all the starry night
 Is holy with their visions of delight.

Go tell the Brave
 Who battled in the council or the field,
 No son of freemen now can be a slave.
 Tell them they cannot yield.
 That they can die to save or to deliver
 But live to know oppression—never! never!

Tell him, Columbia's sage,
 Who turned indignant from the proffered crown,
 The proudest record on his country's page
 Is that which shows, which proves his fame our own,
 And though foul discord every bosom claimed,
 Brother would brother clasp, if he were named.

Tell him his home has grown,
 Fanned by the northern and the southern breeze,
 That here wing'd Liberty has made her throne
 Wash'd by the billows of two subject seas,
 And they her vessels sounding night and day
 Bear her free notes to distant isles away.

• • • • •
 And now forgetful heart!
 Hast thou no message for thy gentler dead,
 Those whom Fame knew not; but whose holy part
 In silent faith was acted? Those who led

My infant footsteps. Those who made earth bright
 Once to my eyes as Eden's holy light!

Yes—yes I send to thee
 Thou youthful dweller by the heavenly streams.
 Oh! how we miss thy beauty and thy glee,
 Thy ringing laugh, thy smile like moonlight gleams,
 Thou whose soft eyes could charm us like a spell,
 Thou the bright angel one, the golden-haired Estelle!

Then on and softly sing,
 Oh! gentle bird, and seek amid those bowers
 A little, lovely, laughing, fairy thing,
 Who fell asleep one day among the flowers,
 Beneath whose bloom we laid her. Go, thou dove?
 And find that spotless one, in yonder land of love.

And shall I name thee now,
 Thou whose dear memory moves me like a spell;
 Oh! how I must have loved thee, though my brow
 Was youth's glad throne, and childhood's citadel.
 For every look of thine, and every tone
 Is graven on the heart, for thee new lone.

Long years have passed,
 But yet I cannot "cannot make thee dead."
 The deep entrancing love around thee cast,
 Has not my parent with thy spirit fled.
 Nay, seek him not beyond Life's distant hour
 For my heart's yearning cry would be "return!"

Cease my too trusting soul.
 No messenger is thine to speed away
 With thy vain wishes to the eternal goal.
 A little while in hope and faith yet stay,
 And thou earth-freed, and wearing wings of light,
 May take thine onward, upward, heavenly flight.

MARGINALIA.

BY EDGAR A. POE.

If ever mortal "wreaked his thoughts upon expression," it was Shelley. If ever poet sang—as a bird sings—earnestly—impulsively—with utter abandonment—to himself solely—and for the mere joy of his own song—that poet was the author of "The Sensitive Plant." Of Art—beyond that which is instinctive with Genius—he either had little or disdained all. He really disdained that Rule which is an emanation from Law, because his own soul was Law in itself.
 His rhapsodies are but the rough notes—the stenographic memoranda of poems—memoranda which, because they were all-sufficient for his own intelligence, he cared not to be at the trouble of writing out in full for mankind. In all his works we find no conception thoroughly wrought.
 For this reason he is the most fatiguing of poets.
 Yet he wearies in saying too little rather than too much. What, in him, seems the diffuseness of one idea, is the conglomerate concision of many: and this species of concision it is, which renders him obscure. With such a man, to imitate was out of the question. It would have served no purpose; for he spoke to his own spirit alone, which would have comprehended no alien tongue. Thus he was profoundly original. His quaintness arose from intuitive perception of that truth to which Bacon alone has given distinct utterance:—"There is no exquisite Beauty which has not some strangeness in its proportions." But whether obscure, original, or quaint, Shelley had no affectations. He was at all times sincere.

From his ruins, there sprang into existence, affronting the Heavens, a tottering and fantastic pagoda, in which the salient angles, tipped with mad jangling bells, were the idiosyncratic faults of the original—faults which cannot be considered such in view of his purposes, but which are monstrous when we regard his works as addressed to mankind. A "school" arose—if that absurd term must still be employed—a school—a system of rules—upon the basis of the Shelley who had none. Young men innumerable, dazzled with the glare and bewildered by the bizarrie of the lightning that flickered through the clouds of "Alastor," had no trouble whatever in heaping up imitative vapors, but, for the lightning, were forced to be content with its spectrum, in which the bizarrie appeared without the fire. Nor were mature minds unimpressed by the contemplation of a greater and more mature; and thus, gradually, into this school of all Lawlessness,—of obscurity, quaintness and exaggeration—were interwoven the out-of-place didacticism of Wordsworth, and the more anomalous metaphysicism of Coleridge. Matters were now fast verging to their worst; and at length, in Tennyson poetic inconsistency attained its extreme. But it was precisely this extreme (for the greatest truth and the greatest error are scarcely two points in a circle) which, following the law of all extremes, wrought in him (Tennyson) a natural and inevitable revulsion; leading him first to contempt, and secondly to investigate, his early manner, and finally to winnow, from its magnificent elements, the truest and purest of all poetical styles. But not even yet is the process complete; and for this reason in part, but chiefly on account of the mere fortuitousness of that mental and moral combination which shall unite in one person (if ever it shall) the Shellyan abandon and the Tennysonian poetic sense, with the most profound Art (based both in Instinct and Analysis) and the sternest Will properly to blend and rigorously to control all—chiefly, I say, because such combination of seeming antagonisms will be only a "happy chance"—the world has never yet seen the noblest poem which, possibly, can be composed.

In my ballad called "Lenore" I have these lines:

Avant! to night my heart is light. No dirge will I up-raise—
But waft the angel on her flight with a Psalm of old days.

Mr. William W. Lord, author of "Niagara," &c., has it thus:

—They, albeit with inward pain,
Who thought to sing thy dirge, must sing thy Psalm.

The commencement of my "Haunted Palace" is as follows:

In the greenest of our valleys
By good angels tenanted,
Once a fair and stately palace
(Radiant palace!) reared its head.
In the monarch Thought's dominion—
It stood there.
Never seraph spread a pinion
Over fabric half so fair.
Banners, yellow, glorious, golden,
On its roof did float and flow—
This—all this—was in the olden
Time long ago.

Mr. Lord writes—

On the old and haunted mountain—
(There in dreams I dared to climb,)
Where the clear Castalian fountain
(Silver fountain!) ever tinkling,
All the green around it sprinkling,
Makes perpetual rhyme—
To my dream, enchanted, golden,
Came a vision of the olden
Long-forgotten time.

This* is a thin pamphlet of thirty-two pages; each containing about a hundred and forty words. The hero, Alla-Ad-Deen, is the son of Alladdin of wonderful lamp memory; and the story is in the "Vision of Mirza" or "Rasselas" way. The design is to reconcile us with evil on the ground that, comparatively, we are of little importance in the scale of creation. This scale, however, the author himself assumes as infinite; and thus his argument proves too much: for if evil is to be regarded by man as unimportant because, comparatively, he is so, it must be regarded as unimportant by the angels for a similar reason—and so on in a never-ending ascent. In other words, nothing is proved beyond the bullish proposition that evil is no evil at all.

* "The Dream of Alla-Ad-Deen, from the Romance of 'Anastasia.' By Charles Erskine White, D. D. "Charles Erskine White" is Louglton Osborn, author of "The Vision of Rubeta," "Confessions of a Poet," "Adventures of Jeremy Levin," and several other works—among which I must not forget "Arthur Caryl."

I hardly know how to account for the repeated failures of John Neal as regards the construction of his works. His art is great and of a high character—but it is massive and undetailed. He seems to be either deficient in a sense of completeness, or unstable in temperament; so that he becomes wearied with his work before getting it done. He always begins well—vigorously—startlingly—proceeds by fits—much at random—now prosing, now gossiping, now running away with his subject, now exciting vivid interest; but his conclusions are sure to be hurried and indistinct; so that the reader, perceiving a falling-off where he expects a climax, is pained, and, closing the book with dissatisfaction, is in no mood to give the author credit for the vivid sensations which have been aroused during the progress of perusal. Of all literary foibles the most fatal, perhaps, is that of defective climax. Nevertheless, I should be inclined to rank John Neal first, or at all events second, among our men of indisputable genius. Is it, or is it not a fact, that the air of a Democracy agrees better with mere Talent than with Genius?

It is not proper, (to use a gentle word,) nor does it seem courageous, to attack our foe by name in spirit and in effect, so that all the world shall know whom we mean, while we say to ourselves, "I have not attacked this man by name in the eye, and according to the letter, of the law"—yet how often are men who call themselves gentlemen, guilty of this meanness! We need reform at this point of our Literary Morality:—very sorely, too, at another—the system of anonymous reviewing. Not one respectable word can be said in defence of this most unfair—this most despicable and cowardly practice.

There lies a deep and seal'd well
Within yon leafy forest hid,
Whose pent and lonely waters swell
Its confines chill and drear amid.

This putting the adjective after the noun is, merely, an inexcusable Gallicism; but the putting the preposition after the noun is alien to all language and in opposition to all its principles. Such things, in general, serve only to betray the versifier's poverty of resource; and, when an inversion of this kind occurs, we say to ourselves, "Here the poet lacked the skill to make out his line without distorting the natural or colloquial order of the words." Now and then, however, we must refer the error not to deficiency of skill, but to something far less defensible—to an idea that such things belong to the essence of poetry—that it needs them to distinguish it from prose—that we are poetical, in a word, very much in the ratio of our unprosaicalness at these points. Even while employing the phrase "poetic license,"—a phrase which has to answer for an infinity of sins—people who think in this way seem to have an indistinct conviction that the license in question involves a necessity of being adopted. The true artist will avail himself of no "license" whatever. The very word will disgust him; for it says—"Since you seem unable to manage without these peccadillo advantages, you must have them, I suppose; and the world, half-shutting its eyes, will do its best not to see the awkwardness which they stamp upon your poem."

Few things have greater tendency than inversion, to render verse feeble and ineffective. In most cases where a line is spoken of as "forcible," the force may be referred to directness of expression. A vast majority of the passages which have become household through frequent quotation, owe their popularity either to this directness, or, in general, to the scorn of "poetic license." In short as regards verbal construction, the more prosaic a poetical style is, the better. Through this species of prosaicism, Cowper, with scarcely one of the higher poetical elements, came very near making his age fancy him the equal of Pope; and to the same cause are attributable three-fourths of that unusual point and force for which Thomas Moore is distinguished. It is the prosaicism of these two writers to which is owing their especial quotability.

"The Reverend Arthur Coxe's 'Saul, a Mystery,' having been condemned in no measured terms by Poe, of 'The Broadway Journal,' and Green of 'The Emporium,' a writer in the 'Hartford Columbian' retorts as follows:

An entertaining history,
Entitled 'Saul, A Mystery,'
Has recently been published by the Reverend Arthur Coxe.
The poem is dramatic,
And the wit of it is attic,
And its teachings are emphatic of the doctrines orthodox.

But Mr. Poe, the poet,
Declares he cannot go it—
That the book is very stupid, or something of that sort:
And Green, of the Emporium,
Um, tells a kindred story,
And swears like any tory that it is'n't worth a groat.

But maugre all the croaking
Of the Raven and the joking
Of the verdant little fellow of the used to be review,
The People, in derision
Of their impudent decision,
Have declared, without division, that the Mystery will do.

The truth, of course, rather injures an epigram than otherwise; and nobody will think the worse of the one above, when I say that, at the date of its first appearance, I had expressed so opinion whatever of the poem to which it refers. "Give a dog a bad name," &c. Whenever a book is abused, people take it for granted that it is I who have been abusing it.

Latterly I have read "Saul," and agree with the epigrammatist, that it "will do"—whoever attempts to wade through it. It will do, also, for trunk-paper. The author is right in calling it "A Mystery:"—for a most unfathomable mystery it is. When I got to the end of it I found it more mysterious than ever—and it was really a mystery how I ever did get to the end—which I half fancied that somebody had cut off, in a fit of ill-will to the critics. I have heard not a syllable about the "Mystery," of late days. "The People," seem to have forgotten it; and Mr. Coxe's friends should advertise it under the head of "Mysterious Disappearance"—that is to say, the disappearance of a Mystery.

The pure Imagination chooses, from either Beauty or Deformity, only the most combinable things hitherto uncombined; the compound, as a general rule, partaking, in character, of beauty, or sublimity, in the ratio of the respective beauty or sublimity of the things combined—which are themselves still to be considered as atomic—that is to say, as previous combinations. But, as often analogously happens in physical chemistry, so not unfrequently does it occur in this chemistry of the intellect, that the admixture of two elements results in a something that has nothing of the qualities of one of them, or even nothing of the qualities of either. . . Thus, the range of Imagination is unlimited. Its materials extend throughout the universe. Even out of deformities it fabricates that Beauty which is at once its sole object and its inevitable test. But, in general, the richness or force of the matters combined; the facility of discovering combinable novelties worth combining; and, especially the absolute "chemical combination" of the completed mass—are the particulars to be regarded in our estimate of Imagination. It is this thorough harmony of an imaginative work which so often causes it to be undervalued by the thoughtless, through the character of obviousness which is superinduced. We are apt to find ourselves asking why it is that these combinations have never been imagined before.

"He (Bulwer) is the most accomplished writer of the most accomplished era of English Letters; practising all styles and classes of composition, and eminent in all—novelist, dramatist, poet, historian, moral philosopher, essayist, critic, political pamphleteer;—in each superior to all others, and only rivalled in each by himself."

Ward—author of "Tremaine."

The "only rivalled in each by himself," here, puts me in mind of None but himself can be his parallel.

But surely Mr. Ward (who, although he did write "De Vers," is by no means a fool) could never have put to paper, in his sober senses, anything so absurd as the paragraph quoted above, without stopping at every third word to hold his sides, or thrust his pocket-handkerchief into his mouth. If the serious intention be insisted upon, however, I have to remark that the opinion is the mere opinion of a writer remarkable for no other good trait than his facility at putting his readers to sleep according to rules Addisonian and with the least possible loss of labor and time. But as the mere opinion of even a Jeffrey or a Macaulay, I have an inalienable right to meet it with another.

As a novelist, then, Bulwer is far more than respectable; although generally inferior to Scott, Godwin, D'Israeli, Miss Burney, Sue, Dumas, Dickens, the author of "Ellen Wareham," the author of "Jane Eyre," and several others. From the list of foreign novels I could select a hundred which he could neither have written nor conceived. As a dramatist, he deserves more credit, although he receives less. His "Richelieu," "Money" and "Lady of Lyons," have done much in the way of opening the public eyes to the true value of what is superciliously termed "stage-effect" in the hands of one able to manage it. But if commendable at this point, his dramas fail egregiously in points more important; so that, upon the whole, he can be said to have written a good play, only when we think of him in connexion with the still more contemptible "old-dramatist" imitators who are his contemporaries and friends. As historian, he is sufficiently dignified, sufficiently ornate, and more than sufficiently self-sufficient. His "Athens" would have received an Etonian prize, and has all the happy air of an Etonian prize-essay re-vamped. His political pamphlets are very good as political pamphlets and very disreputable as anything else. His essays leave no doubt upon any body's mind that, with the writer, they have been essays indeed. His criticism is really beneath contempt. His moral philosophy is the most ridiculous of all the moral philosophies that ever have been imagined upon earth.

"The men of sense," says Helvetius, "those idols of the unthinking, are very far inferior to the men of passions. It is the strong passions which, rescuing us from sloth, can alone impart to us that continuous and earnest attention necessary to great intellectual efforts."

When the Swiss philosopher here speaks of "inferiority," he refers to inferiority in worldly success:—by "men of sense" he intends indolent men of genius. And Bulwer is, emphatically, one of the "men of passions" contemplated in the apothegm. His passions, with opportunities, have made him what he is. Urged by a rabid ambition to do much, in doing nothing he would merely have proved himself an idiot. Something he has done. In aiming at Crichton, he has hit the target an inch or two above Harrison Ainsworth. Not to such intellects belong the honors of universality. His works bear about them the unmistakable indications of mere talent—talent, I grant of an unusual order and nurtured to its extreme of development with a very tender and elaborate care. Nevertheless, it is talent still. Genius it is not. And the proof is, that while we often fancy ourselves about to be enkindled beneath its influence, fairly enkindled we never are. That Bulwer is no poet, follows as a corollary from what has been already said:—for to speak of a poet without genius, is merely to put forth a flat contradiction in terms.

Quaintness, within reasonable limits, is not only not to be regarded as affectation, but has its proper uses, in aiding a fantastic effect. Miss Barret will afford me two examples. In some lines to a Dog, she says :

Leap! thy broad tail waves a light.
Leap thy slender feet are bright,
Canopied in fringes.
Leap! those tasselled ears of thine
Flicker strangely fair and fine
Down their golden inches.

And again—in the "Song of a Tree-Spirit."

The Divine impulsion cleaves
In dim movements to the leaves
Dropt and lifted—dropt and lifted—
In the sun-light greenly sifted—
In the sun-light and the moon-light
Greenly sifted through the trees.
Ever wave the Eden trees
In the night-light and the moon-light,
With a rustling of green branches
Shaded off to resonances
Never stirred by rain or breeze.

The thoughts here belong to a high order of poetry, but could not have been wrought into effective expression, without the aid of those repetitions—those unusual phrases—those quaintnesses, in a word, which it has been too long the fashion to censure, indiscriminately, under the one general head of "affectation." No poet will fail to be pleased with the two extracts I have here given; but no doubt there are some who will find it hard to reconcile the psychal impossibility of refraining from admiration, with the too-hastily attained mental conviction that, critically, there is nothing to admire.

LIFE AND TIMES OF GEORGE II.*

This remarkable book was written more than a century ago. The author's son, the third Earl of Bristol, became possessed of the manuscript, and "gave strict injunctions in his will that no publication should be made of it until the decease of his Majesty George III." Certain causes, principally the fact that persons still lived whose immediate ancestors were pourtrayed with either too much truth, or too much malevolence, (perhaps with too much of both.) occasioned a still greater delay in the publication. In the meantime the existence of the Memoirs, announced by Horace Walpole in his catalogue of Royal and noble authors, has been a matter of interest to men of letters; some of whom, Lord Hailes amongst them, have looked to the eventual publication as a means of explaining some mysteries as to which historians were at fault. The work has at last been published, and we propose to give a somewhat extended notice of it. Perhaps we should have done this some months ago; but Delay seems to have been the Fate of the book, and it has touched even us. We have, however, the certainty, from the character of the Memoirs, that we shall not be raking after a dead book, or going on the track of an ephemeral production the value and interest of which have ceased to be considered. Indeed we are pretty sure that those of our usual readers who have become familiar with the Memoirs, will be the most willing to go over again with us some of the remarkable portraits and some of the spicy trifles with which they abound.

John, Lord Hervey belonged to a family whose peculiarities of mind and character are much noticed by contemporary writers. Lady Mary Wortley Montagu "divided the human species into men, women, and Herveys." Carr, Lord Hervey, our author's elder brother, who died at an early age, was a man of every irregularity of conduct, but of rare endowments: Horace Walpole says that "he was reckoned to have had parts superior to those of his more celebrated brother;" Pope speaks of him as one "whose early death deprived the family of the Herveys of as much wit and honor as he left behind him in any branch of it." He was celebrated for his "feminine style of beauty, for winning manners, for an original wit, and for the licentious practices which brought his rash and brilliant life to an untimely end." Horace Walpole, as marked a man as most in the list of English authors, was probably another of these Herveys; Lady Louisa Stuart declares that he was notoriously the son of Carr, Lord Hervey. Whether he was or was not, the reader of these Memoirs will doubtless come to the conclusion that Sir Robert Walpole was just the man, incredulous of virtue, and below, (he would have said above.) the common sensibilities of wronged husbands, to think on the one hand the illegitimacy of his wife's son quite probable, and on the other hand to care nothing at all about such a trifle.

Lord Hervey, our author, was as peculiar as any of his peculiar family. He was distinguished by a mordicant and bitter wit, utter want of heart, a penetrating intellect, the feminine beauty which we have noticed in his brother, and by many graces and accomplishments personal and intellectual. He was an orator of considerable pretension, if not of considerable force. His style as a writer is clear, sharply edged and telling; perhaps he carries antithesis to extremes. Pope has given us a malicious, exaggerated portrait of him, which would yet destroy him to posterity if he had been a much better man than he was. He is the Sporus of the prologue to the satires, (epistle to Arbuthnot)—

P. Let Sporus tremble—

A. What! that thing of silk?

Sporus! that mere white curd of ass's milk?
Satire or sense alas! can Sporus feel?
 Who breaks a butterfly upon a wheel?
P. Yet let me flap this bug with gilded wings,
 This painted child of dirt that stinks and stings!
 Whose buzz the witty and the fair annoys;
 Yet wit ne'er tastes and beauty ne'er enjoys;
 As well-bred spaniels civilly delight
 In mumbling of the game they dare not bite.
 Eternal smiles his emptiness betray,
 As shallow streams run dimpling all the way.
 Whether in florid impotence he speaks
 And as the prompter breathes the puppet squeaks;
 Or at the ear of Eve, familiar toad!
 Half froth, half venom, spits himself abroad,
 In pen or politics, or tales or lies,
 Or spite, or smut, or rhymes, or blasphemies.
 His wit all see-saw between that and this,
 Now high, now low, now Master up, now Miss,
 And he himself one vile antithesis.
 Amphibious thing! that acting either part,
 The trifling head or the corrupted heart,
 Fop at the toilet, flatterer at the board,
 Now trips a lady, and now struts a lord,
Eve's tempter thus the rabbins have expressed
 A cherub's face—a reptile all the rest!
 Beauty that shocks you, parts that none can trust,
 Wit that can creep, and pride that licks the dust."

There is no escape from the effect of such a closing, as that, of the venomous teeth; Pope was a bitter, malignant little wretch, who made his brilliant genius and exquisite skill in his art the instruments of injustice and hatred, but nevertheless Sporus is demolished.

The means which Lord Hervey possessed of knowing those matters of which he writes were abundant. He was vice chamberlain to Queen Caroline, her confidante, the friend whom Sir Robert Walpole kept for fourteen years of his ministry "squat at Eve's ear," a master of court festivals, a getter up of tableaux and games for the amusement of the princesses Emily and Caroline, the king's occasional antagonist at whist or ombre or even pat, for the royal taste in gambling was not over-nice, in a word a fixture of the court with abundant opportunities to know its secrets and the characters of all who belonged to it. In addition he was long a member of the House of Commons, and came eventually into the House of Lords, and of course was fully cognizant of the politics and public temper of his times. With such opportunities afforded by his position Lord Hervey seems to have dealt in the spirit of a Boswell; no saying, or occurrence, or trait of character, if there was point in it, seems to have been so minute as to escape him.

The court of George II., as we find it presented in these volumes was pretty much a combination of Dutch grossness and French licentiousness. The king was a pragmatist little man, fond of chariots and fat mistresses; he insulted every one about him habitually, and played the by no means conflicting parts of coward to his people and tyrant to his household; he seems to have been utterly unable to perceive the least meaning in such words as sentiment and generosity; he hated his eldest son and heir apparent, Frederick, so genuinely, that the death of "poor Fritz" gave him a pleasure too intense for concealment; he snubbed his daughters so incessantly that with quite a similarity of disposition these estimable princesses were accustomed to call him a brute at his back, and to sulk in his august presence; he wronged, scolded, worried, his shrewd and submissive queen, who yet, by flattery and caresses, and by a cunning interpolation of her ideas with his own until all seemed his own alike, led him by a fine hook in the nose; he was altogether as worrying, as ill-tempered, as vain-glorious, as intensely selfish, as fussy, as strutting, as utterly disagreeable a little beast as ever wore the royal lion's skin. One evil thing he was not—he was not a tyrant to his people; but then it must be considered that he was dreadfully afraid of them, that the House of Hanover has only ruled by popular permission, that a very small matter would have fired the petard and hoisted him out of his British dominions; besides it was quite in his power to indulge his despotic disposition in a petty but constant way against wife, children, mistresses, courtiers, grooms and other servants—and his ebullitions found this safer escape. The only act at all timetured wit generosity, which Lord Hervey has recorded of his majesty, was a gift of some Flemish horses which he made to the queen; a gift, says our author, which operated a convenience to the donor, not to the receiver, for his majesty had the use of the horses whilst the queen paid out of her separate income for keeping them. To what uses his majesty put the animals of his stud we are enabled to form a lively idea. Those seem to have been awful days to Lord Hervey, when the king made him a party in the drivings and counterdrivings, with which, fancying that to move rapidly was to be energetic and usefully busy, he so often afflicted his household. The queen, sick, forlorn, with inflamed eyes, a cold in the head, a weary spine, groaning helas! to her vice-chamberlain who clings desperately to a mettlesome, galloping cob at her chariot window, and chokes with dust, and meditates, as well as the thumping bounds of his horse permit, upon the beauties of regicide,—this is a picture to which our author no doubt often reverted to quicken his ferocity against his royal master. Whilst on this subject of the royal chariotteering, we must request the reader to give particular notice to an anecdote in the Memoirs, very characteristic, and showing the relative values which the king attached to the lives of grooms and carriage horses.

It is possible that his majesty possessed along with his brutality, selfishness, and habitual insolence, the capability of being thrilled by the narration of heroic deeds. But as the possession of such a capability generally infers something of the heroic temper itself in the possessor, we are hardly clear upon the point. We were struck with the manner in which his majesty is made, in the Memoirs, to speak of the character and fate of a brave Frenchman, Count Plelo, who fell at Dantzic. This Count Plelo, a man bred in camps, but who had become ambassador of France at the court of Denmark, volunteered to re-load a repulsed body of the French to the breach at Dantzic. In a civilian's dress and with only a gentleman's rapier in his hand, this high-spirited man marched to the breach shouting avancez—avancez! He was slain by a shot from some officer behind him—of his own party—whose cowardice the fine gallantry of the count rebuked. Lord Hervey tells us that “when the king of England related this history of Count Plelo to his courtiers at Richmond, he said with tears in his eyes—‘It was a brave action; he was a fine fellow. I think a prince is too happy who has such subjects.’”

It must be a nature in some respects fine that can shed genuine tears over an action of high daring and a gallant death. But his majesty's family, who doubtless knew him very well, were accustomed to sneer at his heroic ardors as affectations. And to confirm their judgment on this head we have some circumstances attending one of the returns from Hanover. On the eve of the king's embarkation at Helvoetsluys the weather threatened so stormily that Sir Charles Wager, admiral, refused to put to sea. His majesty urged the vehis Cæsarem until his trembling pages were full of admiration; and Sir Charles sulking and swearing attempted the voyage. In three days the king's yacht crept back to Helvoetsluys as much damaged as the royal courage was—which is saying a great deal. It was with considerable difficulty that his majesty could be got on board again, to re-attempt the passage, even after a long delay, and the apparent return of safe fair weather. But sea-sickness may be too much for even a hero—who may have a “doughty stomach” under all other trials. Altogether it is impossible to know whether his majesty would have distinguished himself in battles had he fought them, or enacted the hero had occasion offered. Sir Robert Walpole, a sensible people, and his own Dutch economy, made his reign pacific, and the caged Lion could only show his martial ardors by roaring.

But one thing, at least, George II. did very well; he wrote letters to women in a most graceful and charming style. Whilst in Hanover, where he spent so much of his time,* he wrote to his wife at about the rate of forty pages weekly. These letters were often shown to Sir Robert Walpole and Lord Hervey, and the former was accustomed to say “if the king was to write to women, and never to strut and to talk to them, he would get the better of all the men in the world with them.” The forty pages weekly were chronicles of his amours; this singular little husband made his wife a confidante in such matters. Her indulgence to his irregularities of this kind was indeed a principal means of swaying him.

* The king's visits to Hanover made the subject of a great many pasquinades, caricatures, &c., amongst his English subjects. “An old, lean, lame, blind horse was turned into the streets with a broken saddle on his back, and a pillion behind it, and on the horse's forehead this inscription was fixed: ‘Let nobody stop me; I am the King's Hanover equipage, going to fetch his majesty and his — to England.’”

At the Royal Exchange, a paper with these words was stuck up:

‘It is reported that his Hanoverian majesty designs to visit his British dominions for three months in the spring.’

On St. James's gate this advertisement was posted:

‘Lost or strayed out of this house, a man who has left a wife and six children on the parish; whoever will give any tidings of him to the churchwarden of St. James's Parish, so as he may be got again, shall receive four shillings and sixpence reward. N. B. This reward will not be increased, nobody judging him to deserve a crown.’

[Memoirs, vol. 2, p. 150.]

From his answer to one of her letters advising him to bring his mistress, Madame Walmoden, the heroine of the singular ladder-story recounted in the Memoirs, home with him, we have a few sentences extracted which show in a small compass the extreme grace and elegance of his majesty's style.

"Mais vous voyez mes passions ma chère Caroline! Vous connaissez mes foiblesses, il n'y a rien de caché dans mon cœur pour vous, et plutôt à Dieu que vous pourriez me corrégier avec la même facilité que vous m'approfondissez! Plût à Dieu que je pourrais vous imiter autant que je sais vous admirer, et que je pourrais apprendre de vous toutes les vertus que vous me faites voir, sentir, et aimer!"

How the king possessed the Gallic genius for this sort of graceful writing, in conjunction with his Hanoverian atrocities and bestialities, is wonderful enough. In one of his letters is the most extraordinary proposition ever made by husband to wife. If it were not so characteristic of his majesty, we should certainly hesitate to quote it, although the fastidious English editor, who has expurgated the Memoirs, has permitted the passage to appear. His majesty desires the queen to contrive if she can that Francis d'Esté, Prince of Modena, who is expected to visit England, shall bring with him his wife, the beautiful but not virtuous Charlotte Aglat, daughter of the Regent Duke of Orleans; and gives as a reason that he had heard that her Highness is no better than she should be, and that he has the greatest inclination to pay his addresses to a daughter of France—"un plaisir que je suis sûr, ma chère Caroline, vous serez bien aise de me procurer, quand je vous dis combien je le souhaite."

We conclude our notice of the king with a specimen of his manner to his dying wife. The poor queen lies on her bed with eyes fixed on vacancy: his majesty remonstrates—"Mon Dieu, madame! why do you fix your eyes so? What do you regard there? Your eyes resemble the popped eyes of a calf when they go to cut his throat."

So much for his majesty George II., of whom our much is the merest possible trifle compared with the atrocities recounted of him in the book we review.

Queen Caroline, as Lord Hervey portrays her, was on the one hand a jolly, fun-loving, vivacious matron, somewhat addicted to the "spite and snarl" in which Sporus seems to have been a proficient; but this honest and fruitful matron with her broad humor, and flowing spirits, was singularly sagacious, capable of long continued dissimulation, and could, when occasion offered, wield her tongue like a rapier, and slay character, or parry sharp assaults, in quite an elegant and glittering manner. Sir Robert Walpole called her on one occasion "a fat b—h;" but her conversations are often sparkling and pretty; her fidelity to the king and her approved friends, seems to have been unalterable; and even where most implacable to her enemies she is often so piquant, transfixes so beautifully, that, caring nothing at this distant day for her victims, we are delighted. Such a woman, in spite of her embonpoint, is scarcely the human animal which Sir Robert's silhouette dash of description would make of her. Lord Hervey lived on terms of great intimacy with the queen; he was her 'poor my Lord Hervey,' her 'opinionâtre devil,' &c.; she seems to have treated him at all times with affectionate freedom, whilst he speaks as well of her as it was in his nature to speak of any one. We have many a sly and detractive observation upon his patroness, and her last sickness is detailed with a bestial indecency, and a clear want of feeling, worthy of that devoted character, Sir Mungo Malagrowth, who was so fond of visiting his friends in their affliction.

The queen abhorred her eldest son, Frederick Prince of Wales, as much as the king did; and her animosity was the most effective of the two, for whilst his majesty only cheated him out of his revenue, and "damned him daily for a liar, a scoundrel, a fool, a beast, a disgusting puppy," &c., &c., the maternal tongue rained sarcasms, clinging nicknames, calumnies, pointed contempts, sufficiently to quell not only "poor Fritz," but every forlorn courtier that, speculating on a post obit, clung to his skirts, from Cartretdown to Bubb Dodginton. The mother could however, condescend at times to abuse as bluntly as the father. On one occasion—"My dear Lord Hervey," quoth the queen, "I will give it you under my hand, if you are in fear of my relapsing, that my dear first born is the greatest ass, and the greatest liar, and the greatest canaille, and the greatest beast in the whole world, and that I most heartily wish he was out of it." The reader will find much both to amuse and to sicken him in the quarrels of the households of the king and prince. The whole story of the scamperings, mysteries, and dangers attending the birth of the Prince's daughter, afterwards Duchess of Brunswick, whom Lord Hervey saw in her infancy, and describes as "a little rat of a girl about the bigness of a large tooth-pick case," is quite as droll as any thing we have recently met with.

As the king, like master Rodolph, the steward of the Prince of Little Lilliput, was fond of having very short persons about him, so his middle-aged queen was fond of having for foils a parcel of elderly dowdyish ladies. Alas! for the court that rejects the fair looks of young beauty while it retains its unchaste wiles!

We must hurry over the rest of the royal family. We give the character of the Princess Emily in Lord Hervey's own words.

"Princess Emily had much the least sense, except her brother, of the family, but had for two years much the prettiest person. She was lively, false and a great liar; did many ill offices to people and no good ones; and for want of prudence, said as many shocking things to their faces, as for want of good nature or truth she said disagreeable ones behind their backs. She had as many enemies as acquaintances, for nobody knew without disliking her."

Princess Caroline, with whom Lord Hervey was suspected of maintaining too great an intimacy, was, we are told, amiable, but dowdyish in her person, corpulent, and afflicted with rheumatic pains in her legs.

The Princess of Orange, the married sister of these royal maidens—or, to use a safer expression, dameels—was silly, self-willed, and until she became too corpulent a great romp; from a sluggishness or absence of the imaginative faculty she was not so expert a liar as her sister Emily, but, like stout Hubert the archer, she did her best. Her husband, the Prince of Orange, is described by our amiable author as follows:

"When he was undressed and came in his night-gown and night-cap into the room to go to bed, the appearance he made was as indescribable as the astonished countenances of every body who beheld him. From the shape of his brocaded gown, and the make of his back, he looked behind as if he had no head, and before as if he had no neck and no legs."

With this abominable body the prince possessed a gallant, truthful, and gentle spirit, and a grave firmness worthy of his great predecessor, William the Silent, but of course Lord Hervey was not fond of perceiving high qualities in man or woman.

As for the "whipping boy" of the Memoirs, Prince Frederick, here is a condensed character written in balanced phrases.

"He was at once both false and sincere; he never told the truth when he pretended to confide, and was ever telling the most improper and dishonest truths whenever any body else had confided in him. He was at once both lavish and avaricious, and always both in the wrong place; he was profuse without liberality, and avaricious without economy. He desired without love, could laugh without being pleased and weep without being grieved; for which reason his mistresses never were fond of him, his companions never pleased with him, and those he seemed to commiserate never relieved by him. When he aimed at being merry in company, it was in so tiresome a manner that his mirth was to reel cheerfulness what wet wood is to fire, that damps the flame it is brought to feed. His irresolution would make him take any body's advice who happened to be with him; so that jealousy of being thought to be influenced, (so prevalent in weak people, and consequently those who are most influenced,) always made him say something depreciating, to the next comer, of him that advised him last. With these qualifications, true to nobody, and seen through by every body, it is easy to imagine nobody had any regard for him: what regard, indeed, was it possible any body could have for a man who had no truth in his words, no justice in his inclination, no integrity in his commerce, no sincerity in his professions, no stability in his attachments, no sense in his conversation, no dignity in his behaviour, and no judgment in his conduct?"

We have quoted the queen's wish that "Fritz was out of the world;" the dutiful son retaliated it honestly. When the queen lay on her death-bed "the prince used to sit up in his house in Pall Mall almost the whole night and every night, sending messengers continually to St. James's, showing the utmost impatience for their return, and saying with equal prudence and humanity to the people who were with him, 'Well, sure we shall soon have good news; she cannot hold out much longer;' and talked all day long in the same strain to every body about him."

Beyond the precincts of the royal family, with whom we have been dealing, and with whom we have perhaps tarried too long, moved many bright and noble figures—Bolingbroke, Chatham, then Cornet Pitt, undistinguished but beginning to be feared, Chesterfield, Pulteney, and a crowd of others. Lord Hervey slaughters them in a magnificent manner. Here we have Bolingbroke.

"His character was so mixed that he had certainly some qualifications that the greatest men might be proud of, and many which the worst would be ashamed of: he had fine talents, a natural eloquence, great quickness, a happy memory, and very extensive knowledge: but he was vain, much beyond the general run of mankind, timid, false, injudicious, and ungrateful; elate and insolent in power, dejected and servile in disgrace: few people ever believed him without being deceived, or trusted him without being betrayed: he was one to whom prosperity was no advantage, and adversity no instruction: he had brought his affairs to that pass that he was almost as much distressed in his private fortunes as desperate in his political views, and was upon such a foot with the world that no king would employ him, no party support him, and few particulars defend him; his enmity was the contempt of those he attacked, and his friendship a weight and reproach to those he adhered to. Those who were most partial to him, could not but allow that he was ambitious without fortitude, and enterprising without resolution; that he was fawning without insinuation and insinuation core without art; that he had admirers without friendship, and followers without attachment, parts without probity, knowledge without conduct, and experience without judgment. This was certainly his character and situation; but since it is the opinion of the wise, the speculative and the learned, that most men are born with the same propensities, actuated by the same passions, and conducted by the same original principles, and differing only in the manner of pursuing the same ends, I shall not so far chime in with the bulk of Lord Bolingbroke's contemporaries as to pronounce he had more failings than any man ever had; but it is impossible to see all that is written, and hear all that is said of him, and not allow that if he had not a worse heart than the rest of mankind, at least he must have had much worse luck."

And here we have Lord Chesterfield:—

"Lord Chesterfield had more conversable entertaining table-wit than any man of his time; propensity to ridicule, in which he indulged himself with infinite humor and no distinction, and with inexhaustible spirits and no discretion, made him sought and feared, liked and not loved, by most of his acquaintance; no sex, no relation, no rank, no power, no profession, no friendship, no obligation, was a shield from those pointed glittering weapons which seemed to shine only to a stander-by, but cut deep in those they touched. As for want of principle he often sacrificed his character to his interest, so for want of prudence he often sacrificed his interest to his vanity as a wit. In person he was very short, disproportioned, thick and clumsily made; had a broad, rough-featured, ugly face, with black teeth, and a head big enough for a Polyphemus. One Ben Ashurst, who said few good things, though admired for many, told Lord Chesterfield once that he was like a stunted giant—which was a humorous idea, and really apposite. Such a thing would disconcert Lord Chesterfield as much as it would have done anybody who had neither his wit nor his assurance on other occasions; for though he could attack vigorously, he could defend but weakly, his quickness never showing itself in reply any more than his understanding did in argument. * * * He never considered what was true or false, but related every thing, in which he had no interest, just as his imagination suggested it would tell best. * * * Patriotism, adherence to a party, the love of one's country, and a concern for the public, were his common topics for ridicule; he would not scruple to own that he thought the laws of honor in men and the rules of virtue in women, like the tenets of an established religion, very proper things to inculcate, but with the people of sense and discernment, of both sexes, to be professed without being regarded, and transgressed whilst recommended. * * He was a dishonest, irresolute, imprudent creature, capable only of being a disagreeable enemy."

Of Lord Townshend we are told that—"He was much more tenacious of his opinion than of his word; for the one he never gave up, and the other he seldom kept. It was as difficult to make him just as to make him reasonable; and as hard to obtain anything from him as to convince. He was blunt without being severe, and false without being artful; for when we designed to be most so his insinuating grin was so shocking that every one was naturally repelled or put upon guard. He had been so long in business that notwithstanding his slow blundering capacity, he might have got through the routine of his employment if he had not thought himself as much above that part of a statesman as all mankind thought any other above him. He loved deep schemes and extensive projects, and affected to strike what is commonly called great strokes in politics—things which, considering the nature of the English government, a wise minister would be as incapable of concerting, as Lord Townshend would have been of executing them if there was a necessity. He had been the most frequent speaker in the House of Lords for many years, and was as little improved as if there had been no room for it."

In addition to these elaborated portraits of the more prominent characters of the time the memoirs abound in descriptive dashes which doubtless with much wild exaggeration present some truth: here is one of these common beetles with a pin stuck through him, exhibited with a vengeance.

"It was as much a matter of wonder in the town, how so insignificant a creature as Lord Clinton (Hugh Fortescue, afterwards Earl of Lincoln) when he was dismissed from court, could contrive to make himself considerable enough to be turned out, as it was at his entrance there how he had been thought of consequence enough ever to be taken in. He was a man of a mean aspect, a meaner capacity, but meanest of all in his inclinations: his dialect and his whole conversation was a heap of vulgarisms both as to sentiment and expression, and his only mark of thinking was his pursuit and love of money."

Of Lord Carteret's style as a writer, Lord Hervey says, in one of his conversations with the Queen,—

"What I have seen of it always seemed to me to be inaccurate, with a strong touch of bombast mixed with vulgarisms; and like some ungenteel people's dress, whom one sees at once over fine and yet fine but by halves, in a coat embossed instead of embroidered, and a dirty coarse shirt."

The portraits, specimens of which we have given, abound in the memoirs; there are perhaps hundreds of them; all are marked by ill-nature, and all are wonderfully clever. Of course no work of this sort, coming from one so bitter, so full of a venomous and detraction animosity to his kind, can be quite trusted. The very style moreover in which the quoted passages are written should excite our distrust. This eternal antithesis tempts the author prodigiously to exaggeration or positive falsehood. If the character subjected to comment possesses a virtue there must be a vice to balance against it or there can be no antithesis: and your piquant dexterous, exquisitely polished writers who run a pen through character with no evident reluctance, are hardly the persons to sacrifice artistical effects to truth or humanity. The see-saws of these antithetical writers—Pope himself included in the category—have, we suspect, pretty generally a truth at one end of the plank and a lie at the other. Lord Hervey, in particular, seems to us to have been scarcely the person to hesitate to damn an acquaintance where the point and polish of his sentences required it.

There is one remarkable omission in these volumes; with the exception of Gay, who is called one Gay, and only alluded to in connection with the political under-meaning of the Beggar's Opera, there does not occur once the name of any contemporary literary character, in the whole work. This strikes us as very singular when we reflect upon the social position of the best of the brilliant literary men of his time, and the extent to which for a large space in his life Lord Hervey must have been associated with them. He had graduated at Cambridge, travelled on the continent, returned and become a favorite at the court which George II., then Prince of Wales, maintained at Richmond, as early as 1717. This was the very period of those fantastic amusements which, at that court, Pope—submitting his little, feeble and crooked person to affected endearments which forced tears of pain and smiles of vanity to his poor boyish face—shared with the mad-caps, Miss Bellenden and Miss Lepell. Lord Hervey was one of the set; he soon after married the most beautiful and witty of these hoydens—Miss Lepell. At Chelsea, beyond the rural district lying between Kensington and the Thames, long since absorbed by the exorbitant city but then a region of green hedges and fields bright with daisies, frequented by cockney sportsmen and milk-maids, Addison, the husband of a countess, still lived in Holland House. These were persons certainly of sufficient note (even if the crowd of others, Ambrose Phillips, Tickell, Budgell, Steele, clever writers all, were not) to be mentioned in the memoirs of a man of fashion and letters, writing of those times; and Lord Hervey could scarcely have been in want of materials for a few racy chapters concerning them. Perhaps the verses which we have quoted, in an early page of this article, furnish the cause of such omissions, by having given him a dégoût for the set pretermitted.

We must come to a close.

Lord Hailes, in a note to his compilation of the opinions of the Duchess of Marlborough, says:

“I cannot discover what was the real cause of the unhappy quarrel between George II. and his son the Prince of Wales. The Duchess seems to think that it originated in the motion for augmenting the Prince's revenue. It is probable that the whole matter will be explained to posterity should the memoirs of Lord Hervey ever see the light. I have reason to believe they are written with great freedom.”

The memoirs do not, as they have come down to us, cast additional light on any first serious cause of the quarrel. The English editor (the Right Hon. John Wilson Croker) suspects that information on the subject may have been contained in certain portions of the manuscript which have been destroyed by time or accident; chasms frequently occur in the volumes. We think this, however, altogether improbable, for the reason that the work contains in many different parts of it, long passages concerning the Prince, and malignant summings up of his offences; and we find in these no mention whatever of any peculiar or single cause of quarrel. If the prince had been guilty of any especial atrocity, in the first instance, justifying the sort of domestic outlawry which seems to have followed him we should certainly have been informed of it in some of these summings up. If the cause of hatred had originated with his majesty, Lord Hervey did not love this latter a whit too much to upbraid him with it, even whilst he slaughtered the character of the miserable Prince. We think it altogether probable that such fine solemn old gentlemen as Lord Hailes are commonly in error in matters of this sort. They overlook a number of small ordinary causes, for the grouping of which they have no talent, and go groping for some one large and sufficient cause. We take the truth of the matter to be this: his majesty was a brutal father, the Queen wanted maternal affection, the Princesses were obliged to take a side in the domestic quarrel, and naturally took that the advocates of which they were most under the control of, and most heard. Then as for the prince he was a miserable scoundrel who, like many a better Prince of the royal families of England, received the advances of his father's opponents, and made himself the prop of ruined politicians, whose most ardent prayers were constantly for the swift approach of some kindly apoplexy to cut off the royal breath. Besides, as the shrewd old Duchess of Marlborough suggested, there were pecuniary causes; his majesty cheated the Prince who, guided by the designing courtiers about him, assumed popular ground, made the paternal frauds upon his revemade the subject of public comment and commiseration, and even appealed to parliament to right him. It is not singular that a brutal father and scoundrel son should get to be on indifferent terms with each other, with no better cause for dissension than character itself affords; then small wrongs and angry speeches begin, and these aggregating occasion in the end the extreme malignity and irrevocable rupture which we perceive in the case of George II. and his eldest son. When we first, in these memoirs, become acquainted with Prince Frederick, we find him on grouching terms with his father. The subsequent frauds of the king, and coalition of the Prince with members of the opposition—all known to historians without aid from these memoirs—ought to have been enough to satisfy Lord Hailes and put a stop to his speculations upon farther hidden causes of the unseemly and disreputable feud.

We recommend to our readers to read Lord Hervey's memoirs at once—that is if they have not forestalled us and already enjoyed the racy pages which we have been so tardy in recommending to them. We have never seen a book so full and detailed in the account of manners, ephemeral opinions, habits of life, and the various trifling things which, shifting as society does, go to show an age, in all its peculiarities clearly to us. There have been reigns more illustrious, to be sure, than that of George II; there have been reigns in which vice was more brilliant and captivating in its displays; but then where we are deprived of noble and wise deeds, or of those bright masquerades which the sweet sins of storied courts have wanted in, we can be satisfied with something inferior, if it happens to be droll and peculiar. And all is droll and peculiar in Lord Hervey's book—from the stables to the palace—from Jack Groom to the pragmatical little king and talkative queen.

"Since England was England there never was seen
So strutting a king or so prating a queen."

Strut and prate are visible and audible in these volumes; so is much else, which the reader has found rather hinted at in our remarks than displayed with a full justice.

CHARADE. BY MACAULAY.

Cut off my head, and singular I act—
Cut off my tail and plural I appear;
Cut off both head and tail, and wondrous fact,
Although my middle's left, there's nothing there.

What shall I call my first—a bounding sea?
What shall I call my third—a flowing river?
And in the lowest depths of ocean dwell,
Parent of sweetest sounds—but mute forever?

THE KING OF TIPSY-LAND.

From the French of Béranger.

There was a king of Topsy-land,
Whom history doth not name;
At noon he rose, at night he slept,
Nor cared a fig for fame.
With Joan, at sunset, he lay down,
A cotton night-cap for his crown,
Hey! ding a ding! ho! ding a ding!
Ah! what a jolly little king
Was he!

His palace it was built of straw,
Four meals a day he ate:
And, on a donkey, through his realm
He rode in royal state,
His jovial heart ne'er felt alarm,
With Tray behind he feared no harm—
Hey! ding a ding! ho! ding a ding!
Ah! what a jolly little king
Was he!

He had no costly appetite,
Except the love of wine;
But, while he makes his subjects blest,
A monarch still must dine.
He levied toll on every cask,
Nor wanted help to drain his flask—
Hey! ding a ding! ho! ding a ding!
Ah! what a jolly little king
Was he!

Both maid and matron welcomed him,
Where'er he chanced to call:
The children learned to bless his name,
—The father of them all.
No war filled parents' hearts with grief,
The conscripts met to shoot for beef—
Hey! ding a ding! ho! ding a ding!
Ah! what a jolly little king
Was he!

He ne'er was known o'er neighbors' lands
To stretch his royal paw:
A pattern he for potentates,
For pleasure was his law.
Till with his sires he went to sleep,
His people had no cause to weep—
Hey! ding a ding! ho! ding a ding!
Ah! what a jolly little king
Was he!

The portraits of this worthy prince
Are kept with pious care;
And country taverns prosper still,
Where he swings in the air.
On holydays, the tipping crowd
Will often chorus long and loud,
Hey! ding a ding! ho! ding a ding!
Ah! what a jolly little king
Was he!

THE NATIONAL OBSERVATORY.

The following paper was read by Lieut. M. F. Maury before the Virginia Historical Society at its last annual meeting. As an account of the operations of the National Observatory it possesses high interest, while it has some passages of great rhetorical beauty, which were received by the audience with unbounded manifestations of delight. We copy it from the Historical Register, the organ of the Virginia Historical Society.

[Ed. Mass.

There are a few facts relating to the early history of the Observatory which I should be glad to have placed among the records of this Society.

They are like the under currents of the ocean, which seldom rise to the surface and which generally escape the observation of the world, though they bear a most important part in the beneficent system of aqueous circulation which tempers the frigid and cools the torrid zones of the earth.

These under-tows, whether in the physical or the moral world, are felt perhaps, with their true force, only by those whose course in life is affected by them.

Many of the little events that are passing round us in silence, are to constitute the fillings-up of history. They are the under-currents, the eddies, and the drifts in the tide of Times, by the effects of which the main current is made to pass along down to posterity with the proper force, clearness and beauty.

On taking charge of the National Observatory, my first duty, after getting the instruments in proper position and adjustment, was to train a corps of observers. As soon as this was done, I began to cast about for that plan of operations, which should be the most useful to the world and creditable to the country.

The Sun and Moon, the planets, and certain fixed stars of the larger magnitudes, called fundamental stars, have been the subjects of observation ever since practical Astronomy assumed the character of an exact science. It is nevertheless necessary to continue observations upon them, in order to obtain the requisite data for the American Nautical Almanac: But the time required for this would afford full employment neither to the instruments nor the observers. What then should be done with the spare time? Should it be left unoccupied: or should we follow the example of most of the Government Observatories in Europe, and fill it up with observations on the stars at random having neither definite object, aim or system in view? The genius of our Institutions and the habit of thought among the American people forbade this. For to the honor of the one and the glory of the other, be it said, they are eminently utilitarian and practical in their exactions.

When the American people in their national character understand any thing, they never do it by halves. Their National Observatory is furnished with a most splendid set of instruments. There is but one observatory in the world superior to it in this respect. And when I was ordered to the charge of it, I felt that a heavy responsibility had been imposed upon me. It is a post that I never sought, but being assigned to it in the line of duty, I could not as an officer decline with propriety. I knew that the public expected it so to be conducted as to afford results the most useful to the world and creditable to the country. Therefore, besides the observations already alluded to, I resolved to give effect to a favorite idea, and to commence a catalogue of the stars upon a plan which, when complete, would afford a work which I thought would not be altogether unworthy of the Nation.

With splendid instruments, and industrious observers; with beautiful skies, and more of the heavens above us than they in Europe have, arrangements were commenced for a catalogue of the starry host upon a larger scale, and a more comprehensive plan than had ever before been attempted by any single astronomer. The want of such a work as a book of reference for Astronomers, has been felt for ages.

I do not mean to intimate that there are no catalogues of stars; but I mean to say there is no catalogue of the stars that are visible at any one place. Nor is there any one catalogue, which, besides magnitude, R. A. and Declination, gives also color, angle of position and distance, with maps of the binary systems, and clusters of the stars with drawings of the Nebulæ. There are catalogues, too numerous to mention; but the most extensive are Lalande's, Struve's and Bessel's.

Lalande's was commenced in 1789 and ended in 1801: It extends from the North Pole to the Tropic of Capricorn, and contains about 50,000 stars, but it gives position and size only down to the ninth magnitude. Bessel commenced in 1821 and finished in 1833. He worked from 45° N. to 15° S. Declination, and obtained a list of about 75,000 stars to which he assigned position and magnitude only.

Struve's is the most extensive catalogue, by far, of the double stars. It gives magnitude, color, angle of position and distance; but it does not pretend to be a complete catalogue even of all the double stars that are visible in Russia; and yet it is considered as one of the most valuable contributions of the age to Astronomy.

The plan finally adopted for the Washington

Catalogue, was to penetrate regularly and systematically with some one of our powerful telescopes, every point of space in the visible heavens, for the purpose not only of determining accurately the position of every star, cluster, and nebula, that the instruments can reach, but for the purpose also of recording magnitude and color, with angle of position and distance of binary stars, and of making drawings and giving descriptions of all clusters and nebulae. And for this, arrangements were commenced in 1845.

Now it may be asked, why make this work so extensive? Why comprehend in it objects that never have been, and never can be seen by the naked eye?

The answer is ready with reasons abundant. The heavens like the earth, are obedient to the great law of change. The stars are undergoing perpetual change, some change their position, some vary in magnitude, some in color, and some have blazed forth like flaming meteors in the sky, dazzled the world, and then disappeared forever.

The appearance of a new star in the firmament induced Hipparchus before the Christian era to undertake the first catalogue, which although lost to the world was productive of great practical good. Ptolemy is said to have borrowed over freely from it.

In November, 1572, a star appeared all at once in great splendor. It surpassed Sirius in brilliancy, and was brighter than Jupiter in perigee. It could be seen in the day time, with the naked eye, and after two years it passed away and disappeared. Its place in the sky is now vacant. It induced Tycho Brahe to undertake his catalogue.

It may be that there is now, at this very time in the firmament above, a world on fire. Argus, a well-known star in the Southern hemisphere, has suddenly blazed forth, and from a star of the 2nd or 3rd magnitude, now glares with the brilliancy of the first.

It is man's boast that he was made to look aloft; for his alone is the privilege to pry into "Nature's infinite book of secrecy," and can it be therefore profitless to him and of no value to posterity to survey the skies, map the stars and contemplate "the eternal flowers of heaven?"

The generation that succeeds is always wiser than that which precedes; for this begins with knowledge, advancement, and discovery where that left off. Our ancestors gathered facts, and recorded observations, which in our hands have become clues guiding to knowledge, or leading to discovery. Shall we do less? He who has the privilege of interrogating nature in the name of society, and yet fails to preserve her answers, is regarded by the scientific world as one who betrays his trust, and thereby wrongs the living and defrauds posterity.

In 1795, Lalande saw a star, and entered it upon his catalogue. In 1847 it was discovered at the Washington Observatory that that star was the planet Neptune. Thus, by the fidelity of that observer, and the means of his catalogue, we are enabled to know at once what otherwise we should have had to wait fifty years to learn. But for that observation of Lalande, astronomers would have had to wait half a century for data to enable them to determine the orbit of that planet as accurately as Mr. Walker, formerly an assistant at the National Observatory, has done in consequence of the discovery there.

Perhaps the most exquisitely beautiful objects in the heavens, are the double stars, with their contrast of colors. When the telescope is turned upon these objects, the most richly-colored orange star may be seen dancing along with its companion of bright green, or smalt blue. They are arranged in pairs or groups, with their components diversified with almost all the colors of the rainbow.

It was a long time a question whether these stars were really double, or only optically so. It was thought they appeared double, only because they happened to be situated nearly in the same direction; that one was placed at an infinite distance beyond the other. It was said, therefore, that they appeared optically near each other only, like lamps afar off in a dark night, which, though at a great distance apart, appear close together to one who sees them nearly in the same straight line.

These stars are so remote from us, that a snail might travel at his usual gait many times around the earth, before that type of velocity with us, a cannon ball, could reach the nearest of them. How then could it be ascertained whether they were physically double, or only optically so?

Catalogues and the resources of science have enabled astronomers to settle the question.

If while looking at the leaves on the trees of a forest, I hold up a dime at a certain distance before me, I will see that it hides certain leaves. If now I hold a dollar at the same place, I will find that the additional leaves hid by it, will exceed, many times in number the first, because the leaves are situated one beyond the other. They are optically close together; and the additional space optically hid by the dollar is much larger than that hid only by the dime.

Now apply this test to the double stars. Take the space in the heavens about each star, that would be hid by a pin's head when held at a convenient distance for vision, and count the stars that would be included within the space so hid. Now hold a half dime at the same distance from the eye, and count the additional stars hid by it.

The first will be found to exceed the last in numbers many times. Thus the probability was established that these stars were in physical and not in mere optical connection. The Telescope was now brought to bear. Observations were made and recorded in Catalogues, and, after a lapse of years, it was discovered that many of these stars were suns actually revolving about each other.

Thus systems in which there are many suns and the most complicated motions have been detected. In some, one sun revolves about another. In others, one pair of suns is seen revolving about each other, and they two around another pair. Some have suns of sapphire blue, emerald green, orange yellow, or flaming red. And there, instead of having the alternations of light and darkness as we have here, it may be supposed that their days and nights alternate with blue, green, red or yellow light, according to the color of the sun which may be in the ascendant.

There may be some ready to say,—though I am sure there are none such here,—of what good is it to us to know that there be suns among the stars, and days of different hues, in the remote regions of space! I hold myself to be a utilitarian of the strictest sect. But I regard every fact that man can gather from the physical world to be of value. In the book of nature we see God's own hand-writing; and there is not to be found throughout his handy work, a single fact, word or syllable which does not relate to the destiny of man. We may not understand its bearings or comprehend its import, but it is not because it is without meaning,—it is because we are not wise enough to read the interpretation thereof. We have received more than any generation ever received of its ancestors, for the generation that preceded us had its own treasures of knowledge added to all that it received from the world before, to hand down to us. As we have received more, we are required to give more. Therefore, let us interrogate nature diligently for her laws, and for facts which are the exponents of her laws, feeling assured that the course of Man is upward and onward, and that if we ourselves can make nothing of her answers, there may be DANIELS coming after us, who will have the wisdom to read them aright, be they in characters never so strange and incomprehensible to us.

It is a part of the plan of the American Catalogue accurately to determine distance and angle of position of the double stars,—to record magnitude, color, right ascension and declination, and so enable those who come after us hundreds or thousands of years hence to compare their observations with ours and to determine therefrom the orbits and Anni Magni of these wonderful suns and curious systems. The oldest of the observations of this kind that have been handed to us, are too recent, in comparison with the myriads of our years which some of these suns require to complete a single revolution, to enable us to determine any thing as to their periods.

Perhaps of all the objects in the sky, the Nebulae are the most wonderful and mysterious. We may trace them up through the telescope from shapes the most fantastical to forms the most symmetrical and graceful. They are beyond the reach of the unaided eye. But with the telescope turned in a certain direction, we may see a mere sploch of curious light, presenting a Nebula without form, and apparently void;—with the telescope in another direction, we will see them beginning to assume regularity of outline, with marks of aggregation and condensation, as though they were in process of formation, and these several shapes were merely the nebulous stuff in different stages of growth. Some have the graceful convolutions of the smoke curl,—some are spiral,—some are rent in pieces as though they were curdling into more dense aggregations of matter; these leave black rents in the sky, through which stars are often seen to peep out from the darkness apparently at an immense distance beyond. Following them on, we trace them up into the circular form, with marks of condensation about the centre; then comes the globular appearance, with a decided nucleus; and finally, we come across the perfectly formed star, surrounded with a thin haze of nebulous matter, as though it had not yet all been quite condensed into the shining substance of the star.

The oldest observation upon these wonderful objects is of too recent a date to tell us anything as to their changes and growth, if growth they have.

The Catalogue contemplates accurate drawings of the Nebulae and the leaving by this means to posterity, the clue to that knowledge, with regard to this class of objects, which we ourselves would be so glad to have.

Under the space-penetrating powers of the telescope many of these objects are resolved into stars. Among the clusters are to be seen at one view and in a single spot not larger than Ahab's Cloud, aggregations of stars, far exceeding in number all that the unaided eye of man ever beheld in the azure vault above.

God "by his spirit hath garnished the heavens." But it is not until one of these gorgeous clusters is seen through the telescope, that one can feel in its full force the prophet's saying—

"The host of Heaven cannot be numbered."

"Canst thou bind the sweet influences of the Pleiades?"

It may be that catalogues and the telescope have enabled us to see, though darkly, the scope of the Almighty question.

By means of catalogues it has been discovered that the stars in a certain quarter of the heavens are getting optically closer and closer together, while those in an opposite quarter, are apparently separating from each other and getting wider apart, precisely in the same way as though we were receding from the one set and approaching the other.

This, therefore, suggested the idea, that our system itself might be moving in obedience to the influences of some vast center of revolution in the remote regions of space. And it has recently been shown, with such verisimilitude as to throw the onus of proof upon those who deny the conclusion:—that the sun with its splendid retinue of planets, satellites and comets is in motion about a center inconceivably remote; that though we are moving about it at a rate of many millions of miles in a year, the period is so immense, the distance from the center to the circumference of the orbit so great, as to require myriads and myriads of ages to complete a revolution. And that center is in the direction of the star Alcyon, ONE OF THE PLEIADES. Who, therefore, can "bind those sweet influences," which guide the sun and moon and earth through the trackless regions of space, and hold them so they fall not?

To me the simple passage through the Transit instrument of a star across the meridian is the height of astronomical sublimity.

At the dead hour of the night, when the world is hushed in sleep and all is still; when there is not a sound to be heard save the dead beat escapement of the clock, counting with hollow voice the footsteps of time in his ceaseless round, I turn to the Ephemeris and find there, by calculation made years ago, that when that clock tells a certain hour, a star which I never saw will be in the field of the telescope for a moment, flit through and then disappear. The instrument is set;—the moment approaches and is intently awaited;—I look;—the star mute with eloquence that gathers sublimity from the silence of the night, comes smiling and dancing into the field, and at the instant predicted even to the fraction of a second, it makes its transit and is gone! With emotions too deep for the organs of speech, the heart swells out with unutterable anthems; we then see that there is harmony in the heavens above; and though we cannot hear, we feel the "music of the spheres."

The time is recorded and the declination being determined, the star is entered in the Catalogue, there to stand as a record forever of its magnitude and position for that day and hour. Thus for every star, a point will be given from which in time to come Astronomers may reckon its motions.

When the sky is clear, there is every night, and all night long, an eye at every telescope in the Observatory, working for this Catalogue; and that no star shall escape us, the part of the heavens that is gone over to-night, is reexplored to-morrow night by fresh observers with different instruments. Thus every star is to be seen at least twice, by two observers, and on two occasions; so that in time to come, it may be said by astronomers, such a star was in the heavens at the date of the Washington Catalogue, because it is in that work; but it has since disappeared, because it is not now in the heavens; or, such a star which is now visible was not so at the date of the Washington Catalogue, because it is not in that work.

Already, as the result of the first year's work, about 15,000 stars have been observed for the Catalogue; most of which are new.

Should this work be carried on and completed according to the original plan, the time may come when facts connected with the history of it will not be altogether without interest.

Here is an official order in relation to it.

"Navy Department, March 6th, 1846.

SIR,—Desirous that the numerous and able corps employed at the National Observatory, at Washington, may produce results important to maritime science, and to the Navy, I approve your course in making the series of Astronomical Observations, more immediately necessary for the preparation of a Nautical Almanac.

The country expects, also, that the Observatory will make adequate contributions to Astronomical science. The most celebrated European Catalogues of the Stars, 'Bessel's Zone Observations' and 'Struve's Dorpat Catalogue' of double stars, having extended to only fifteen degrees South of the Equator, and the Washington Observatory, by its geographical position, commanding a zone of fifteen degrees further South; and being provided with all instruments requisite for extending these catalogues, you are hereby authorized and directed to enter upon the observation of the heavens commencing at the lowest parallel of South Declination, which you may find practicable. You will embrace in your Catalogue all stars even of the smallest magnitude which your instruments can accurately observe. You will, when convenient, make duplicate observations of stars for each Catalogue; and, when time permits, you will determine with precision, by the Meridian instruments, the position of the principal stars in each pair or multiple of stars.

Simultaneously with these observations, you will, as far as practicable, determine the positions of such stars as have different declinations or right ascensions assigned to them in the most accredited Ephemerides.

You will, from time to time, report directly to this Department the progress of the work.

Respectfully, yours,

(Signed) GEORGE BANCROFT.

LIEUT. M. F. MAURY, Superintendent Of the Observatory, Washington."

"The foregoing is a true copy of a letter printed in the Appendix to the 'Washington Astronomical Observations.'

J. S. KENNARD,
Passed Mid'n U. S. Navy."

This order is the surface current, and without looking deeper, it may hereafter be construed into the original first idea. Its date is "March 6;" but here is the little under-current which took its rise two months before, and makes the upper one clear.

"ORDER

OBSERVATIONS FOR 1846.

A regular series to be kept up on Polaris, α Lyrae, and 61 Cygni, and on the Sun, Moon and Planets; and by the West Transit on the Moon culminators of the Nautical Almanac.

At least ten observations with each of the Meridional instruments are to be made on every Nautical Almanac Star visible during the year.

The list of clock stars to be revised. The Prime Vertical will continue its observations upon α Lyrae daily; and upon 61 Cygni and α Lacertae, as soon as the last two shall be in position. It will also observe upon as many stars of the first or second magnitude as practicable, and will catalogue between the Zenith and 30° N. Declination.

The Meridian and Mural Circles will Catalogue in alternate belts of 5° Declination, the former commencing with 45° South, and extending to 35° South; one observation upon each star, cluster and nebula will suffice for the Catalogue in this part of the heavens.

The West Transit will sweep in belts adjoining the Mural.

Each instrument will number its own stars, beginning with No. 1, and will also quote magnitudes of the stars (standards for which have been given) and assign weight to every observation.

(Signed) M. F. MAURY.

I have therefore chosen, gentlemen, to take this memorial from its humble place in the Observatory, to bring it with me, and ask to have it placed on record here with the Historical Society of my native State. It may be useless—we cannot tell. It is our duty to keep the stream of history as it passes by us, pure and clear; and then, we can safely leave the rest to time.

LETTERS FROM NEW-YORK.

NEW-YORK, April 1849.

"Cooper's new novel"—a phrase once of far more pleasing import than at present—has just appeared. Its title, "The Sea-Lions or the Lost Sealers," promises much more than it performs. I cannot say that I have read it; I endeavored honestly to do so, and failed. It is very dull, and bears no more comparison to "The Pilot," "The Red Rover," or even "The Two Admirals," than does the drone of a bagpipe to the merriest horn in Gung'l's band. Mr. Cooper grows garrulous in his old age. He was never remarkable for good temper, and seems to have lost the little that he once possessed. In these two ill-printed, dingy little volumes, there is hardly — "A dash of purity and brightness

To show the man of sense and of politeness"—

but such and so frequent are the carping and scolding—irrelevant strangely to the subject-matter—that one associates the author with his idea of Tam O' Shanter's spouse, when she sate in the chimney-corner,

"Gathering her brows like gathering storm, Nursing her wrath to keep it warm."

Ever since Mr. Cooper's return to his own country from a somewhat "lengthy" expatriation, he has looked upon himself as a victim to "the ingratitude of Republics." He has, accordingly, omitted no opportunity to expatiate on our faults and foibles. In "Home as Found" his anger triumphed over his judgment, so that he condescended to reflect, with undue severity, even on the conduct and manners of his fair compatriots. I have sometimes wondered what Mr. Cooper expected on his return home. Did he presume that he should be hailed with universal acclamations? Did he look for an ovation? Were victorious wreaths to crown his brow, and arches of triumph to be thrown over his pathway? Were people to be astonished out of their usual equanimity? Was he to be regarded as a prodigy? Surely, if he expected aught beyond the deference and attention commonly paid to men of talent, he was grievously disappointed. "Progress" had been doing great things during his absence abroad. The mind of the country had grown upward, and expanded into a noble maturity. Many writers had sprung up—some like flowers, some like trees, some like fungi. A literary man was no rara avis in terris. Mr. Cooper had seemingly forgotten this: he thought he should find things, in all respects, precisely as he had left them. He fully believed that Mr. Irving and himself were the only living American authors of any note whatsoever. He was undeceived quickly and forcibly. His presence excited little or no observation. Not a being turned to look at him, as he walked, consciously celebrated, up Broadway. No digit was pointed in his direction. Few, except his old friends, came to pay their respects or “see the elephant.” He was not “dined” or “partied” more than any respectable gentleman would have been under the circumstances. Scarcely was he lionized at all. He found himself “one of many.”

Instead of receiving such neglect coolly, Mr. Cooper scolded, and took upon himself the duties of an offended and unappreciated Mentor. Among other matters which he had failed to note was the advance in power of our newspaper press. It was small enough when he first went to Europe. It had, moreover, always lauded him, even while he was gone (except on one occasion, when he attributed a severe criticism on the “Bravo” to the envy of the king of the French) “to the top of his bent.” What must have been his surprise, his indignation, his scorn, upon finding that the newspapers dared to animadvert upon the line of conduct he thought fit to pursue—upon his severe comments on his native country, his invectives, his sarcasms, his ridicule, his unconcealed contempt? Instead of meeting the editors with their own weapons, in a fight which he had wantonly commenced, on a field of his own choosing (for he began in the newspapers) he fled to the Sanctuary of the Law! instituted numerous “civil suits” for libel, procured indictments from Grand Juries, and did his “little best” to annoy and worry the press into silence. He failed lamentably. The press, even to this day, continues its strictures on his books, and proclaims “the truth with boldness.” For myself, I write utterly without prejudice. I would praise Mr. Cooper’s “new work,” as the publishers say, as readily as another man’s; but no fears of so irate an author would deter me from “scoring” him, when he merits such an application. I hesitate not to pronounce “The Sea-Liens” a very stupid novel, tedious, dismal; loose in its style, ill-constructed, poorly begun, feebly continued, and lamely ended; and, being an “independent American,” I beg leave to observe to the illustrious author in the words of Patrick Henry, “if that is a libel, sir, make the most of it!”

Do not, Mr. Editor, esteem me in a fault-finding mood, when I tell you that I am disappointed in another book “just out.” Mr. Melville’s “Mardi” is likewise a failure. The attempt was considerable; the labor of production must have been great, since every page fairly reeks with “the smoke of the lamp.” I read “Typee” with very great pleasure, and was among the first to set forth its extraordinary beauties, not readily appreciated by the public. I also liked “Omoo,” though wisely and not “too well.” “Mardi” is the superlative third in descending degrees. “Typee” good; “Omoo” less good; “Mardi” least good. Let me quote the latter’s preface. It is brief—and in this praiseworthy—almost “as the posy of a ring.” Le voici.

“Not long ago, having published two narratives of voyages in the Pacific, which, in many quarters, were received with incredulity, the thought occurred to me of indeed writing a romance of Polynesian adventure, and publishing it as such: to see whether the fiction might not possibly be received for a verity; in some degree the reverse of my former experience. This thought was the germ of others, which have resulted in Mardi.”

The above clumsily expressed paragraph means, I presume, that as Mr. Melville’s facts have been mistaken for fictions, he wishes to see if his fictions will be mistaken for facts. On this point he may set his mind entirely at rest. Although it is by no means a good way to make people receive the false for the true, by forewarning them of your design, there can be no reader so intensely verdant, as not to discern the grossness and utter improbabilities of the fabrications in “Mardi.” There is, moreover, a continual straining after effect, an effort constantly at fine writing, a sacrifice of natural ease to artificial witticism. To borrow an expression from the stable, Mr. Melville “feels his oats.” He has been overfed with praise. He has a reputation to lose, and he must write up to it. He is “somebody.” When he, unconscious of his fine genius, created “Typee,” he was nobody, on Fame’s record. His very name had a doubtful, romantic sound. It was thought to be a mere “nom de plume.” But it was real, whatever was “Typee,” and so it became “great in mouths of wisest censure.” What a pity! For we might have had more such delightful books as Typee!

Mr. Irving’s “Book of the Hudson” is cool and pleasant summer reading. Its style is very like the flow of a river “at its own sweet will.” Let me commend the charming volume to all travellers.

I have not read Mr. Willis’s “Rural Letters and other Records of Thought at Leisure,” except in some of those parts of which the whol

But he knew it was a libel (see the name of the book) is composed; but, since it comprises "Letters from under a Bridge," "Open air Musings in the City," &c., it must be a most agreeable collection. I regret to see that Mr. Willis, in his title-page, adopts the fashionable affectation of calling himself by his middle name, thus—N. Parker Willis. Why not give the whole—beginning with the good gospel Nathaniel, or simply the initials? This affected mode always puts me in mind of the motto on the United States coat-of-arms—"E Pluribus Unum"—as if a Mr. Unum has been christened E. Pluribus.

There has been a very amusing, though by no means unprofitable, controversy going on in "The Literary World" about the orthographical question, between "Websterian" and "Q." "Websterian" is Professor Goodrich—Professor of rhetoric and the belles lettres—of Yale University in New Haven, and "Q" is Edward S. Gould, a merchant of this city, a gentleman of fine talents and scholarship. The merchant has decidedly the better of the argument. He most adroitly overthrows the Professor. Had the latter known how "valiant" and "cunning in fence" was his antagonist, he would, like Sir Andrew Aguecheek, "have seen him damned ere he'd have challenged him." This discussion seems to me to set the question at rest. Henceforth people will have one Johnson and Walker on their tables, instead of the seven editions of Webster, with their diverse and ever-changing orthography.

Longfellow's new book, "Kavanagh," (is it Irish?) is looked for with high-wrought expectation. The author has of late published two exquisite poems in Sartain's Union Magazine. Let those who are disposed to deny him the title of θεοποιος, the Greek word for creator, read these admirable verses. They breathe the true afflatus.

Two editions of Lamartine's "Les Confidences" have been issued by rival publishers—the one translated here, and the other in England. The former is said to be the better; but the work itself falls far below the standard claimed for it by the French announcements. It contains a pathetic story—a beautiful episode, called "Graziella;" but is, in parts, extremely puerile. Nothing but a want of money, or an egregious vanity, could have induced any author of celebrity to give the world such a production. Is it not strange, that since Lamartine's political ascent, since his brilliant spoken improvisations as a legislative orator, he has written nothing at all comparable with his early poems and essays?

Under the able direction and management of Prosper M. Wetmore as President, the AMERICAN ART UNION has culminated to its present unprecedented prosperity. The List of Paintings already purchased for distribution in December next, includes pictures of great merit, by our first American artists. The payment of five dollars constitutes any one a member of this excellent institution, which has already done so much for the encouragement and growth of the Fine Arts in the United States. The funds of the Institution, which may now be estimated at an average of $50,000 a year, are, after paying necessary expenses, applied to the purchase of paintings, statues and engravings—the work of Americans, or of those who have become naturalized-citizens.

George P. Putnam, who deserves sincere commendation, on account of the careful, neat and elegant style, in which his books are always published, has issued a specimen of Mr. Robert Dale Owen's "Hints on Public Architecture, containing among other illustrations, Views and Plans of the Smithsonian Institution; together with an appendix relative to building materials—prepared on behalf of the Building Committee of the Smithsonian Institution." The work is to contain one hundred and thirteen engravings, and promises to be of much value and importance. The specimen presents four designs on wood, exquisitely executed, and printed on paper of fine quality, besides a tinted lithograph of the Church of the Holy Communion in this city. The woodcuts are of the house of Jacques Cœur at Bourges, in which the celebrated Condé spent his early school-days, of the Hotel de Ville at St. Quentin, France, the diagram of a church ground floor, and of a Moorish Interior in a Mosque at Cordova. As an example of Mr. Owen's pleasant style and correct views, I make this extract:

"A little habit not only reconciles the eye to the irregular variety of Gothic, but causes it to be sought for and esteemed, far beyond the rigidly formal. Even in street architecture, its effects are happy and striking. Take an example from the ancient provincial city of Bourges—the mansion of Jacques Cœur, on the old Gothic balustrade of which the great Captain, (Condé,) as a modern essayist has suggested, may have read and adopted as his own, the inspiring motto—'A vaillants cœurs rien impossible.' But it is not the attractive exterior, striking as it is; not the picturesque beauty, which characterizes alike its boldest outlines, and its most delicate details; nor yet the pictorial effects, varying with every changeable aspect, which the rich variety of its irregular masses successively present; it is not these, which chiefly influence my preference for Arch-Architecture. That preference is mainly founded on considerations more prosaic and practical. That same picturesque irregularity, which pleases the eye and charms the fancy, is an important feature in an Architecture that is to satisfy modern wants. The flexibility which the Norman and Gothic manners possess; the facility with which they assume whatever external forms may be suggested by internal purpose ; the easy freedom with which they lend themselves, as occasion arises, to amendment or addition ; all these are essential conditions in an Architecture, that is to secure lasting freedom among us : all these are essential characteristics in an Architecture that is to attain, in our utilitarian age and in our matter-of-fact country, to the character of national."

The same publisher, likewise, announces "The Works of Fennimore Cooper." From the remarks made at the beginning of this letter, you will infer my reason for doubting, whether a republication of the entire romances of this writer would be a profitable speculation. But I have no doubt that the best part of them—a faithful selection—would be well received. I have on my table the first pages of "The Spy." It is preceded by an original introduction. It is also revised, corrected, and illustrated with notes. The introduction, after the fashion of Sir Walter Scott in his last edition, (Cadell's,) of the Waverly series, gives an account of the origin of the story, and of the incidents on which it is founded. It concludes with certain reflections, which are given in so much milder a mood than Mr. Cooper's usual comments, that, considering they have not yet elsewhere appeared, I am tempted to present them, for the sake of imparting a better opinion of their author to your readers than most persons now entertain.

"The style of the book has been revised by the author in this edition. In this respect, he has endeavored to make it more worthy of the favor with which it has been received ; though he is compelled to admit, there are faults so interwoven with the structure of the tale that, as in the case of a decayed edifice, it would cost perhaps less to reconstruct than to repair. Five-and-twenty years have been as ages, with most things connected with America. Among other advances, that of her literature has not been the least. So little was expected from the publication of an original work of this description, at the time it was written, that the first volume of 'The Spy' was actually printed several months, before the author felt a sufficient inducement to write a line of the second. The efforts expended on a hopeless task are rarely worthy of him who makes them, however low it may be necessary to rate the standard of his general merit.

"One other anecdote, connected with the history of this book, may give the reader some idea of the hopes of an American author, in the first quarter of the present century. As the second volume was slowly printing, from manuscript that was barely dry when it went into the compositor's hands, the publisher intimated that the work might grow to a length that would consume the profits. To set his mind at rest, the last chapter was actually written, printed and pagged, several weeks before the chapters, which precede it, were even thought of. This circumstance, while it cannot excuse, may serve to explain the manner in which the actors are hurried off the scene.

"A great change has come over the country, since this book was originally written. The nation is passing from the gristle into the bone, and the common mind is beginning to keep even pace with the growth of the body politic. The march from Vera Cruz to Mexico was made under the orders of that gallant soldier, who, a quarter of a century before, was mentioned with honor, in the last chapter of this very book. Glorious as was that march, and brilliant as were its results in a military point of view, a stride was then made by the nation, in a moral sense, that has hastened it, by an age, in its progress toward real independence and high political influence. The guns that filled the valley of the Aztecs with their thunder, have been heard in echoes on the other side of the Atlantic, producing equally hope or apprehension.

"There is now no enemy to fear, but the one that resides within. By accustoming ourselves to regard even the people as erring beings, and by using the restraints that wisdom has educed from experience, there is much reason to hope that the same Providence, which has so well aided us in our infancy, may continue to smile on our manhood."

But the greatest book of the season—of which, though published at a high price, a large edition (1,500 copies) has already been sold—is "NINEVEH AND ITS REMAINS," and for this splendid publication, the more cultivated minds of our country have also to thank Mr. PUTNAM. It richly deserves an extended review in your pages, but as I have not at present the leisure, and perhaps lack the ability and learning, requisite for the due preparation of a careful article, I must content myself with a description of the book ; first advising all men, who desire to gratify their curiosity, feast their imaginations, enrich their understandings, and arouse the noblest and best of associations, to stop not at an expenditure, comparatively trifling, but possess themselves of this treasury of great wonders. It is written, as such a work—a work which must be standard—ought to be, with the utmost care and correctness, with great clearness and directness of style, with little attempt at expatiation, no self-glorification, but rather with a modest deference, which wins your confidence, while it assures your respect. It is printed with large type, in two volumes, royal octavo—the first containing 320 pages of letter press, and eighteen illustrations, and the second 373 pages, including a copious index, and no less than 85 plates, woodcuts and plans—all very well executed. The learned Dr. Robinson, of the Union Theological Seminary in New York, furnishes an interesting Introductory Note, which is followed by a brief and modest preface and Introduction, by the author ; in the latter of which he gives "a slight sketch of what has been done in the field of Assyrian Antiquities," previous to his own researches. The whole work is divided into two parts—the first of which, to the 94th page of Vol. 2, is occupied with faithful and accurate accounts of Mr. Layard's excavations in the buried city, of his adventures among the inhabitants, and excursions into various parts of the region round about. The latter comprehend his visit to the Chaldean Christians of Kurdistan, and the Yezidis or Devil-Worshippers. The second part comprises an Inquiry into the manners and arts of the ancient Assyrians, and in this he treats of the materials for their history, lately disclosed, of their monuments, their writing, their arts, embroideries, furniture, knowledge of mechanics, their armour, ship-building, wealth, domestic habits, and numerous other matters, calculated to inspire the deepest interest. Mr. Layard considers the manners and customs of the descendants of the Assyrians, as much the remains of Nineveh and Assyria, as are the rude heaps and buried palaces. He therefore describes both with equal pains, and thus shows himself to be a true philosopher, no less than an indefatigable explorer.

I should have mentioned that the book is strongly and handsomely bound in cloth, with a golden stamp of "the winged bull."

The bookseller's price is $4 50.

Butler & Co. of Philadelphia have just issued, in handsome octavo, (fac-similes of the London edition) by far the best, neatest, and most correctly spelled edition of Macaulay, which has appeared. It is sold at a price which cannot be more than its cost, namely $1 a volume. Accordingly, Harper & Brothers immediately lowered the charge for their best (Websterian) edition to 60 cents a volume! This is the very same which was first, and, till rival publishers appeared, constantly sold for $2. What kind of justice is this to the first purchasers? I do not pretend to understand book-selling ethics, but were I a considerable purchaser, I should wait hereafter till a book had been published three months at least.

I take much pleasure in sending you, for publication in the Messenger, an exquisite translation from the German by Stoddard, one of our most graceful and accomplished, though youngest poets. I presume it will be too late for May; but let your readers expect a most delicate and beautiful poem in the June number. Mr. Stoddard has a fine original genius, and he is self-instructed. An artizan, by profession, while his hands shape the homeliest of metals, his brain produces the most beautiful of thoughts.

Yours ever,

B.

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS.

ZOOLOGICAL RECREATIONS: by W. J. Broderip Esq., F. R. S., &c. &c. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard. 1849.

One of the most readable books of the day. It is just what its title imports: not a scientific treatise, full of genera and species, and hard names in Latin and Greek: but a popular, pleasant, little book of anecdotes and gossip—a desultory series of sketches, suitable for easy, after-dinner, reading. It treats of singing birds, cuckoos, owls, swans, turkeys, and parrots: of dogs, cats, apes, elephants, and dragons. We find, condensed in a few words, the latest and most authentic views of the learned, concerning the origin and habits of these, our natural born subjects: relieved and illustrated by frequent quotations from books, and short stories, which are told with much naiveté and humor. We have not had time to read it through—a pleasure yet in store for us: but, while glancing at other portions, we could not resist the temptation of the Chapter on Dogs. In respect of these almost human companions, we are not a whit behind the author, in point of affectionate regard. Our earliest recollections of fun and frolic, no less than our first ideas of faithful and tender friendship, are bound up with the memories of two or three of the race, who were our playmates, guides, and guardians, in infancy. Poor old Milo! We see him now, keeping patient watch by our coat and hat, while we—that little urchin in gray breeches—are racing up and down the green, and making tired the echoes with shouts of merriment. And now old Milo is relieved—a hat is put in his mouth—and he is turned loose to be hunted. Twenty pursuers are in chase of him—he is headed off, surrounded, hemmed in on all sides—but he is not to be taken. Never for a moment overrunning the prescribed bounds (Milo, like Mrs. Hannah Battles, always played the rigor of the game), he nevertheless winds, doubles, dodges, with matchless dexterity—and when, hard pressed, spies out some unwary antagonist, darts between his legs, and overthrows him in a twinkling. But we grow garrulous—Mr. Broderip sums up the merits of our favorites thus—"Yes! dogs are honest creatures, and the most delightful of four-footed beings. The brain and nervous system may be more highly developed in the Anthropoid Apes, and even in some of the monkeys; but, for affectionate, though humble companionship, nay friendship; for the amiable spirit that is on the watch to anticipate every wish of his master—for the most devoted attachment to him, in prosperity and adversity, in health and sickness, an attachment always continued unto death, and frequently failing not, even when the once warm hand that patted him is clay cold; what—we had almost said—who can equal these charming familiars? Hungry though he be, he will leave his food for you; he will quit the strongest temptation for you; he will lay down his life for you. Truly spake he who said, 'man is the God of the dog.'"

We have no doubt this little volume of near 400 pages is equally entertaining throughout; and we commend it to all of our readers who have any taste for chance gleanings in the field of Natural History.

NINEVEH AND ITS REMAINS: By Austen Henry Layard, Esq. George P. Putnam: New York. 1849.

For a notice of this splendid work, we refer our readers to the letter of our New York correspondent, which has anticipated what we designed to say.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

PROSPECTUS.

This work is conducted in the spirit of Littell's Museum of Foreign Literature, (which was favorably received by the public for twenty years,) but as it is twice as large, and appears so often, we not only give spirit and freshness to it by many things which were excluded by a month's delay, but while thus extending our scope and gathering a greater and more attractive variety, are able so to increase the solid and substantial part of our literary, historical, and political harvest, as fully to satisfy the wants of the American reader.

The elaborate and stately Essays of the Edinburgh, Quarterly, and other Reviews; and Blackwood's noble criticisms on Poetry, his keen political Commentaries, highly wrought Tales, and vivid descriptions of rural and mountain Scenery; and the contributions to Literature, History, and Common Life, by the sagacious Spectator, the sparkling Examiner, the judicious Athenæum, the busy and industrious Literary Gazette, the sensible and comprehensive Britannia; the sober and respectable Christian Observer; these are intermixed with the Military and Naval reminiscences of the United Service, and with the best articles of the Dublin University, New Monthly, Fraser's, Tail's, Ainsworth's, Hood's, and Sporting Magazines, and of Chambers' admirable Journal. We do not consider it beneath our dignity to borrow wit and wisdom from Punch; and, when we think it good enough, make use of the thunder of The Times. We shall increase our variety by importations from the continent of Europe, and from the new growth of the British colonies.

The steamship has brought Europe, Asia and Africa, into our neighborhood; and will greatly multiply our connections, as Merchants, Travelers, and Politicians, with all parts of the world;

so that much more than ever it now becomes every intelligent American to be informed of the condition and changes of foreign countries. And this not only because of their nearer connection with ourselves, but because the nations seem to be hastening through a rapid process of change, to some new state of things, which the merely political prophet cannot compute or foresee.

Geographical Discoveries, the progress of Colonization, (which is extending over the whole world,) and Voyages and Travels, will be favorite matter for our selection: and, in general, we shall systematically and very fully acquaint our readers with the great department of Foreign affairs, without entirely neglecting our own.

While we aspire to make the Living Age desirable to all who wish to keep themselves informed of the rapid progress of the movement—to Statesmen, Divines, Lawyers, and Physicians—to men of business and men of leisure—it is still a stronger object to make it attractive and useful to their Wives and Children. We believe that we can thus do some good in our day and generation; and hope to make the work indispensable in every well-informed family. We say indispensable, because in this day of cheap literature it is not possible to guard against the influx of what is bad in taste and vicious in morals, in any other way than by furnishing a sufficient supply of a healthy character. The mental and moral appetite must be gratified.

We hope that, by "winnowing the wheat from the chaff," by providing abundantly for the imagination, and by a large collection of Biography, Voyages and Travels, History, and more solid matter, we may produce a work which shall be popular, while at the same time it will aspire to raise the standard of public taste. May, 1844.

TERMS.

Complete sets, in nineteen volumes, to the end of 1848, handsomely bound, and packed in neat boxes, are for sale at $2 a volume.

Any volume may be had separately at two dollars, bound, or a dollar and a half in numbers.

The following LETTERS on the plan and execution of the work have been received:

DEAR SIR,—I have read the prospectus of your proposed periodical, "The Living Age," with great pleasure; and entirely approve the plan. If it can only obtain the public patronage, long enough and large enough, and securely enough, to attain its true ends, it will contribute in an eminent degree to give a healthy tone, not only to our literature, but to public opinion. It will enable us to possess, in a moderate compass, a select library of the best productions of the age. It will do more: it will redeem our periodical literature from the reproach of being devoted to light and superficial reading, to transitory speculations, to sickly and ephemeral sentimentalities, and false and exaggerated sketches of life and character.

Any number may be had for 12½ cents; and it may be worth while for subscribers or purchasers to complete any broken volumes they may have, and thus greatly enhance their value.

Monthly parts.—For such as prefer it in that form, the Living Age is put up in monthly parts, containing four or five weekly numbers. In this shape it shows to great advantage in comparison with other works, containing in each part double the matter of any of the quarterlies. But we recommend the weekly numbers, as fresher and fuller of life. The volumes are published quarterly, each volume containing as much matter as a quarterly review gives in eighteen months.

I wish it every success; and my only fear is, that it may not meet as full success with the public as it deserves. I shall be glad to be a subscriber. I am, very truly and respectfully, yours,
JOSEPH STORY.

Cambridge, April 24, 1844.

DEAR SIR,—I approve very much of the plan of your work, to be published weekly, under the title of the "Living Age:" and if it be conducted with the intelligence, spirit and taste that the prospectus indicates, (of which I have no reason to doubt,) it will be one of the most instructive and popular periodicals of the day.

I wish it abundant success, and that my name be added to the list of subscribers. Yours, very respectfully,
JAMES KENT.

New York, 7th May, 1844.

It seems to me that a selection from the highest foreign journals, if conducted with discrimination and taste, might have a very favorable influence on our reading community, deluged as it is, with periodical and other publications, which have little to recommend them but their cheapness. I have looked occasionally into the Magazine formerly conducted by Mr. Littell, and I have little doubt, from the capacity he showed in that selection, that he would compile a magazine, from the sources indicated in his prospectus, that would furnish a healthy and most agreeable banquet to the reader.

Believe me, Dear Sir, your obedient servant,

WM. H. PRESCOTT.

Boston, May, 1844.

From the specimens that the public has seen, it cannot be doubted that Mr. Littell is able to make, from the mass of contemporary literature, instructive and interesting selections. I wish you success, with all my heart.

Yours, very truly,

GEORGE BANCROFT.

DEAR SIR,—I have never seen any similar publication of equal merit; and I heartily wish for it that wide success it deserves, as a most agreeable and useful selection from that vast mass of the current periodical literature of our time, which has grown to such importance that none are beyond the reach of its influence, and few can safely be ignorant of what it is constantly sending forth to the world. Be pleased, therefore, to consider me a regular subscriber to the Living Age from the beginning.

Very truly yours,

GEO. TICKNOR.

Boston, 5th August, 1844.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have much pleasure in congratulating you upon the success of the Living Age, which has been well deserved by the great cleverness shown in its management. It has been a welcome visiter to my family, always giving us a variety of instructive and pleasant reading. Indeed, the only fault I have to find with it, is that it gives too much weekly—a fault which those of more leisure than myself, will not be likely to find.

Yours, very truly,

GEO. W. BETHUNE.

Philadelphia, October 29th, 1844.

WASHINGTON, 27TH DECEMBER, 1845.

Of all the Periodical Journals devoted to literature and science which abound in Europe and in this country, this has appeared to me to be the most useful. It contains indeed the exposition only of the current literature of the English language, but this by its immense extent and comprehension includes a portraiture of the human mind in the utmost expansion of the present age.

SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.

Far up in the north of Europe stands the grim, old castle of Cronenberg. Its lofty, elegant towers rise high above the massive buildings at their feet and the white cross of Denmark looks proudly down upon land and sea. It is a strange, mysterious castle, the palace of Cronenberg, and a thousand dark stories hover around its drawbridges, its gloomy archways and silent, deserted walls. Here mourned for a long, dreary winter the unhappy queen, Carolina Matilda of England, whose only fault was that none could behold her without admiration, none know her and not love her. And poor, brilliant Struensee who, from a low-born, humble physician, rose to be a king's master and Denmark's true sovereign, Struensee, whose lofty ambition soared higher yet, knew her and loved her. A woman's jealousy—all queen that she was—betrayed their secret, and the same day saw the fair queen humbled, disgraced, a prisoner in the dark, old castle, and the young count lay his head on the block and breathe her name even under the executioner's axe.

Across a dreary common, close to the palace, there is an old, deserted garden; a house stands, tenantless, in the centre; a few broken defaced statues lie in utter desolation about, whilst the soft moss oozes in patches from the broken terrace-steps, and on a high bank there smile a few stray flowers, entwined with graceful vines. A willow stands there alone; its delicate leaves tremble in the evening breeze and the long, weeping branches gently kiss the humble grave which they tenderly shroud. Beneath it lies Hamlet.

There are the ramparts, too, which he paced to and fro, musing or waiting for him whom he alone not feared. There are the proud walls of Elsinore, there also the dark-blue waters of the Sound, and in the distance the dim line of the Swedish coast with the huge fortress of Helsingborg in the background. A breeze has sprung up and sail after sail rises above the horizon, and vessel after vessel passes close under the guns of the old castle. A gigantic full-rigged ship, the cross of England flying from its mizen-mast, bears down through the narrow passage; suddenly, her head off shore, she heaves to with her fore-top-sail aback, a small cutter approaches, an officer boards her and patiently has she to wait for Denmark's pleasure. A Frenchman follows, several Swedish schooners running down before the wind are close upon his heels and a clumsy, old-fashioned Dane comes slowly, majestically to join the crowd. But all, the moment they reach the ominous passage, haul up their fore course and let their top-sails settle on the caps, until they also are boarded. A fleet is assembled; the flags of all nations are run up to salute the Danebrog, and without murmur, they heave to and let go their anchors. But what are those sharp, low clipper-built vessels that come coursing down from the north-west, the jibboom of the second almost touching the stern boat of the first? How they dash the foam from their sharp sides; how gallantly they come on under a cloud of canvass with studding sails aloft and aloft! But see, they have reached the first gun-boat lying across the passage and they dart past it, unmindful of the stern command with which they are ordered to heave to. Not a sound is heard on board the bold vessels. A white cloud rises on the ramparts of the old castle, a strange whizzing noise is heard and a heavy cannon ball falls a few fathoms beyond the foremost. Still no sign of life. A second shot nearly touches the bowsprit. The strangers see the firing is in earnest and, as if by magic, a large flag is run up, the breeze quickly unfolds it and the star-spangled banner floats proudly over Denmark's waters. Almost at the same time the second schooner comes up, nearly abreast of the bark, and as their ensign greets the eyes of the crew, three cheers rise in the clear air until the walls of the fortress echo the sound and send it across to the Swedish coast.

And they do not heave to; they pass the English and the French vessels; they pass the fortifications of the Danes, bristling with cannon, and the low, black man of war that lies threatening on the opposite side; they sail down towards the city of Copenhagen and, with wonder in their eyes, the astonished Danes turn around and ask who the bold strangers can be, that dare pass the Sound when Denmark has closed the Baltic to the nations of the earth? But before an answer is given, a small but beautiful yacht glides gracefully out from a narrow bay under the very ramparts of the castle; her white sides glisten brilliantly in the golden light of the setting sun and with her sails loosened and her ensign streaming she skims over the waves and hastens to rejoin the strange vessels. They know her, however, the good Danes, they recognize now the stars and stripes that have so often covered the fine, spacious deck of the hospitable yacht, when, under America's flag, her generous owner drank the health of Denmark, whose fair daughters loved to dance as their fathers loved to sail on board the fastest vessel that ever passed the Sound.

And how were such most precious privileges obtained? Not by the tortuous policy, the cunning devices, the skilful negotiations of European diplomats, but by the plain, straight forward, but determined declarations of a representative of the Great Republic. A simple citizen of the Union, her minister, had represented to the Danish Cabinet the injustice of imposing the same restrictions upon the continental powers of Europe and the far-distant republic, who by her ships and her intercourse could but benefit the small islands, and who had no interest in the struggle with the rebellious provinces. And such had been the force of his arguments—such the influence which the name of his country and the respect entertained for his personal character had brought to bear on the subject, that the proud flag of the Union alone of all the maritime nations of the earth passed unmolested through the waters of Denmark.

They were closed to all others, for Denmark, small, insular Denmark, was at war with great, powerful Germany. A noble sight, indeed they were, these bold islanders, as, few in numbers, unsupported by friends or allies, trusting alone in the God of their forefathers and the sacred right of their cause, they hesitated not to risk their lives and their fortunes in a war against the forty-four millions of Germans, who spoke of crushing them in a few months and threatened to blot their kingdom from the maps of Europe. But they are a bold and stubborn race; the undaunted courage of the Northman animates even now the bold Dane, and the hot blood and the fearless spirit of the Viking of old has been proved even in our day by many a bold exploit and many a bravely fought battle. Can we withhold our admiration when we see a kingdom, the smallest of the small, poor in soil, but thinly inhabited, cursed with a cruel climate and fearful storms, and strong only in faith and in courage, occupied at the same time with the consolidation of its national liberty and engaged with all its might in the defence of its right, its territories, its own children,—struggling hard, but ever honorably in sustaining a foreign war abroad and subduing reckless insurrection at home? If Denmark is no longer, as she has been for centuries, the powerful state of the North, giving kings to England, holding half of Germany in subjection, ruling all Sweden and Norway—if she has lost successively her German provinces, Sweden, and finally even her much beloved daughter, rugged, stern, but affectionate Norway—if England has burned her fleet and Sweden robbed her of her commerce, her children at least have lost none of their virtues, and a brave and noble race, they have proved themselves worthy of their time-honored name and the proud renown of their fathers.

This war, it is true, is not one of mere national pride, or of unimportant interests; they have given their fortunes and laid down their lives not merely for the recovery of one or two fertile provinces: the Danes fight for their very existence. They cannot exist without the so-called duchies of Schleswig and Helstein; the crown of Denmark loses its brightest jewels in those rich, fair lands, that have been to Denmark what Java has been to Holland; one half of her inhabitants, nearly three-fourths of her revenue, are at stake, and with the loss of those rebellious provinces falls the great wall which alone has prevented the German element from invading the peninsula and from destroying forever the nationality of the Danes.

For here also, in this fearless struggle of a small, but bold and determined people against the great Empire, we see the question of nationality mixed up with the desire of freedom. Here also, the rights of the race and the rights of the individual have been joined in a common cause, and the principle that Germany ought to extend wherever the German tongue is spoken, has proved itself as strong as the loudest clamor for Liberty and Independence. Here also, we must not forget, the conflict is not of yesterday, rising with the first gusts of the revolutionary tempest and subsiding as its last dying sighs pass over the fearful traces it has left on Europe. It is not a new movement; it is one of long duration, sedulously fanned by ambitious politicians, carefully nursed by the interested sympathy and well-calculated coöperation of Germany, which dates as far back as the earliest, ever ready ambition of her great Emperors to extend her limits to the uttermost boundaries of the firm land. What else was it that eight hundred years ago brought the great Emperor with his most renowned knights, his most famous warriors, their lances in rest and their hands on their swords, across the Dannevirke, there to display their lofty valor in vain and to leave their bright renown on that great bulwark of Scandinavia? What else was it that carried the proud Othe, one of Germany's greatest sons, with his swarm of priests and monks, singing their holy chants in the shade of a thousand crosses and Christian banners, across the small stream that, a second Rubicon, has for a thousand years divided the bold islanders from the Continent? What else induced the world-famous Count Geert of Holstein, whose courage was so dazzling and whose strength so amazing, that the incredulous multitude thought him possessed by the Berserker rage of the old Northern heroes, to make all Jutland German by the force of his sword and the unsupported bravery of his bold followers? What, finally, has of late sent the cold, calculating Prussian, the warm-hearted Rhinelander, the impetuous Swabian, towards the same fatal battle-fields, and caused Germany to spend her millions and venture her armies at a time when her own lands were threatened with the fearful scourge of civil war and discord reigned in her own councils? It is true, her scholars, her statesmen, and, above all, her kings—yes, even her kings on their tottering thrones, had long cherished magnificent dreams of the restoration of the once so great German Empire. Buried apparently in profound slumber, living only as the unconscious plant vegetates, they dreamed and thought of the great German race, that had built up powerful Empires at home, counted brothers all over Scandinavia, and had sent out from their own midst the fathers of those Anglo-Saxons who, the ever-active messengers of civilization, had carried their blood and their fame ever into Great Britain and across distant oceans to a New World. The idea gained ground and won favor with every year: to consolidate the German race by all requisite institutions, and to extend its natural frontiers by a somewhat unscrupulous interpretation of public law, became the favorite idea of the so-called Historical School. Statesmen and sovereigns were easily led to adopt and support such views; for was it not a disgrace that Germany, great Germany, should be without maritime power? For centuries she had struggled towards the sea-board as the plant struggles towards the light, and always had Denmark, little Denmark interposed her proud ships, and the bold eagle of the Empire had shrunk back before the humble cross of the Danebrog. Then, before the eyes of ambitious Germany, lay the fine harbors, the extensive coasts, the opulent cities of Denmark with their sea-bred populations; there, at the mouth of her own mighty rivers, lay the great seaports of Hamburg and Lubeck, of Kiel and of Flensburg, which were not hers, and whose flag was honored abroad, and poured the treasures of distant continents into their lap, whilst she saw with envy and jealousy their increasing wealth and political power.

Nor was it a mere dream: nations dream not in vain, and even the indefinite longing of awaking youth, in the history of races, produces events which future ages only see clearly and the eye of the historian alone can trace back to their first germ. Thus the German also did not in vain think of the island that lay so temptingly right at his door, and as the ardor longing for the golden fruits and the genial sun of the south carried emperor after emperor and army after army over the snow-clad Alps into Italy's fertile plains, so were noblemen and artisans, renowned warriors and humble serfs seen to cross the fatal stream, the Eyder, the "ultimus terminus Imperii Romani" to settle on the green fields of Southern Denmark. The wealthy farmer of Holstein was pleased with the gently rolling, fertile meadows of Schleswig and built there his massive houses and still grander stables, until the fields and the woods, the banquet-hall and the servants' rooms resounded with the broad, affectionate language of the North. The opulent merchant of the Hanse Towns foresaw with never erring penetration the future greatness of the wide harbors of Kiel and Flensburg and brought wealth, energy and wisdom to the towns of Schleswig, where the haughty alderman in his council and the busy clerk in his counting-room, the staid wagoner in the narrow streets and the bold mariner from the vast deep spoke German from morning till evening. Artisans were called in and brought, with the art and the skill of the German, his tongue also to every hamlet of Schleswig. Then came the Reformation and replaced the unintelligible Latin of the monks by the newly-formed language of the great Luther himself, teaching a new faith in a new tongue and spreading it all over the duchy, so that German prayers were heard in the house of the Lord and around the family-altar, and the word of God was preached far and wide in the Reformer's own idiom. Scholars and authors followed soon; pleadings were held in German, sentence was given in German, governors ruled in German, and teachers taught in German, year after year, century after century, until the idiom had nearly conquered the country and where formerly Danish had been the language of the solemn council assembled in Thing, of the judge on his bench, of the family round their fireside, it now was a forbidden tongue and a royal edict (1824) allowed the use of the Danish only to such representatives in the National Assembly as did not know enough German to make themselves understood!

Thus Schleswig became German in almost all its external features, in law, religion and instruction; its trade, its coins, even its customs and manners were German. Railroads continued the conquest by connecting the duchy, separated as it was only by a small stream, more closely still with Germany itself, and gradually the honest and affectionate German became the true ally of the bold and proud man of Schleswig, who called the Dane his master but the German his brother, and who looked to Copenhagen for taxes and imposts but to Germany for the light of science, the benign influence of the arts and the blessings of the true faith.

This silent, slow and gradual invasion of a new idiom and a new nationality was the more easily accomplished and resulted in the more complete amalgamation as there was in truth originally little difference of race or tongue. Saxony had been the cradle of the English people in common with the land of the Angle and the Jute; one dialect was originally spoken in all the low lands of Northern Germany and the adjoining islands, and the Anglo-Saxon of Great Britain understood and used both Danish and Low-German with equal facility. Even the geographical position of Denmark facilitated such a union: the peninsula seems to the eye of the casual observer, and is to the geologist, only a continuation of Lower Germany; the Eyder separates it but little more than for a part of its boundary, and whilst Sweden and Norway have a formation of their own and rear their gigantic piles of granite towards their ever-threatening sky, Denmark slopes gently down from Germany's lofty mountains towards the blue ocean. Like Holstein it extends its level lands, mostly rich, fertile meadows, to the Elbe, the Baltic and the North Sea, and hence also shows the same intimate connection with Germany in all the peculiar features of its national character. Quiet, because slowly moved, but earnest, and when once roused never to be bent from his self-proposed aim, the inhabitant of Schleswig has little fancy or poesy in him, but hides his deep, warm feelings under a rough, and seemingly stolid exterior. Speaking but slowly and not without a certain timid hesitation in a harsh and most unmelodious dialect, he shows still in what he says far more practical good sense and sound judgment than his more lively neighbors. Although for ages accustomed to bend his neck under the hard yoke of the most absolute monarchs, and a loyal subject of his sovereign, he is not without the old Saxon pride and dignity, and many a bloody war and fierce encounter has he had with too harsh a master or too arbitrary a ruler.

For a warlike race they are, the people of both Schleswig and Holstein, all peaceful and quiet as they appear in the steady pursuit of their rural occupations; and if they love no longer to rove over distant seas and oceans, to ride up the mighty rivers of the continent on their prancing sea-horses, and to carve out for themselves kingdoms and empires wherever the fair lands and rich treasures of the weak Southerner may tempt them, they are still ever found ready to seize the deadly weapon and, from their sweet fields and placid lakes to rush forth into the very midst of the fiercely raging battle. Warm friends of those they love and faithful subjects of the kings they honor, they have century after century risen in arms against the foe abroad and the enemy in their own fair lands. Powerful kings have despaired to force them into subjection, while youthful leaders, self-chosen, have led them like children. Emperors have marched their armies against them to return defeated and yet a few kind words have extinguished the flames of blazing rebellion. Bitter is their hatred of the enemy, warm and not easily shaken their love of the friend. And who has ever been a dearer friend, a more beloved brother to them than the tall, proud son of Holstein? With him they are connected by a thousand ties of blood; the same rich pastures with their sleek white heads of Europe's finest cattle, spread over the lands of the brothers; the same home-like houses with their air of patriarchal simplicity and all the comforts of abundance are scattered over the German duchy of Holstein and the Danish duchy of Schleswig; as friends and as brothers they greet each other across the fair river Eyder and brave on board their far-famed vessels the same dangers, hand in hand and heart to heart. Shall a river divide those whom one father, one faith, one tongue and one nature have made brothers? Has the old father Rhine left Aix la Chapelle to the Frenchman or the mighty Danube been a barrier against the Slavonian?

Nor does history say that those whom nature, descent and fraternal love have united, should be divided by the will of the Great on earth or the dead letter of fading parchments. Free men on their own soil, owing allegiance to none and never enslaved by the sword of the conqueror, they have entrusted their own rights to self-chosen sovereigns and from time immemorial the dukes have said to each other "your master shall be my master and your laws my laws!" Thus in the great charter of rights of the two countries, (1460) the basis of all their privileges and the only decisive authority in the dispute of last year, King Christian, of Denmark, declares "that the estates of Schleswig and Holstein are to remain forever and ever undivided; that they have of their own free will and by their own inherent right, without any regard to his being king of Denmark, chosen him for their Duke and Count, and that after his death and whenever he should have but one lawful heir to succeed him on the throne of Denmark, they should have the right to choose their own chief, provided only he be of the kin and lineage of the deceased."

This charter sworn to with a solemn oath before the States General of the duchies and acknowledged by all Danish sovereigns, successors of Christian of the house of Oldenburg, must secure to them and guaranty their ancient rights. Their sovereigns were accidentally kings of Denmark, but they knew them only as dukes of Schleswig-Holstein; their laws might be adopted by the Diet of Roeskilde, but they knew them only as their own, and never was tax imposed, or war-contribution demanded of them without the express consent of their own National Assembly and the undoubted understanding that it was all to be expended for their own interests alone. Many, it is true, were the disputes and many the wars to which the complicated right of succession of the German law led subsequently; the house of Oldenburg, divided into numberless lines of cognates and agnates, were constantly at law or at war, clamoring aloud for their claims to the succession or trying to substitute the right of the stronger for the power of the law. Sovereign after sovereign had to fight the battle over again and council after council met to decide whether the duchies were to be held as a military, or a simple, or a hereditary fief of Denmark. Emperors were appealed to and popes were called upon to determine the right of the contending parties; royal edicts were issued and solemn protests entered against them, long negotiations were carried on, and bloody wars were fought to settle this vexed question—but in vain! The laws of Denmark declared the duchies permanent and inalienable possessions of the Danish crown; the decrees of the States of the duchies claimed for them perfect independence and a mere personal union in the reigning monarch of Denmark. Thus it was when, after the bloodless revolution of 1660, the old elective constitution was overturned and the crown became hereditary in the Oldenburg dynasty, to which the duchies did not subscribe nor swear allegiance. Thus it was also in the often quoted peace of 1720, when Sweden, England and France agreed to guaranty to the crown of Denmark “that part of the duchy of Schleswig which His Danish Majesty has (had then) in hand.” Nor was the peaceful relation between the duchies and Denmark undisturbed from abroad: pretenders arose from all sides, tenth and twentieth cousins claiming fabulous rights and satisfied with paltry sums paid as compensation, and powerful monarchs of Sweden or Russia, anxious to secure the Sound and pacified only by an arbitrary exchange of lands and souls.

For nowhere perhaps has the curse of the principle on which absolute monarchies raise their gorgeous but fragile structures, been more severely felt than in the unfortunate duchies. Their lands, silted by the hands of their fathers and dear to them by the sacred recollections of long ages, were given away, exchanged, presented and accepted as so many bales of merchandise; their own lives, the gift of their God and the hope of their children, were dealt with as the private property of sovereigns and princes, until they knew no longer who was their master, and when Germany at last called upon all her brave sons and the cry of Union and Liberty came from the oak-forests of the old mother-country down to the shores of the Baltic, they remembered that they too were men, free born and possessing inalienable rights: the cheering words of forty millions of brothers spoke to their hearts and found an echo there that drowned the voice of artificial duties, based upon treaties they had not contracted and imposed by men they had not chosen to be their masters. In Lauenburg, in Holstein, in Schleswig, the German rose and demanded to be free once more and a German once more. The days of their ancient glory rose again before their eyes: the proud banners of the Danes were again lowered before the lions of Schleswig and Holstein, as of old, when on the plains of the Lohheide, (1261) they fought till evening dusk, and victory, glorious victory, crowned their manly efforts; the crowns of the three kingdoms of Denmark, Sweden and Norway lay once more at the feet of their leaders as they did after the fearful day of Immervad (1700) when King Erich bowed his haughty head before their invincible valor; their triumphs over the Dittmarshes were sung in many an ancient war-song; their victories over the Swedes were told in a hundred old legends, and gray-haired men would relate the glorious part they had taken in the famous battles against the Emperor.

But where were now those banners and flags under which they had so bravely fought for centuries, those eternal symbols of all that their country had done and had suffered? They had been taken from them and their valiant sons fought under the red and white cross of the Dane. Where were the proud vessels that had carried their children through tempest and storm, over the distant oceans and through their own dangerous waters? They sailed under Danish commanders with the humiliating words “Dansk Eiendom,” (Danish property,) past the flags of nations that had formerly greeted them with respect and admiration. They listened with the sacred love of their country in their hearts, to the orator who spoke of the lofty deeds of their ancestors; they joined with enthusiasm in the patriotic songs of their poets who sang of the fame and the glory of their fathers, and found themselves commanded by Danish officers, judged by Danish judges, and ruled by Danish magistrates. Their last farthing was taken from them to fill the treasure of the king of the Danes; their own coins were superseded by the paper-money of the Danes; their own schools were transferred to the island of the Danes, and their appeals, their demands—their humble prayers even were met with a cold refusal or with haughty scorn. In vain did they hold meetings and adopt resolutions; in vain did they plead that the kings of Denmark themselves had done all in their power to strengthen the union between the two duchies, giving to both one administration, one army, and one commander in the person of the heir presumptive, the duke of Holstein-Augustenburg; in vain did they protest against the attempts of Denmark to reconquer their own lands, and appeal even, as early as 1822, to the German Diet for aid against the oppressor. Ever since the Congress of Vienna, no year passed by without some attempt of the duchies to assert their rights; their papers and those of Germany were filled with arguments and pleadings; pamphlets and books were written on the vexatious question; discussions, long and animated, were maintained between the Universities of both countries, and neither warnings were wanting, nor preparations omitted, for the war that all felt must at last decide. Already in 1844 the States General of the duchies had openly proclaimed their intention of maintaining and, if God's clemency would not prevent it, maintaining with sword in hand, that Schleswig and Holstein were independent States—that according to the German Law prevailing among them, the male line alone could inherit the sovereignty over them, and that the two duchies were forever inseparably united. But when in 1846 the then reigning king issued letters patent, determining the succession in Schleswig and Holstein after the Danish law, "so that the integrity of the Danish monarchy might not be altered," when it became evident that the present king, Frederick VII., would die without issue and the crown descend on his feeble and childless uncle, Ferdinand, who himself would be succeeded by the female heirs of the last occupant—then they rose with one cry of deep, general indignation. For they claimed that no king had a right to determine the succession for the duchies, without at least the consent of their States, and that no king could create a new Denmark with their own lands as mere provinces. Their law, a private law, which no sovereign could alter without the consent of all parties concerned, made the male heirs of their self-chosen master, Christian I., alone their dukes; the duke of Holstein-Augustenburg, whom Denmark had already given them as their natural protector and governor, was their only righteous lord, and him they would choose or none. Was it fair, they asked their brethren in Frankfurth assembled, that Schleswig and its beloved neighbor of Holstein, with whom identity of race, tongue, laws, and national character had united them for centuries, should take their laws from Denmark, with whom no tie of blood, no sworn constitution united them, whilst the only bond, the personal union, would cease with the extinction of the male line? Were their citizens to be subject to a Danish governor in Copenhagen; were their soldiers to be commanded by a Danish general in Jutland, and their pulpits to be filled by ministers taught in Danish seminaries? Had they not ever had their own German Foreign Office, their own German Governor, and their own German Supreme Court in Schleswig?

The fatal month of February, (1848,) brought here also matters to a crisis; the flame, long glimmering under the ashes, broke forth in a bright blaze, and a few months afterwards the rear of the cannon and the din of battle were heard all over the north of Germany.

For the Dane was not willing to let Germany have his richest lands and his finest harbors. To the claims of the duchies, he opposed claims not less strong and enforced by the advantage of actual possession. All Holstein, he acknowledged, might be German, half of Schleswig at least was Danish no longer, but had not he opened the door of his hospitable house to the stranger and taken the foreigner by the hand with all the hearty kindness of the North and bid him welcome in his own fair lands? Had he warmed a viper in his bosom? It was surely, he said, a poor reward for his friendship, now legally to claim the very country that had fed them when they were hungry and clad them when they were naked. For nine long centuries had Schleswig been Danish, so truly so, that no other province from heathen ages had ever been more Danish, and now the German, who had come as a guest, if not as a beggar, to the rich pastures and fair rivers of the Jute, had brought his tongue and his customs to the friendly neighbor only to drive the children of the soil from their own inheritance. Did even long indulgence, the hospitality of centuries, give him a prescriptive right? Let Germany take Holstein, he said, that ever was a German province, a fief of the Empire, and be satisfied with robbing her weak, defenceless neighbor—but let her not claim Schleswig, that always was one of the brightest jewels in Denmark's crown. It is not fair—it is not lawful. And where would the German arrest his invasion, if once allowed to cross the Eider, that natural boundary line, which ever since Denmark made Europe respect her proud banner of the Danebrog and the daring Norman made his name renowned through all Christendom, had been the great barrier between his isle and the continent? In defending the Bydø, Denmark defended ancient Scandinavia against the encroachment of Germany. But still other dangers threatened. Denmark had long been the guardian of the Baltic, and her strong castle of Elsinør alone had kept the stormy waters of the North in the possession of the Teuton. If she falls, the ancient, ever watchful sentinel on the lofty towers of the Sound, the Slave would send his proud ships into the seas that wash the German shores, and the Baltic would become the bride of the barbarian Russian, as Venice had been the betrothed of the Adriatic. The cross of St. Andrew, that already began to threaten the crescent on Constantinople's strong bastions, and to contest the rights of Great Britain to the fair Mediterranean, would soon claim the waters of the North as her own, and by land and by sea once more invade the west of Europe.

And who were, they finally asked, the rebels themselves, and what did they demand? Denmark yielded as far as she could by giving up Holstein, which by language, political institutions and national character, truly belonged to Germany and now wished, naturally, to join the new, great confederacy. She sacrificed willingly all her ancient, well-established rights, sanctioned by solemn treaties and guaranteed by the Congress of Vienna. She offered to Schleswig her own provincial States, left her to use whatever language she preferred, granted her all privileges ever conferred or asked for, and allowed her to send as many representatives to the National Assembly as all the rest of Denmark together. Was not this more than just—liberal and even generous? What then had brought the scourge of civil war on their happy island? They knew it: the ambition of a nobleman, the embarrassment of Frederick William of Prussia, and the mad theories of the men of Frankfurth? A proud and a haughty man, the duke of Holstein-Augustenburg, had long been anxious to establish his doubtful claims to the succession in the duchies. A large and very wealthy landowner in Schleswig, he was, though a duke but in name, the presumptive heir to both the duchies and had long been active in agitating the land by notes, pamphlets and newspaper polemics. Diplomatic notes had been sent to the continental courts appealing to them for assistance in securing his threatened rights, promises had been made to the German powers of future maritime advantages and no means left unemployed in strengthening his position and bringing matters to a crisis. Among these were skilful appeals to the magnanimity of the Prussian king who loved to play the protector of the pretended oppressed, and to recover by the implied flattery of such an appeal, part of his lost popularity. His throne was tottering and his life even had been in danger; his subjects were rife for open rebellion, and by his weakness and inconsistency his brave troops had been compelled to leave the capital in disgrace. Here was a cause now, apparently just and honorable, in which to raise himself again in the esteem of his people; here a field where his chafing, discontented guards could wipe out the stain on their banners; here was finally an occasion to show himself, what he loved so much to call himself, the sword and the shield of all Germany, and thus to secure his ambitious views upon her Imperial crown. He also had a danger to avert: with his provinces in fermentation, his capital in open rebellion, his army bound only by their most noble loyalty, could he allow so near a neighbor as Holstein to proclaim the people seveorign and to raise a brand that would at once set fire to all his possessions?

A willing agent therefore of German ambition, and seeing in Schleswig-Holstein the cradle of a future German navy, he eagerly seized on the offer to become the hero of the Empire, and sent his impatient troops at once into Holstein, without waiting for the orders of the Diet at Frankfurth, or even condescending to give the usual notice of a declaration of war.

The invasion found Denmark little prepared to defend herself; the administration of the late king had been ruinous, the army for the sake of economy reduced to a mere skeleton, the ships laid up in docks, or with the exception of a single man-of-war, left without rigging or crews, the finances exhausted and one-third of all her territory in open rebellion. Success, it is true, had hitherto accompanied the Danish troops against Schleswig-Holstein, and the towns of Flensburg and Schleswig had been easily retaken, but now that all Germany sent her powerful armies against the small insular kingdom, what could valor and patriotism avail against such overwhelming force?

It was a fair day of Spring, when the Sound was filled with vessels of all nations that came crowding down under the protection of the strong walls of Copenhagen. The king had left his beautiful palace of Fredericksberg and come to town to consult with his ministers. With care on his brow and vexation in his features, he stood on his balcony and looked down upon the blue waters before him, where the Danebrog floated yet so proudly from castle and masthead. There lay his gigantic three-deckers, with their prows towards the ocean, as if impatient to glide once more from the fettering stocks into the deep sea,—there the sun played on the bronze guns upon the walls of the strong forts in the Sound,—there too lay the dark steamers of Russia, a terrible force, and the more terrible, as nobody knew yet whose friend and whose foe the Slave was to be. His eye sought the distant Swedish coast where the brother of Scandinavia lived, who would surely not leave him to lose his fair islands and fall a victim to the German's selfish ambition. But there was no energy in those sensual and still pale lips, in that full, drooping chin; dissipation had bloated his face and debauchery extinguished the fire of his eye. The brilliant uniform sat but ill on his debilitated frame, and the receding forehead, the glazed eye, the unmeaning expression—all gave evidence that a wreck only was left of Denmark's proud king. No friend stood at his side with useful counsel and heart-soothing sympathy; for Frederick VII. had subjects only, no friends. No sister came to comfort him, as the greatest of the Bourbons, Louis Philippe's beloved friend, had done—the king of Denmark had royal relations, but knew not the love of a brother. No wife was there to smooth his anxious brow and pour the balm of sweet love on his wounded heart: two fair and lovely queens had he bought, but like drooping flowers that the rude storm had wantonly broken, they had fled to their beloved homes, gladly exchanging a lofty throne for a peaceful, humble shelter under a parent's tender care. Willingly would he have followed the eighth Henry's example, but crowns had strangely fallen in value of late, and even sovereigns, warned by the rising waves of rebellion, remembered that they were fathers also and not monarchs alone.

There was but one man, whose noble soul and lofty mind bade him stand by the side of his king when all others abandoned him and when danger, fearful danger, threatened his native land. The chamberlain's soft voice has not reached the king's ear; the folding doors open wide, and with a firm step, but self-respecting reverence in his whole manner, the head of the great family of the Moltke's, the "noble count," as the people call him, enters slowly. And a noble man he appears, as his powerful figure strides through the lofty hall, and his venerable head bows humbly before his royal master. The friend of three kings, the idol of two generations, imposing in his simple, quiet dignity, and winning all hearts by his warm, affectionate kindness, he had for years stood aloof from a court whose manners shocked his high-toned principles, and from a king whom the loftiest loyalty alone could induce him to honor. Surrounded by a family that almost worshipped him, in the midst of rich treasures of literature and works of art, he had hoped to spend a quiet and happy old age in befitting preparation for the life to come. But his country was in danger, his king called and there he was once more at his post, once more ready to sacrifice all on the altar of beloved Denmark. His noble, striking features that apprehension had marked but the more strongly, were full of hope and confidence as his king's eye fell upon him; his step grew firm, his carriage erect, and his bright, dark eye shone brilliantly from under the golden lashes of Scandinavia's fair sen. Long was the interview between the depending monarch and the loyal subject; but the result was soon known and hope and enthusiasm revived once more in all hearts.

The long deserted docks were again busy with a thousand eager hands, and as vessel after vessel, raising their tall masts and unfurling the proud Danebrog to the evening breeze, sat throned once more on the dark waters of the Sound, shouts of joy and anticipated victory rose in the air and were taken by ship after ship until they reached the sister land, and the deep echo of Sweden's rock-bound shore, sent them back across the broad channel. Eager crowds of stout young Northmen rushed to the banners of Denmark and swore to defend her against the faithless German; merchants and bankers offered their riches, and high and low, young and old, anxiously asked permission to contribute their mite. From far and near, from Italy and distant America, the children of the island hastened home to join their brethren; bear-hunters left the eternal snow of Northland's lofty mountains, and bold seamen came from the wintry harbors of ice-bound Norway to help the threatened sister-isle. A noble youth, the son of Norway's viceroy, enlisted as a private soldier, and finding that more yet ought to be done, hastened home, appealed to the Norwegians, in Storthing assembled and returned with a valiant band of brave warriors, soon, alas, to fall gloriously under the very banner they had come to defend. For the sons of Norway felt themselves still the children of Denmark; for long centuries they had been one house and one family, and the narrow Sound, the well-known sea was less of a barrier between them, than the impassable mountain ridge that separates them from Sweden. Nor did the third sister, old Sverige herself, withhold her warm sympathy and cordial friendship from her threatened neighbor, with whom common blood and common interest united her closely in spite of the long jealousy and rivalry that had so often arrayed them against each other. Her fleet was held in readiness, her army increased, and twenty thousand men sent into the islands themselves to march against Germany as soon as Scandinavia proper, Jutland, should be invaded.

Before, however, the unequal contest was begun, which was to decide the fate of one of Europe's most ancient and most honored kingdoms, negotiations were opened at Hamburg, the Danish troops ordered to remain inactive and only the blockade of the German ports continued. Suddenly, whilst rumors of peace were filling the souls of men with bright hopes, and the trumpet had called the pious Danes to assemble round the cross of our Saviour, to celebrate the holy day of Easter, General Wrangel fell upon the unsuspecting Northmen with double their force and all the advantages of unexpected surprise. For eight hours did the fearful battle rage; now the admirable skill and unsurpassed discipline of the Prussians would carry them into the very midst of the enemy; now the fearless bravery and almost sacred enthusiasm of the Danes would gain the day. Here the mild spring sun fell upon the brilliant accoutrements of the German regiments; there a passing cloud would darken the stern features of the Norwegians, as, with cool contempt of death, they allowed the Prussian troops to approach closely, then fired and suddenly rushed forth, smashing with the butt-ends of their rifles the bright helmets of the retreating guards. It was a tremendous conflict, and as the mantle of evening fell on the bloody battle-field with its sad ruins and pale corpses, the Germans sank exhausted to the ground, whilst the Danes retreated with sounding trumpet and waving banners across a small arm of the sea to the island of Alsén, unconquered and unmolested.

There, upon a steep, wild eminence, lay the old castle of Sonderburg, its walls bristling with cannon, its windows walled up, and a thousand loopholes threatening death to the daring invader. A line of formidable batteries protected the coast, against which the breakers rose with their white crests as if they too promised to raise the dark rocks underneath in defence of their beloved island. Long, black vessels are anchored in the channel itself, and so covered as to admit the passage of troops and artillery; but a few moments would suffice to free them again and to bring the fire of their long guns to bear on the opposite coast. Deep ditches, high, smooth walls and impenetrable palisades defend the approach to the bridge, and blockhouses, with guns on their roofs and permanent garrisons within, promise, at the last extremity, a successful resistance. But where are the smiling fields and sweet meadows that used to charm even the traveller from distant lands and happier climes? Where the neat, snug houses with their bright windows and tidy out-buildings? Bayonets glitter under the canopy of the venerable beech trees, and guns threaten behind the blackened walls of ruined mansions. And high over the deserted village church rise the tall masts of the corvette that lies in the shady little harbor close to the old palace, and half a dozen gun-boats rise slowly with the long swell that alone betrays the near ocean. But farther out two low, mysterious vessels, without mast or rigging, are seen gently gliding down towards the batteries on shore. Two high walls of sand bags protect their bulwarks, and long rows of gigantic rifles are ranged within. They are Denmark's great, secret weapon, the Eस्पingole; that fearful instrument of death, which sends forty shots in less than two minutes to a distance of 600 yards with never erring precision.

Farther inland long white rows of gay tents stretch along the edge of beautiful, old forests; there the neighing of horses betrays the heavy dragoon in his brilliant, red uniform; here the ancient banner of Norway and the stern, solemn air of the men, indicate the sharp-shooter of Bergen, whilst close by his side the merry laugh and incessant chattering speak of the livelier nature of the Schleswig soldier.

Leaving the head-quarters of the Danish army and crossing another arm of the sea, we approach the island of Fühnen, where the brave Swedes are encamped. There floats the proud banner that sent terror into the hearts of the great Czar of Russia; there is the blue and yellow flag that bold Charles made even the savage Turk respect; there are the three crowns of old Soerige, that brought victory to the stranger and comfort to the Protestant, when Gustavus Adolphus, than whom history knows no nobler king, gave up his life on Lutzen's bloody plains for the cause of religious liberty. And how the Danes left their fields and their houses to welcome once more the stern but warm-hearted brother! How merrily their church bells rang and their gay flags waved, how heartily their cheers rose and their hands pressed the hand of the stranger when he at last came! For miles and miles eager crowds stood anxiously waiting to grasp his hand and bid him welcome to their own sweet home. And the Swede looked around him and when the "God with you!" of his native land fell upon his ear and touched his throbbing heart he would turn aside to hide the falling tear, and with silent joy press the brother to his bosom. And when he followed him under his humble roof and the feeble, old patriarch rose from his seat of honor in the chimney-corner, shading his weak, old eyes to read in the stranger's features the common blood and common faith, the bold soldier knelt down and, after his country's usage, kissed the trembling hand that bade him welcome and asked for his "father's" blessing. For the Swede has still a God, the God of his forefathers, whom he has learned to love in the solemn loneliness of his ever-silent, snow-covered mountains and on the deep dark waters of his mysterious, granite-bound lakes. And when the Sabbath-morning breaks, the trumpet sounds and the roll of the drum passes from regiment to regiment; but not a word is heard and not a command is given, no deadly rifle is shouldered, no prancing horse is mounted. Silent, collected, with grave but cheerful mien, the bold soldiers assemble in the wide court-yard of the old castle or on the gay green-sward before the ivy-covered chapel. Dark and heavy clouds hang over the solemn scene, as the officers take off their plumed hats and the long lines of brave old grenadiers doff their tall bear-skin caps. Down they kneel, their eyes to the ground, their hearts turned up to their Father in Heaven, and from a thousand lips is heard the sacred chant; "a tower of strength is the Lord!" As they rise again, the chaplain of each regiment steps forth in his simple gown, and as he speaks of the God of peace whom they are to implore for aid in conquering peace by the valor of their arms, as he tells them that the glory of victory and the splendor of triumph are like the poor light of man, darkened by a single ray of the sun, the dark clouds part, the deep blue ether smiles once more upon them and the sun himself plays with his golden radiance around the silver-crowned head of the pious servant of the Lord. Nor is it the Sabbath alone that reminds them of their God. At home or abroad, in garrison or on the march, in peace or before the bloody battle, as soon as the first faint dawn rises on the distant horizon, squad meets at the side of squad, and the sergeant reverently laying aside his sword, uncovers his head, and with a low and humble voice repeats a short prayer; then all unite in a hymn and a loud "God save the king!" passing along the line and taken up by regiment after regiment, gives the sign for the resumption of the march. But behind the hedges and walls, kneeling down in the shade of lofty trees or standing with folded hands, side by side, the Danish peasants listen to the impressive sounds and invoke the blessing of the Lord on their beloved brethren. And when on the day of the Lord their dear wives and sweet children have heard their own priests' kind words and have prayed for their king and their land, an old white-haired Dane might be seen slowly to rise and, looking for support in the eyes of the friends around him, say to the priest in his pulpit, "Father, wouldst thou not also pray for the Swede?"

But it was not to her land troops alone that Denmark looked for support in her danger. Had not her brave sons ever been renowned for their glorious deeds on the decks of their noble vessels? Had not the Danebrog floated triumphantly over the cold waters of the north and the fair Mediterranean, long ere the cross of St. George was known upon the ocean? It is true, her fleet had been burnt in her own harbor and her ships were laid up; but still she had a navy yet, and fearful were the curses heaped by the German upon the head of the young midshipman who, with a handful of men, held a proud Hanse Town in terror and cruising indefatigably up and down, sent one rich prize after another to cheer the hearts of his friends at home. Vessel after vessel was thus brought in, and a stately fleet they looked as they lay in the western part of the Sound, close to the old fort near the city; but sad were the hearts of the poor prisoners who filled the hulks of the gigantic men of war and thence saw the Danish flag from many a beautiful ship they had known in their own sweet home.

But if Germany deplored having not a single armed vessel and chafed in her helpless, disgraceful position, she saw her troops do honor to their great country. Town after town fell into their hands; all Schleswig was in their possession, and their bold, old general, the fierce but brave Wrangel, hesitated not to advance even into Jutland proper. Then it was that diplomatic negotiations were opened once more; Denmark engaged the aid and mediation of Sweden and appealed to Russia's interest in all that concerned the Baltic, and to her old hostility against Germany. A Russian fleet, under the command of a son of the Czar, appeared near the Danish Islands, strong remonstrances came from Stockholm to the courts at Berlin and the assembly at Frankfurth, and England also claimed her right of intervention as one of the parties to the treaty of 1720.

In the meantime the war had continued with undiminished bitterness and varying success. In small skirmishes and bold attacks the Danes were rarely unsuccessful; in larger battles German gallantry and Prussian discipline remained triumphant. Thus at the famous battle of Duppel. A long interruption of hostilities and plausible reports of a truce had lulled to sleep the vigilance of the Danes. It was a warm summer-morning, not a breath stirring and only the bees and the birds gave life to the silent landscape. Here and there the Danish riflemen lay lazily slumbering in the high grass and even the horses of their brave dragoons neglected the rich pasture around them. In the camp a few sentinels were drowsily walking up and down, and now and then a face would appear at the opening of a tent, and quickly withdraw from the scorching blaze of the sun. In the Prussian camp all was life and animation; early in the morning the bugle had sounded and the drum had been beaten to appeal; a grand review was to be held in honor of the birthday of the King of Hanover, and all the pomp and circumstance of war were to be displayed to do honor to the old king whose troops were here fighting for the cause of their common fatherland. The sun shone brilliantly upon the bright helmets and shining cuirasses of the Prussian troops as, with admirable and unflinching precision, regiment after regiment fell into line and unfolded its ball-riddled flags. On the left wing heavy well-mounted dragoons and dashing light hussars vied with each other in fine mettled horses and gorgeous uniforms, whilst on the right cannon was ranged near cannon and the dark masses of justly-feared sharpshooters followed the clear, piercing call of their bugles. There were the magnificent guards, the pet of Prussia's pomp-loving king, there the unsurpassed cavalry of Hanover, and when the old hero of many a battle, the Wende Wrangel, covered with orders and decorations, the veteran chief, Halkett, the Hanoverian general, at his side, and their brilliant staffs, passed down the line, and one band of music after another took up the martial air of triumph, and banner after banner was lowered to do honor to the great commander, then that feeling of enthusiasm, that conviction of victory which makes armies almost invincible, animated all hearts and filled all minds. As if to fan the fire into bright flames a light breeze arose, unfolding the proud banners that had triumphantly been borne in many a fierce battle and carrying the strains of their soul-stirring music far over land and sea; their horses pawed the ground with impatience, their hands sought the deadly rifle or grasped more firmly the sword and one thought passed from mind to mind: oh, that we could even now go into battle! And suddenly the old general appears again before them and without a word of explanation, merely pointing out to them the camp of the Danes, gives the command of march! and like an avalanche from lofty Alps the whole army rushes down upon the unsuspecting enemy! Light hussars dash ahead, with their fleet horses over ditches and hedges, picking off sentinel after sentinel; the infantry follows in quick step, not a man beyond the line and still the whole advancing in admirable order; the enemy must give way, there is no resisting such an attack. And now the ranks open here and there, and in the dark gulf between them the threatening mouths of cannon appear and, as the men fall back, vomit streams of fire and send death and destruction into the ranks of the enemy. How merrily the shells and shrapnels leap right into the midst of a forming battalion, and bursting into a hundred sparkling fire-balls, scatter the frightened troops! How gracefully the large, black ball dances along the green turf, rebounding from knoll to knoll until it reaches the very spot at which it was pointed! In vain does the enemy rally his troops from time to time; as the swollen stream carries the fallen tree and heavy rock along with it in its foaming waters, so does the German army pass over square after square and force every line that the brave Danes oppose to their impetuous adversaries. Now they fall back into the old forest near the sandy shores of the channel; the noble old beech-trees, Denmark's pride, shelter them behind their gigantic trunks and refresh them with the cool shade of their thick, impenetrable canopy. But in vain! Prussian sharpshooters scatter themselves along the flanks and pick their men with unerring rifles from behind the trees; they must abandon the forest and retreat towards the sloping coast. The enemy follows; but as the glittering helmets appear from under the dark shade of the wood and the Prussian eagle is seen on its edge, the Danish gun-boats pour a galling fire upon them and immense shells, from the island of Alsen, passing as if endowed with instinct, high over the heads of the children of the soil, strike terror into the German columns. The earth trembles. New brigades, hastily collected, approach to support their Danish brethren. Regiment after regiment marches up, presenting but a small front to avoid the enemy's fire, and when under the shelter of their own gun-boats and batteries, suddenly unfold from behind and display their imposing forces in brilliant array. Four hours did the fearful struggle continue; with admirable patience did the troops stand firm, exposed to General Wrangel's deadly fire; three times did the Danes kill every man and every horse of some of the Prussian batteries until dismounted lancers, with fearless courage, dragged the disabled guns out of the reach of the enemy. At last—the evening shades began already to fall—an officer is seen dashing up the steep hill on which the Danish guards are impatiently waiting the order to prove once more their well-earned renown. "Are your bayonets sharp, children," he asks, and a loud hurrah! from a thousand eager, brave soldiers, drowns his command. How madly they rush down into the plain, and with bayonets fixed, and stern passion in their bronzed features, pass over hedges and ditches! There is no withstanding such an attack. Half an hour passes and the town of Duppel is retaken; one moment the Prussians stand and the next they are seen in wild confusion, hastening in large masses up the hill in their rear, to fall back upon the main body of their army. Burning houses and blazing haystacks shed a fearful light upon the sad spectacle—dark night covering here one portion of the battle-field whilst there a brilliant illumination exhibits a scene of carnage and terror. Now the terrible Epingoles are heard to explode with nervous quickness, whilst the long rolling fire of platoon after platoon forms a constant accompaniment, until just as the sun once more appears between the deep black curtain of approaching tempest-clouds and the horizon, the retreating masses of the German army with their banners in rags and their ranks in disorder are seen moving along the outline of the long ridge of hills, every figure and gun marked with magic distinctness on the golden, illuminated background.

Wherever they met, in their frequent skirmishes, in short but fierce engagements or in tremendous battle, the Danes showed a steady, bold and true courage; their brilliant charges with the bayonet even the German general mentioned in his bulletins with admiration; the fire of the gunboats was terrible, and their light dragoons on their excellent horses unsurpassed in sudden onsets, or successful pursuit of fugitives; Norwegians and Swedes vied with each other in daring feats and undaunted bravery. Nor were their noble seamen inactive. All the ports of Prussia were blockaded; vessels, richly laden vessels, were cut out from among a hundred foreign ships in the very harbors of Hamburg and fortified Stralsund, until the commerce of Prussia was ruined, and the Hanse Towns bitterly repented their participation in the war.

When therefore in June Denmark offered once more to negotiate and England to mediate, public opinion in Germany compelled the Diet, in Frankfurth assembled, to authorize Prussia to conclude a truce, that might serve as a basis for a future treaty of peace. The representatives of the three powers met first at London, then at the small Swedish town of Malmoe, and a truce of three months was readily agreed upon, the main difficulty being only in the provisional form of government for the two duchies. Germany insisted upon the continuation of the present board of regents. Denmark refused to acknowledge an administration appointed by, and consisting of rebels, until a mixed board, selected by the two belligerent powers, conciliated both parties. The sudden and inexplicable refusal of the veteran-commander, General Wrangel, well-nigh destroyed the work of months and the hopes of all the continent. Unwilling to give up the favorable position of his army and much more to dismiss his troops, displeased with some of the articles of the treaty and doubtless supported by his own king, he refused to ratify the articles under the pretence that the signature of the Vicar of the German Empire was not affixed to the treaty. A greater danger for the peace of Europe arose with the equally sudden, patriotic exaltation of the Parliament in Frankfurth, which also at first refused to grant their consent to a treaty in their eyes disgraceful to the honor and the armies of Germany. A week's sober reflection, aided by the loud and determinate expression of the will of the people, sufficed however to convince both the Diet and their great captains, of the fatal effects of such a policy. The treaty was, with few and slight modifications, ratified in August; Schleswig breathed once more freely as the last German soldier passed over the frontier, and the crews of a hundred vessels joyfully threw out their sails to the welcome breeze as they left the long-closed harbors of Prussia. With shouts of exultation and thankful hearts, the sons of Schleswig unfolded again their own proud flag and took possession of their beloved fatherland, whilst the quays and wharves of every port on the German coast were filled with eager crowds watching anxiously for the released vessels that were to bring back to their own hearths and dear kindred those who had suffered in long and painful captivity.

But it was a truce only, and all felt that the first soft breezes of returning spring would bring war, fearful war, once more to the islands of Denmark. The long Northern winter, it is true, would now avail nothing to the German who, otherwise, might have marched his formidable armies across the frozen channels into the very heart of the kingdom, but, in exchange, it gave him time to build a fleet and to form a navy of his own. No moment was to be lost on the part of Denmark, and with an enthusiasm which he only feels whom Fate calls upon to defend his hearth and his altar, with a patriotism worthy of the most brilliant success, every measure was taken and every sacrifice made to prepare for the impending conflict. Men-of-war were rigged, manned and carefully fitted out; troops were levied, sailors were called home from abroad, foreign officers invited by generous promises, riflemen from Norway called upon to assist their brethren, and contributions poured in from all sides. The expenses of Government were reduced, personal sacrifices made by all the officers of the kingdom, and loans of several millions contracted. The king, taking, from indolence or habitual preference to sensual pleasures, but little part in official business, the whole burden fell upon the newly formed Cabinet with Count Moltke at its head. But wonders were done; a navy was created as if by magic, an admirable army was sent into the field in a few months, and hope revived in every heart. Relying with confidence upon the well-tryed gallantry of their troops and the far-famed excellence of their bold sailors, the Danes counted still more upon the internal dissensions of Germany, whose great powers, Prussia and Austria, they hoped would soon find sufficient employment for their armies at home. Nor did they forget to draw hope from that hamilliating, but powerful support which thrones find in our days in the very debts which burden their countries. If proud England's national debt was one of her main stays, had not Denmark, like little Rhodes of old, her famous Sound-duties—these strange, vexatious duties she levied of every vessel, under whatever flag it sailed, that passed the great Belt, the Schleswig-Holstein canal, or the river Elbe in her duchy of Lauenburg? And were not these very duties pledged as security for a national debt of thirty-seven millions, thus affording her in the interest of her creditors a stronger support than all the arguments of international law?

But Germany also, busy as she was and sorely troubled with her own affairs, was not idle. A cordon of troops was drawn all along the boundary line of Jutland; the lands of Schleswig, with the powerful fortress of Rendsburg in the centre, were strongly garrisoned and fresh troops held in readiness to march the very day the truce should expire. But more energy still was shown in the creation of a German navy. The favorite idea of all Germany for years, this scheme had met with unbounded enthusiasm and warm sympathy at home and abroad, wherever the German tongue was spoken. The rich provinces vied with each other in magnificent donations, and few days passed in the Assembly of Frankfurt that the walls of St. Paul did not echo the loud shouts with which contributions from distant lands were invariably received. In Kiel a naval school was established and the German's heart beat high as he saw the first young mariner of his own blood proudly step the deck of a German vessel; Bremen armed the finest of her own ships, Lubeck prepared gun-boats of formidable strength, Hamburg had her flotilla of armed steamers, Stettin boasted of her well drilled battalion of marines, and there was not a harbor, a bay, or the smallest inlet along the low shores of the Baltic, where a gun-boat or a schooner might not be seen gradually rising on the stocks. Negotiations were opened to purchase steamers of foreign powers and English companies, and to enlist navy officers of the maritime nations of Europe and even distant America.

All these measures were accompanied by other less striking, but perhaps all the more impressive demonstrations. Pamphlets and books innumerable were published, abounding with German erudition and passionate pleading on the part of the Danes; the history of the duchies was studied with untiring zeal but to complicate the question, and human ingenuity taxed to its uttermost to invent new arguments but to see them quickly refuted by the equally ingenious adversary. The States-General of Schleswig told the Vicar of Germany that Holstein could not be separated from Schleswig unless the whole Empire marched in arms against them, and two thousand high-horn ladies of the duchies appealed to England's fair queen for assistance. Propositions also were made for a fair arrangement of all the difficulties: Denmark proposed to give up Holstein and to retain her own province Schleswig only as an independent duchy, connected with Denmark by a "personal union" and a common army, navy and foreign office. Prussia's liberal king spoke of the erection of a new North-Albingian duchy(!) with the duke of Oldenburg, whose adoption by the Danish monarch he proposed, on its throne and a transfer of Oldenburg, as it now is, to the disappointed Augustenburg. Doubts, however, were entertained of the willingness of the people thus to be transferred from master to master. The Parliament at last proposed a division of Schleswig-Holstein according to the national character of the inhabitants, leaving the Danish part to Denmark, the German part to Germany.

The truce has expired and the campaign has opened with terrible events. Who will conquer? The small, isolated kingdom which, strong only in its right and the justice of its cause, stakes its very existence and makes its last desperate effort, preferring an honorable death on the battle-field to a disgraceful peace, or the immense, powerful Empire with its formidable armies and forty-four millions of inhabitants, its high-soaring ambition and far-seeing plans of aggrandizement? Let Denmark fall and history will revere the brave warrior who lost all but his honor: but let Germany also remember that Justice, although often slow, still comes at last, and that a righteous God knows but one law for the one and the many—for the individual and the nation!

AN ENIGMA.

BY A LADY OF VIRGINIA.

In the middle of day, I always appear,
 Yet am ever in darkness, in sadness, and fear.
 I'm in anguish and pain, yet always in health,
 In the midst too of happiness, pleasure and wealth.
 I was formed since the flood, yet am part of the ark,
 And seen in a candle, a lamp and a spark.
 Tho' ne'er out of England, I'm always in France,
 Stay in Paris and Amiens, Bordeaux and Nantes.
 I'm found in the foam and the waves of the ocean,
 In steamboats and cars, yet am never in motion.
 I'm always in land, yet ne'er out of water,
 And without me you can't name a son or a daughter.
 In short I'm in all things, there's no lake, or sea,
 Or island, or cape, but contains little me.

THE CHEVALIER MERLIN.

CHAPTER FIRST.

"I'll tell you a story if you please to attend."

G. Knight.

Merlin Brand, a Norwegian, entered the service of Charles the twelfth of Sweden a short time before the battle of Pultowa, and remained with his royal master quite to the end of the mad comedy of Bender. He saw the czar Peter, he came in contact with the rival kings of Poland, he traversed the parched plains between the Boristhenes and Otzacow with Mazepa the Hetman, he witnessed the state of three viziers, and the muster of Turkish armies on the beautiful levels of Adrianople, he was brought into daily intercourse with brave and distinguished gentlemen of many countries, he was much about the person of the king his master and read the nature of that most remarkable of the monarchs of the time closely: some chapters of his life, therefore, cannot fail to interest the reader, if they are written with even a small degree of skill. Apart from these adjuncts of a higher and more widely interesting character, his private adventures were not wanting in romantic incident. With so much of prologue, I begin my narrative of some passages in the life of the Chevalier Merlin.

The country north of Lake Vettern, in the Swedish province of Gothland, has long been a region of parks and barley fields, with frequent residences of the wealthier classes of Swedish society. The highway between Carlstadt, where you see the blue range of the Norwegian mountains, and Nykoping where you hear the tumult of the Baltic, traverses this region. In the year 1708, on a pleasant day of early summer, a man travelling on foot with the staff and wallet of a barley reaper, but wearing a military dress, and armed with an immense sword, and the petronel or short carbine of a cavalier, the last of which weapons he bore slung at his back, turned aside from this highway and followed the course of a little stream that ran noisily from a clump of beeches to leap into the Vettern. This traveller was Merlin Brand, a young giant, with a broad handsome Norse face, blue eyes set far apart, and auburn hair and beard, both growing short and closely curled. Taller than tall men by a head, the young giant possessed, notwithstanding, an extraordinary degree of symmetry, and stepped with a quick and bold precision. He came presently to the well-head of the little stream, seated himself by the rocky margin, and opening his wallet, and taking provisions from it began to eat with an excellent appetite. From his post by the fountain he could see much of the surrounding country, and after surveying it with a sweep of his wide eyes, he confined so much of his attention as he could bestow from his repast, to a single point in the extensive view. On a hill, a mile away, stood the dwelling-house of a Swedish gentleman—a rambling sort of building with a Peel House for the centre, and wider and lower erections of gray stone clustering around it. Merlin Brand looked to this edifice, half fortalice and half grange, and found leisure to say to the beech trees for want of better companions:

"That is the house of the Senator Sture: but how am I to get into it?"

The beech trees, with the assistance of a breath of wind from Lake Vettern, whispered an answer, but Merlin Brand could make nothing of their language. After his meal, he stooped to drink of the fountain; he had not taken his draught when he heard the hoof-strokes of a galloping horse. The sounds came from the north. Presently, along a narrow path, rode into view a singular looking horseman. His equipment was that of a Caucasian Tartar; his figure was slight; he ruled his horse with easy address. He drew rein suddenly, as Merlin Brand stood up to receive him.

"I salute you, stranger," said the Norwegian with a hearty utterance.

The horseman, a very young man with dark sad eyes, and a visage altogether melancholy, was slow to answer the greeting, and when he did so spoke in a tongue compounded of bad French, and worse Swedish. He seemed to be assured of the peaceful humor of the Norwegian, and coming to the fountain, permitted his horse to bury his muzzle in it. The animal bore marks of severe usage, but not of distress; his instinct seemed to make him put a restraint upon his thirst for a little time, and he plashed the water to his knees with his nostrils.

"Your horse," said Merlin Brand, "is a sensible beast; he will not injure his constitution for love of his beverage. I wish, sir, that I possessed a cup of strong waters, that I might damage my own, as well as do courtesy to you. In the mean time I must drink of this pure and innocent liquor."

So saying, he knelt and drank at an untroubled edge of the fountain. The horseman dismounted at the same moment, loosed his girdle, and bathed his hands and lips with water.

"Ah! this is a sweet fountain of the hills," he sighed in his compounded tongue.

Merlin Brand, observing his unknown companion closely, said:

"You came very fast, and looking behind you as if the avenger of blood followed in your track."

"We drink at this fountain, and part to meet each other no more," the stranger replied.

"I understand you," said the Norwegian; "you rebuke my curiosity. I can tell you a part of the truth however; you are a stranger to these Swedish hills; you come from a very distant country, where the sun lies molten on the plains, and where horses discharge fire from their nostrils. By night it is said by some poetic authors to be a sublime spectacle to see a few squadrons of the magnificent animals approaching; they surround their heads with a sort of luminous haze, brighter than the northern streamers which one sees from the hills of Drontheim."

"It is a vision of the poets," said the stranger. "The steeds of the grassy plains, as well as of the sands, possess the true fire of the spirit, but do not breathe the actual flame which consumes."

"The poets are grand men," said Merlin Brand, "and fill the visible world, which to one of cold nature is but rocks, earth, water, and herbage, with a finer life of beauty. Also they teach us divine morals, which we sometimes say are sublimated, and over-fine for practice: and so they may be, as nectar is too excellent a drink for man. Tartar, Turk, or mere juggler, whatever you be, the poets whom you revile are the elected cup-bearers who proffer to our too coarse spirits draughts from a celestial wine-vat."

"I do not revile the sweet singers, man of the north," his companion answered. "The verses of Sæidi, and of Hafn, have passed the mountains, and the borders of the inland sea, and clustered like bees on the lips of the maidens of my country. I myself have cheered my heart with strong morsels of their stimulating wisdom as I reigned my steed on the plains—and later," he added with a sigh, "when it beat heavily in captivity."

"From what land do you come?" the Norwegian asked, with a sullen lapse from the restraint which he had put upon his curiosity.

"Carry the secret of your own bosom," replied the stranger—"pry not into mine." As he spoke he looked northward with eyes full of alarm, then, bending his head, listened.

"They come on my path," he said, and drawing his girdle, turned quickly to his horse. Merlin Brand laid a hand upon the stranger's skirts, and would have detained him.

"You speak of my prying into your secrets," he said. "This language offends me; but you are probably a bonighted person from a land of barbarians, and would not understand me if I desired a punctilious satisfaction of the wrong. I forgive it: tarry, stranger, and let us discourse of foreign countries. Your French is bad, your Swedish is execrable, but I take pleasure in your conversation."

The stranger, arrested in the act of departing, turned and said:

"Release my garment from your hand, man of the north."

"Nay, man of the east," Merlin Brand replied, "we part over suddenly for fair fellowship."

With a quick movement, the horseman threw himself in the rear of the gigantic Norwegian, who continued seated, and drew from his bosom a slim and pliable dagger. He pressed the weapon under the Norwegian's shoulder, and then, with a bound, attempted to free himself from the clutch on his skirts. Merlin Brand did not release his hold, but got rapidly to his feet; the stranger, finding escape impossible, endeavored to strike again with his weapon. Merlin caught him by the girdle, and lifting him from his feet threw him to a distance of full ten paces upon the sod; he fell lightly, recovered his footing speedily, and, gaining the side of his horse, leaped into the saddle, and rode roundly away.

The Norwegian, left alone, endeavored to examine the wound which he had received. He could scarcely do so with any precision; but satisfied himself that the knife had followed, instead of penetrating the ribs, and that the hurt was slight although it bled freely.

"There is one thing good in this," he presently said. "A bleeding wound will give me a show of excuse for demanding the hospitalities of the Senator Sture." Then, as he prepared to renew his travel, he hummed some verses of an old song.

"A wounded man came feebly
To the gate of his lady's bower,
Saying—'sweet are these wounds, my dearest,
And kind was my foeman's power.
I have bled at the heart, my dearest,
For thy love this many a day;
But these real drops are the ruddy keys
That open the golden way—my love—
That open the golden way.'"

As he hummed this stanza, he looked toward the house, to which he seemed to consider his wound a fortunate plea of entrance. A grove of stately trees covered a portion of the slope, a little to the left of his line of vision, and some moving objects on the edge of this grove drew his attention. He presently became singularly interested.

"I think," he said, "that Rubesahl, or some of that fantastic race must have made this basin of bubbling water a centre of attracting spells. First comes, drawn by its music and its promise of cool purity, a Norse giant. Then we have whirled in like a blade of grass to a vortex, that wild fellow with the melancholy eyes. Now we are about to have new arrivals. The bright lady of my adoration is positively approaching. Who is it comes with her? Strangle him, Kubesahl; and dispose this beautiful lady, Mariana Sture, to be prodigiously affected by the blood which I have permitted to flow over my garments."

The Norwegian placed himself in a posture expressive of bodily weakness, and began to rehearse the part of a man drooping from severe wounds. But he seemed little pleased with his success, and presently said with a natural and honest tone:

"But imposture is not befitting so pure a presence, or that noble ardor which this flower of Swedish beauty has quickened in my nature."

With this desertion of the part which he had determined to assume, he became serious and prepared himself with honest resolution for an encounter extremely interesting to him, but still somewhat nerve-shaking.

The persons who approached the fountain were, as his speech has shown, a man and woman. The latter came with the slow step, and inclined head of one listening; the palm of her right hand held the left elbow, whilst her left hand seemed to sustain the left cheek. Her figure was tall, rounded, and slender; her well-borne head was adorned with a superb flow of glittering hair, of that light hue which we generally see in the locks of the purely descended women of the north, in whom race has retained its ancient characteristics. A light hat with drooping plumes crowned this most admirable of natural ornaments. Her face was wonderfully beautiful: long blue eyes with a rare width of the upper lid, a small nose slightly aquiline, a sweet mouth, a well-rounded chin, a complexion of that exquisite clearness which bespeaks at once health and delicate nurture, these were made the more captivating by an expression singularly gallant and daring to have its home in a female face. The most striking portion of the dress of this beautiful woman was a short surcoat of pure azure, open except where a jewelled girdle bound the waist. On the arch of each instep, ornamenting the slender high-heeled shoes, was an immense rose of ribands. Her companion was apparently both a courtier and a soldier. His face was marked by a long blue scar, and there was a military stiffness in his gait. He wore a great black wig, a laced hat, an embroidered coat, and fringed gloves. To reduce his pace to the slow gliding step of the lady, he seemed to tread the air, making, like a high-stepping coach horse, a considerable exertion without a proportionate degree of speed. He carried in his hand a sheathed rapier, with which, as he discoursed volubly, he gave a greater effect to his gesticulation. The two drew slowly to the fountain. The Norwegian, coming suddenly from the shade of the beeches, saluted the lady. Her companion, with his rapier poised, arrested in his discourse, stared at the gigantic apparition. He presently muttered,

"This is an Anak!"

The lady recovered her self-possession, which had been for a moment lost, and said in French, which had become the polite language of Stockholm in spite of the Swedish king's contempt for it, and refusal to speak it:

"Kinsman, I introduce to you Monsieur Brand, whom I have known in Christiana, a gentleman of worth and highly held by our uncle, the Bishop of Aggerhuus. Monsieur Brand I introduce to you my cousin, Captain Gustavus Piper."

Captain Piper and Merlin Brand fulfilled the ceremonies of salutation. The blood upon the buff coat of the latter was at once observed by the lady. Questions were asked and answered. And now it was that the debility which the Norwegian had determined to feign proved real. In the expectancy of his recent situation he had been unconscious of the extreme flow of blood from a wound which he was persuaded was quite trivial. His face, when the flush, occasioned by the meeting had passed off, became very pale; his immense frame awayed like a heavy structure with an insecure foundation. The anxiety of the lady was excited, although she by no means manifested it in a melodramatic manner. Captain Piper, cutting unceremoniously through the wounded man's apparel, saw the hurt, and staunched it; he then suggested that Monsieur Brand should lean upon him, and endeavor to reach the house of the Senator Sture. As this proposition was accepted, the captain poked at the wallet with his rapier, and lodged it among the rocks.

"We must advance," he said, "without our munitions, in a case of emergency like the present."

Supported by Captain Piper, and, after a few steps, by the lady, Mistress Mariana Sture, Merlin Brand moved slowly in the direction of the distant house.

"This is something of an adventure," said his male supporter. "My friend, rest a little more firmly upon my shoulder; to my imperfect observation it seems that the inclination of this enormous bulk of yours is to the lady."

"Yea, sir; you speak the truth," Merlin Brand answered, and then bore heavily upon the martial shoulder of Captain Piper.

"It seems to me, sir," said that gentleman as they proceeded, "that we are bearing an unnecessary addition, in respect that this thundering sword of yours, which just now came near overthrowing the whole of us by getting between my legs, might be left behind, and brought to you by several servants and a wheeled carriage. The weapon appears to have been made in a rough imitation of those which are described in the Sagas. I conjecture it to weigh at the least a ton."

"There was a tone of banter in Captain Piper's speech which displeased the Norwegian.

"My weapon is that of a poor soldier, and rude enough, but of good temper. I wield its great weight readily, for God has made me larger than my fellows. If the kind office which you have assumed is too burthensome, cease to support me by the way."

"I am a jester, my fine fellow," said Captain Piper, "and spoke as befitting my nature. But, to be serious, I will bring you to the house of my kinsman, if I am compelled to separate you into parts, and bestow you piece-meal. I am not of the shifting nature to fail in an engagement."

"I am obliged to you for so much friendly ardor," the Norwegian replied. "I think that I grow stronger"—he added, addressing himself to the lady—"I will only retain so much of the support which your gentleness has yielded to me, as this beautiful hand, held in my own, will afford."

These words seemed to make an impression on Captain Piper. He seemed indeed to become somewhat gloomy with jealousy.

"You have rather an elegant mode of expressing yourself, Anak," he said; "but be more reserved in your address, where a Swedish lady of rank, and—what is of a more personal application in the present case—my kinswoman, is concerned."

Merlin was about to make a good-humoured reply, when Mariana Sture pointed to the north, and said:

"That is the calash of my father. He is just now returning from Orebro. Be assured, Monsieur Brand, that he will give you that hospitable welcome which is a Gothland custom."

The three pedestrians, and the senator Sture, bowling on in his bright-yellow calash, reached the house at nearly the same moment. The senator, a massive old man, with a face as firm in its lines as though it had been cut out of the Swedish granite, came with a book spread before him—like the treasurer of Candace, queen of the Ethiopians, whom holy Philip saw reading Essais in his chariot.

"What news, sir?" shouted Captain Piper, as the old man alighted.

"We have an arrival from Courland," replied the senator. "His majesty is making a muster at Grodno, to pass the Boristhenes."

Captain Piper stroked his beard, and muttered some words to himself.

"We can discuss the details of the foreign news at our leisure," the old gentleman continued. "By the way, the captive prince Artzilou, the Georgian, whom his majesty sent to us after Narva, has escaped from Orebro. I heard that he had been traced in this direction.

Merlin Brand gained in this remark a clew to the mysterious encounter at the fountain; he had indeed met, and been wounded by, that unhappy prince who, retaken by his keepers, soon after died in a Swedish castle; but the Norwegian was presently diverted from all thought upon the subject by the ceremonies of that Gothland welcome which had been promised by the daughter of his host. The great swinging doors of the edifice opened and closed behind the entering party, and Merlin Brand found himself in the haven to which he had looked, from a distance, with an eye of doubt and desire.

CHAPTER SECOND.

"But Ingeborg, the child of kings,
Sitting alone a ditty sings;
Or weaves a woof wherein there be
Brave scenes of war by land and sea.
On wool as white as drifted snow,
Woven in gold, the bucklers glow;
As red as blood the lances stream,
And coats of mail in silver gleam."
The Frithiof of Tegner.

It was on the day following that Merlin Brand, with as becoming an addition to his plain military dress as his restored wallet enabled him to make, entered an apartment in which the daughter of his host sat to receive him. The walls of this room were hung with plain gray tapestry; it was only in some articles of a readily portable character that a costly elegance had been attempted. A small carved cabinet—a musical clock from Hamburg—some vases of the Rhenish Protogine, now filled with fresh flowers from which the dew had not escaped, were the principal ornaments of the room. Amongst several evidences of the graceful occupations of the lady was a piece of unfinished embroidery which still remained fastened upon its heavy frame. The needle had told enough of the story, which it was the object of the silken pantomime to illustrate, to enable one to catch its meaning. A jarl of the islands quaffed his last cup of hydromel in a great hall, one casement of which opened to the sea. A circle of his sons and followers, with glittering armour and bright mantles, watched the draining of the cup. The pale blue face of Hela, the Scandinavian Death, peered in at the casement, and a lean hand, with hooker talons was extended to touch the jarl's shoulder. It was some such story as that of the king of Thule. As the Norwegian passed the door-sill, the Hamburg clock, noting the hour, played a solemn tune; Mariana, playing upon the virginals, made a sweeter music to mingle with this dirge of the departed hour.

Merlin Brand came to the side of the lady, with the manner of one deeply and tenderly moved. He ventured to take her hand into his own, and to press it to his lips; as he did so, his eyes filled with tears.

"It is a great blessing, Mariana," he said, "that I meet you—that I hold your hand—that I look into your pure eyes—before I go into an exile from which I may never return."

"Do you held it so great a blessing?" the Swedish girl replied. "Then retain my hand, whilst our discourse continues; but we may be interrupted at any moment; tell me, therefore, rapidly what has chanced to you since we parted, and what your designs are."

"When you left Christiana, I found my life become most unhappy," said the Norwegian. "The good Bishop found my devotion to the ancient learning, with which he used to confound our young heads, very much abated; he gave me long lectures in which he censured me, and extolled his beloved Humanities; he desired even to become personally my instructor. This from so great a dignitary, to Merlin Brand the poor wanderer from the coast of Bergen, was irresistible. So I became in fact his pupil. I remained so for a year, and made more progress in those modern tongues in which the Bishop is also a proficient, than in the elder languages. During that time I wrote to you, Mariana, more than once, and I am but repeating what my letters perhaps told you."

"Not so," answered the girl. "Your letters were too full of sentiment for any statement of fact. They contained much brotherly affection, and a great many poetic remarks respecting the beautiful past, and a great many expressions of your determination to become renowned, in some way or other, in the future, but they gave me not the least information."

"You amuse yourself at my cost, Mariana," said Merlin. "It was always so. But let us be serious in these flying moments. I grew sick of books, whilst the world was up and in tumult, and living men were making a history greater than the written ones. You would have proved Syren enough to bind me to a life of sloth; but your mantle had long since fluttered over the heights of the Stor Elve, and you were departed like a star out of my miserable view."

"That means, my friend," said Mariana, that Axel Orde, who came to convey me home from Christiana, had driven me in the yellow calash over the hills of the Stor Elve on a winter's day, when I wore a great cloak to save me from freezing."

"You mention your departure in one set of phrases—I in another," replied Merlin. "I determined at last to become a soldier; I maintained my resolution against the remonstrances of the paternal Bishop; I began my journey to Carlscron, there to take ship for Riga. Can you tell what lured me aside and brought me to the house of your father? I came yesterday to the fountain under the beech trees. I received the slight wound which excited your pity, and from which I feel that I have already recovered sufficiently to continue my journey. As for the future, I must join the king of Sweden at Grodno, where he makes his muster to pass the Boristhenes. I will do my duty, and brave death in every shape—for I must win honor or lose life. Mariana—Mariana—the prize I play for is this hand which I hold in my own."

The manner of the Swedish maiden wholly changed with these concluding words. A flash of modesty mounted to her temples. She was presently enabled to say:

"I have been on the verge of this discovery, and was strangely blinded. And yet, may it not be that this which you now take to be an ardent passion, is after all no more than the attachment growing from our childish intercourse, so long continued at Christiana?"

"It is the diviner passion—yea is it," Merlin answered. "It is the true consuming flame. I ask no avowal now of a return from your own glorious nature. I am utterly unmatched with one of so high a fortune. But, Mariana, bugles are sounding on the sunnier plains of Europe; the great king has gathered the nations as to a tourney; the ring is set; bright eyes are looking on from distant hills; the ladies of the cold north are looking down from the blue ranges, and you among them; in the martial ring is the splendid prize to the best arm and truest heart. When I have waded through blood to the prize, I will come back as one whose claims are of a nature to be respected by the coldest and most worldly wise of your friends. Then, Mariana, I will woo you."

"And in the mean time," said the lady who had regained somewhat of her former humor, "you think it unnecessary to waste wooing upon me. What assures you that I will abide your leisure for wooing, as mistress Mariana Sture, whilst prepossessing gentlemen, living in ease, away from the toil and dangers of war, come to sue for my hand?"

"What assures me? I will answer you. I know the true metal of your nature, Mariana.

Not passed through the red-flame or icy waters of adversity, it yet possesses the noble temper. You are a proud, gallant, and honor-loving woman. When you hear from a distant land that Merlin, the Norwegian, passed into the gulf of the battle, where other hearts failed, and did, in all things, his duty truly, I know that your blue eyes will flash, and that your soul will speak triumphantly—'this is the champion whom love for me made a seeker of glory, a worker of great deeds.' I know you well, Mariana; and it is because you are noble, and utterly true, that I hope."

"Merlin," replied the girl, more beautiful for the sweet seriousness which her countenance expressed in aid of her words, "I have no wish to chill an ardor which aims so high and so well. Be it then as you say. Let there be the troth-pledge between us. I err: you have not asked so much—but you have said that you will one day ask it. I do not shrink from pledging myself to you now—even now. If you live unworthily our contract falls, and I will cease to believe in human worth. But I am firm in hope. I think that I read you surely. If you die in these wars, I will lament your death as one widowed. If you return, I believe that you will do so in honor; whether you return with those rewards of gallantry and good conduct of which you speak, or without them, will not affect my feeling whatever influence your fortune may have upon those who controul my action. Merlin, may God protect you, and lead you back to me—yea to me—a good, great, and successful man."

The white arms of the lady were elevated; Merlin seized her to his bosom, and kissed her brow devoutly. As he did so the door by which he had entered opened without a grating of the lock. Captain Gustavus Piper came forward with his visage fiery red, except so much of it as the blue seam of the long scar occupied.

"You make a good use of opportunity, my fine fellow," said Captain Piper.

Merlin turned promptly; but Mariana placed her hand at once upon his lips. Instead of speaking he only kissed the tender palm. The girl spoke, in his stead, to Captain Piper.

"Kinsman," she said sweetly, "I introduced Monsieur Brand to you as an old friend whom I had known at Christiansia; I introduce him now to you as my affianced husband."

Captain Piper from a state of passion fell into a state of bewilderment. His surprise proved that he had heard little of the conversation of the lovers. Before he could find words, Mariana continued:

"So much in explanation of the scene which you have witnessed. Now, kinsman, be kind enough to explain, in turn, by what means you have become a witness of what surely did not in the least concern you. If you can give no good explanation, I shall venture to say that you have committed an unworthy act."

"I might have expected this," Captain Piper answered with a confounded air. "Charge a lady with an indiscretion, and she will invariably put you on your defence for a crime. Fair cousin, if you are disposed to have a love-passage in future, use the precaution to close your doors, or repress the exuberance of your affection into whispers, sighs, and murmurs. It is a nice matter of art, but attainable, to be eloquent in a whisper, and to kiss in a murmur. Remember the lesson, Anak."

"Guard your tongue, sir; its licence goes too far," said the Norwegian.

"Damnation," exclaimed Captain Piper.

Mariana interrupted him.

"You will be kind enough, kinsman, to leave me." She added, to Merlin: "I trust that for my sake, if not for your own, you will not embroil our engagements at their very commencement. Be guarded, and bear long; indeed avoid, as far as a gentleman may, strife with this mad-cap cousin of mine, who is, after all, Monsieur Merlin, a good heart."

"Mariana," said Captain Piper, "I assure you that I object to your engagement with this unknown person utterly."

"I am grieved to learn it, kinsman. Is that all?"

"All!—by no means. I undertake to inform your father thoroughly in the business. I tell you so plainly. I have not been an eaves-dropper. I heard and saw only as one coming directly into a room by a door already open, may honestly hear and see. I would be as loth to go skulking with a secret betrayal to your father, as to bend my ear to a keyhole. I tell you boldly that I shall presently go to him."

Mariana replied with warmth—

"I will at once save you the labor by communicating the whole to him with my own lips. Kinsman, you are ungenerous."

So saying she departed upon this resolute errand, with a stately carriage, and haughty step. "Softly, Anak," said Captain Piper, grimacing until his face wore an expression of grotesque amiability; "have you discovered a pretty bit of sod under the southern edge of the grove yonder? It is a delicious spot for amorous meditations, and commands a fascinating view of the lake. You are apt to have the devil about your ears for this pleasant business. When you have been trundled out of the house, if the bones of that carcass of yours are in a reasonably sound condition, make a turn to the spot I mention; I shall find an opportunity to join you, and minister a bit of consolation to you. I take you to be little better than a peasant, but I am so charitably disposed just now that the question of rank shall not trouble me."

"Captain Piper," the Norwegian retorted, "you are a beast. I will meet you, and trust to chastise you most thoroughly for your gross and intolerable insolence."

Captain Piper exchanged his affected placidity for real, as his adversary thus readily accepted his challenge. The certainty of the promised encounter made a lull in his passions.

"I am curious to witness the end of the affair within doors," he said. "I will therefore adhere to my proposal of a moderate delay—how long will depend upon the time that it takes the old gentleman to come to an explosion. Listen; I promise you the crash will come presently. My kinswoman is slow in applying the match."

Captain Piper had muttered for the tenth time, "suspense is intolerable"—when a messenger came to summon the Norwegian to the presence of the senator Sture. Captain Piper did not hesitate to receive the message as an invitation to himself also.

"Do not be too much alarmed," he said to his hostile companion. "A good cudgelling will perhaps be the worst result, and you are a stout fellow, well able to bear it. I will make favour with Axel Orde, who commands in the buttery; he shall preach moderation to his forces, when they are called to apply the correction."

"Grinning devil!" the Norwegian retorted, "do not tempt me beyond endurance; if you chatter in this insolent manner I may brain you before we gain the sod."

"We will wait. Let us enjoy the sport to the utmost," Captain Piper replied.

The two gentlemen reached the apartment to which one of them had been summoned.

CHAPTER THIRD.

"The grave good man made merit know her strength—
And those that lacked it to suspect, at length,
That nature had no seal of rank impress
In men, but every bravest was the best;
That any wight, the poorest, might by aid
Of worth approved, mate with the best-born maid."

Ben Jonson.

The face of Mariana expressed neither exultation nor disappointment; she met the looks of her cousin, and lover, with calm eyes and serene brow. As for her father, the fine old gentleman possessed grandeur of countenance, and dignity of demeanour, but he did not add to these attributes of Jupiter Tonans the thunder-bolts, the descent of which Captain Piper had seemed to anticipate. It was to his nephew that the senator first addressed himself.

"Gustaf," he said, "I learn from Mariana that you have insulted my guest, without cause. It becomes you to atone to him for so doing."

Captain Piper, in anger and astonishment, replied:

"Atone! Do you desire me to atone to this unknown person, for gently, and moderately, signifying to him that I deemed him infernally presumptuous in aspiring to the hand and affections of the most beautiful of the gentlewomen of Sweden?"

"I have confidence, nephew, in the purity and wisdom of my daughter. If they err, appeal should be made to me, not to you."

Captain Piper reflected a moment, and then said with easy assurance:

"You desire me to atone to Monsieur Brand for the language which I have supposed myself justified in holding. I will do so. He, indeed, has already my promise to that effect. At present I perceive that I am not a welcome party in this strange business, which you seem, my good uncle, to approach with preternatural calmness." With these words Captain Piper withdrew in high dudgeon.

The senator looked after the retiring form of the soldier.

"Go, Mariana," he said, "and appease Gustaf. My discourse with this gentleman will be free and sincere. Your presence would embarrass us."

When the lady had departed, the old gentleman said with prompt directness:

"And so, sir, you are a suitor for the hand of my daughter."

Merlin's embarrassment was infinite. He uttered an awkward assent to this opening proposition. Then the venerable Swede, fixing a kindly regard upon his modest countenance, smiled. This was a cheerful substitute for the fulminations which the Norwegian had been led to expect. He became more self-possessed.

"You must acquit me, sir," he said, "of a part of the folly which, without explanation, my conduct must seem to wear. I could not have been so presumptuous as to speak to you, in my present state, of an alliance with your daughter, who by right of birth, and excellence, might well mate with the proudest noble of the Swedish realm."

"And yet," said the old gentleman, "in your discourse with Mariana you spoke of love."

"Certainly, sir," Merlin replied. "The young listen trustingly to the utterance of hopes which the old pronounce to be idle dreams. Your daughter heard me speak of my purposes, and of the results of my action, as I meant to direct it, with credulity and confidence. Sir, a truth of Tacitus comes to my mind—'non eadem omnibus decora.' The confiding credulity with which your gentle daughter heard me recount my hopes, would scarcely become you; I could scarcely propose to myself to gain from the hopeful nature of your daughter, and from your tried wisdom, the same favourable hearing. And yet, after all, the contract into which we have entered, is one which a man of sense might perhaps venture to avow to a man of sense. If I achieve rank, fortune, and an honorable reputation, then am I, and not before, to presume to say to you—'give me your daughter to be my wife.' If I do not achieve these things I shall not dare to utter such a petition."

The senator paused upon these words, and then said:

"Inform me concerning your parentage. I understand that it is humble. Give me, indeed, the outline of your past life."

"I can briefly do so, sir," the Norwegian answered. "My father, Merlin Brand, was a fisherman of the province of Bergen. He was wrecked and drowned on one of the northern Fiords, whilst I was yet very young. It is indeed true that we have family traditions which trace our descent from Vikings through more modern rovers of the sea, to the humble condition which we have at last reached. It is also said, in one of these traditions, that one of my ancestral Vikings brought with him from Northumberland, in the Island of Britain, a child whom he found sleeping on the sands of the beach; this foundling, a boy of remarkable beauty, received the name Merlin from the superstition of the rovers, who could discover nothing of his parentage, and when he became a man wedded the daughter of his chief. The name, Merlin, now my own, dates back to that early day. You smile, sir, at these things."

The senator said kindly—"I do not, by any means, smile in derision. Many a noble lineage traces back to as idle a foundation as your remote traditions. Go on, and speak freely."

Merlin resumed:

"My mother died before my father. I do not remember her. When his friends had found the drowned remains of my father, and came bearing them up the rocky steep which break the waves on that coast, they found me like a young wolf howling under the walls of our round stone hut. They buried their dead comrade, and gave me to the pastor of one of the mountain congregations of Bergen—a kindly and humane man, and a rare scholar. He began my education. At his death I found that he had bestowed upon me the whole of his moderate property, and secured for me the patronage of the Bishop of Aggerhaus. I went to Christiana, where the Bishop, your kinsman, resided. There I lived—in what manner I prefer that you should learn from himself. There I met, almost daily for many years of my boyhood, the lady your daughter. I am now on my way to the camp of the King of Sweden, to sacrifice my life or establish my hope. I am not worthy, sir, to mate with your high-born daughter, so excellent in all points of worth—and no good result of my career will render me worthy; but if I am greatly successful, there will be at least a show of reason in my petition to you for her hand."

"You speak frankly, and well," said the senator. "I make a contract with you. You will join the king—serve him like an upright man, and good soldier, so long as he needs your service, and return with some mark of his approbation. If you do so, Mariana shall be free to use her pleasure. As for riches, they are scarcely to be gained under the banner of a just and God-fearing king. It is approved virtue, sir, and an honorable name that will advance your suit."

Merlin Brand bent his looks to the floor; the generosity of this stranger unmanned him for a moment. When he spoke it was to say with much emotion:

"You are generous, and noble, sir. I will go as far and as well as the infirmities of my nature will permit me to go, upon the path which you desire me to pursue. The hand of your daughter will be an inestimable reward, but next to it my great object shall be to justify your good opinion."

"I must say to you in conclusion," said the senator—"and in explanation of my prompt decision, that I have learned to rely upon the excellent sense, and pure heart of my daughter. Mariana has known you for years. I do not oppose my ignorance to her knowledge and the affection which springs from it—in a case where all consent to delay. Take the blessing of an old man, my son, upon the honorable enterprise which you propose to yourself. I advise your speedy departure, as his majesty will soon be in motion for the Russian provinces. My servants will convey you to the coast."

Merlin bent over the hand of the benignant old gentleman, and left the room—his vision blinded by those tears which a noble generosity, in those who have the power to controul our fortunes, brings to our eyes. Through the mist which they made, he presently caught a dim view of a bright face. It looked as rosy and joyous as the front of Aurora, in the Florentine paintings, when that mistress of the dews smiles over misty mountain tops. This Aurora of the vaulted passage was Mariana. Merlin, encircling with his arm the neck and flowing locks of the tall maiden, kissed her lips so gently, and with so modest a grace, that even Captain Piper must have been satisfied with his manner of enforcing his sweet privilege.

It was with a feeling of extreme annoyance that the Norwegian recurred to the necessity of keeping his appointment with the Swedish soldier. His spirits were jubilant and full of alacrity; he shrank, as the bravest will shrink, from putting in jeopardy a large stock of suddenly acquired happiness; he also saw in his success, should he prove successful, a peril scarcely less than that which would attend his defeat. But the spirit of the age was exalted and punctilious in all matters of the duello. His reflections were at length determined by a hint from Monsieur Eugenius Flavel, the valet of Captain Piper. This lean and obsequious Frenchman informed him that his adversary awaited him on the chosen ground. Merlin at once escaped into the grove, and strode on rapidly to the grassy area which lay behind it, forming an elevated terrace overlooking the placid expanse of Lake Vettern. Captain Piper expected his coming with impatience; he paced up and down with a bundle of rapiers under his arm.

"We can pair the weapons, and you will take your choice," said Captain Piper, after a ceremonious greeting.

"But I do not choose these weapons at all," Merlin answered. "The right of election in this controversy, as far as it touches time, place and arms, is undoubtedly with me. I have yielded in time and place, but I do not yield in arms."

"What the devil! Do you propose to come against me with that Excalibar of yours?"

"It would be but fair if I did so," replied the Norwegian. "You have outraged me grossly, and then, by a strange contradiction, demanded this meeting in satisfaction of the wrong which you have inflicted."

"Have at you then," said Captain Piper, drawing a rapier from its sheath. "If you came against me with a weaver's beam, I would maintain my quarrel against you."

"Stop, sir, for one moment," replied Merlin. "I have not chosen the weapon which you seem to prefer, but I abide by your choice. The skill of that rare master of the rapier, Dirk Maas, of whom I learned to use the slight weapon, will doubtless befriend me. But, sir, I did not mean to assail you with the sword which I wear. I would fight you with a wand from this beechen bough rather than fight you at a decided advantage."

Captain Piper, whose humours were rapid and capricious, seemed much struck. With the hesitancy of a brave man who finds his adversary generous, and begins to suspect that his own conduct has been encroaching and unjust, he postponed the encounter for a few moments.

"Sir," he said, with some approach to serious feeling—"you have wronged me more than you suspect. But yet it may be that you are in no respect blame-worthy. With your pleasure we will play with our weapons until blood is drawn, to remove the awkwardness of parting like a pair of boastful triflers who become pacified when swords are drawn. Any more serious question between us may be adjourned for the present. Mark now, fellow," he added to his valet, "you have received your instructions. If this gentleman should, by superiority of fortune, run me through, you are to deliver the sealed note to the senator Sture, and you are further to declare the truth, that it is done in fair combat, upon my challenge. Monsieur Brand, the knave will do you justice. I have bestowed sharp usage enough upon him to bring him to the humour to tell the truth against his master."

The valet bowed with polite humility. The gentlemen took position, and began their sword-play. They had scarcely begun, when, as if summoned by the clatter of the meeting weapons, Mariana Sture came suddenly into the area. Her cheeks were flushed with haste, and her curls hung in disorder. Her presence at once put an end to the duel.

"Cousin," she said, "is it at your invitation that this meeting has taken place?"

"Yes, Mariana."

"Then," said the lady, "I who have witnessed such wrongs as might well have urged Monsieur Brand to compel redress from you—I do say this for a truth, that you have proved yourself in this matter utterly wanting in courtesy, in justice, in respect for me, perhaps even in honour. If your weapon is raised in this quarrel, against this gentleman, except upon his demand, I declare to you that no tie of kindred or friendship shall ever more be respected between us."

"Then, Mariana, I sheathe my weapon, and will not again draw it against Monsieur Brand. Sir, I wish you to consider my challenge withdrawn, and my respect for you increased."

Merlin at once avowed his own indisposition to prosecute the quarrel for satisfaction of the wrongs which he had sustained.

"This is good, and worthy," said Mariana, "and now, Gustaf, we are again kind cousins. You have made yourself very disagreeable today, but we must forget."

Captain Piper replied with a sigh and in a low tone:

"If you venture upon this gentle and affectionate mode of talking, Mariana, I shall explode like a grenade. Abuse me to your heart's content. There would be something consoling in the belief that you were a Skoldman, and a vixen."

The three, with Monsieur Flavel, the valet, following at a modest distance, and bearing the rapiers, returned to the house.

I do not delay farther amongst the details of this opening stage of the career of the Norwegian adventurer. A few days later, burthened with wise counsel from the Swedish senator—a good representative of the grave, honourable, and hospitable men of Gothland—and ennobled by such aspirations as belong to love and youth, Merlin Brand was upon the Baltic, and passing with swift sails for the haven of Riga.

LINES,

On the Death of Col. Pierce M. Butler, of the Palmetto Regiment, who fell in the Battle of Churubusco, August 20th, 1847.

RESPECTFULLY INSCRIBED TO HIS DAUGHTERS.

"He has been mourned as brave men mourn the brave,
And wept as nations weep their hallowed dead—
With bitter, but proud tears."—Halleck.

The darkening air was dense and dun with hot sulphureous smoke,
And thro' its deep and dusky veil, no brightening beam had broke,
Save when at intervals a flash, like to a meteor-star,
Shot o'er the sombre face of Heaven a blood-red light afar.

There floated from the plain of death, the sad sigh of the breeze,
It lingered 'mid the drooping flowers—it mourned among the trees—
And with it there was borne a cry of wild despair and dread,
A wail of warriors in their wrath—a requiem o'er the dead.

Then suddenly o'er earth and sky, did a deep calmness fall,—
A silence that the soul might feel, hung heavy, like a pall,—
And the shouts and shrieks of fiercest strife in echoing marmors sank,
While a cold, electric shudder ran from bristling rank to rank—

A moment more!—a moment more!—and the loud war-peal rose,
As if a hundred clarions rang defiance to the foes—
Bear back! bear back! oh, Mexic host! St. Mary do not hide,
The shock! the rage!—the o'erwhelming power of that tumultuous tide.

Vengeance hath nerved each valiant hand; vengeance hath fired each eye—

Now the soldiers of the standard-starred, rush like a whirlwind by—

Cheer rose on cheer!—the foe is turned—the glorious field is won—

On their ramparts, let the Freeman's flag float 'neath the setting sun.

Why doth the voice, whose cheering tone but now rolled clear and high,

When bold hearts quailed and courage failed, join not in victory?—

Why 'mid the Chieftains gathering fast yon glittering standard 'round,

Is not the noblest chief of all, the dauntless HERO found?

Alas! a dark shade veils his eye, and the death-damp chills his brow—

The arm of might is prone in dust and the proud lip silent now—

The fire is quenched—the last spark fled—"life's fitful fever o'er"—

And the warrior-spirit passed from earth to seek the shadowy shore.

His gallant sword is firmly grasped: hold! let it linger there—

The spotless blade that BUTLER bore, another must not bear—

He kept his honor like the steel—the bright steel by his side,

And only clasped the treasure close—still closer when he died.

What! weep ye comrades o'er his corpse!—stern men of iron mould!

Weep on! the heart that slumbers here, for the first time is cold!

And we have seen him shed like us—the good chief and the brave—

Warm tears of sympathy above the humblest soldier's grave.

Weep on!—how pure from sorrow's fount the tears of manhood swell!

The soul must give one parting sigh—must breathe one last farewell—

Yet there are those who when they bend beside the mouldering bier,

Will own, oh! bitterer grief than ours—the wild grief of despair.

Cover the pale face of the dead: ere long the flowers will bloom,

And scatter o'er his honored grave their glory and perfume:
Ere long they too will withering lie, like the cold dust beneath—

But round his name the flowers of fame will form a fadeless wreath.

MARGINALIA.

BY EDGAR A. POE.

Pure Diabolism is but Absolute Insanity. Lucifer was merely unfortunate in having been created without brains.

When a man of genius speaks of "the difficult" he means, simply, "the impossible."

We, of the nineteenth century, need some worker of miracles for our regeneration; but so degraded have we become that the only prophet, or preacher, who could render us much service, would be the St. Francis who converted the beasts.

The nose of a mob is its imagination. By this, at any time, it can be quietly led.

Samuel Butler, of Hudibrastic memory, must have had a prophetic eye to the American Congress when he defined a rabble as—"A congregation or assembly of the States-General—every one being of a several judgment concerning whatever business be under consideration". . . . "They meet only to quarrel," he adds, "and then return home full of satisfaction and narrative."

The Romans worshipped their standards; and the Roman standard happened to be an eagle. Our standard is only one-tenth of an Eagle—a Dollar—but we make all even by adoring it with ten-fold devotion.

"He that is born to be a man," says Wieland in his "Peregrinus Proteus," "neither should nor can be anything nobler, greater, or better than a man." The fact is, that in efforts to soar above our nature, we invariably fall below it. Your reformist demigods are merely devils turned inside out.

It is only the philosophical lynxeye that, through the indignity-mist of Man's life, can still discern the dignity of Man.

It is by no means an irrational fancy that, in a future existence, we shall look upon what we think our present existence, as a dream.

In drawing a line of distinction between a people and a mob, we shall find that a people aroused to action are a mob; and that a mob, trying to think, subside into a people.

Tell a scoundrel, three or four times a day, that he is the pink of probity, and you make him at least the perfection of "respectability" in good earnest. On the other hand, accuse an honorable man, too pertinaciously, of being a villain, and you fill him with a perverse ambition to show you that you are not altogether in the wrong.

With how unaccountable an obstinacy even our best writers persist in talking about "moral courage"—as if there could be any courage that was not moral. The adjective is improperly applied to the subject instead of the object. The energy which overcomes fear—whether fear of evil threatening the person or threatening the impersonal circumstances amid which we exist—is, of course, simply a mental energy—is, of course, simply "moral." But, in speaking of "moral courage" we imply the existence of physical. Quite as reasonable an expression would be that of "bodily thought" or of "muscular imagination."

In looking at the world as it is, we shall find it folly to deny that, to worldly success, a surer path is Villiany than Virtue. What the Scriptures mean by the "leaven of unrighteousness" is that leaven by which men rise.

I have now before me a book in which the most noticeable thing is the pertinacity with which "Monarch" and "King" are printed with a capital M and a capital K. The author, it seems, has been lately presented at Court. He will employ a small g in future, I presume, whenever he is so unlucky as to have to speak of his God.

"A little learning," in the sense intended by the poet, is, beyond all question, "a dangerous thing:"—but, in regard to that learning which we call "knowledge of the world," it is only a little that is not dangerous. To be thoroughly conversant with Man's heart, is to take our final lesson in the iron-clasped volume of Despair.

Not only do I think it paradoxical to speak of a man of genius as personally ignoble, but I confidently maintain that the highest genius is but the loftiest moral nobility.

The phrase of which our poets, and more especially our orators, are so fond—the phrase "music of the spheres"—has arisen simply from a misconception of the Platonic word μουσική—which, with the Athenians, included not merely the harmonics of tune and time, but proportion generally. In recommending the study of "music" as "the best education for the soul," Plato referred to the cultivation of the Taste, in contradistinction from that of the Pure Reason. By the "music of the spheres" is meant the agreements—the adaptations—in a word, the proportions—developed in the astronomical laws. He had no allusion to music in our understanding of the term. The word "mosaic," which we derive from mosaicus, refers, in like manner, to the proportion, or harmony of color, observed—or which should be observed—in the department of Art so now entitled.

A pumpkin has more angles than C—, and is altogether a cleverer thing. He is remarkable at one point only—at that of being remarkable for nothing.

Not long ago, to call a man "a great wizard," was to invoke for him fire and faggot; but now, when we wish to run our protégé for President, we just dub him "a little magician." The fact is, that, on account of the curious modern bouleversement of old opinion, one cannot be too cautious of the grounds on which he lauds a friend or vituperates a foe.

It is laughable to observe how easily any system of Philosophy can be proved false:—but then is it not mournful to perceive the impossibility of even fancying any particular system to be true?

Were I called on to define, very briefly, the term "Art," I should call it "the reproduction of what the Senses perceive in Nature through the veil of the soul." The mere imitation, however accurate, of what is in Nature, entitles no man to the sacred name of "Artist." Denner was no artist. The grapes of Zeuxis were inartistic—unless in a bird's-eye view; and not even the curtain of Parrhasius could conceal his deficiency in point of genius. I have mentioned "the veil of the soul." Something of the kind appears indispensable in Art. We can, at any time, double the true beauty of an actual landscape by half closing our eyes as we look at it. The naked Senses sometimes see too little—but then always they see too much.

A clever French writer of "Memoirs" is quite right in saying that "if the Universities had been willing to permit it, the disgusting old debauché of Teos, with his eternal Batyllis, would long ago have been buried in the darkness of oblivion."

"Philosophy," says Hegel, "is utterly useless and fruitless, and, for this very reason, is the sublimest of all pursuits, the most deserving attention, and the most worthy of our zeal." This jargon was suggested, no doubt, by Tertullian's

"Mortuus est Dei filius; credibile est quia ineptum—et sepultus resurrexit; certum est quia impossibile."

I have great faith in fools:—self-confidence my friends will call it:—

Si demain, oubliant d'éclore,
Le jour manquait, eh bien! demain
Quelque fou trouverait encore
Un flambeau pour le genre humain.

By the way, what with the new electric light and other matters, De Béranger's idea is not so very extravagant.

I have sometimes amused myself by endeavoring to fancy what would be the fate of any individual gifted, or rather accursed, with an intellect very far superior to that of his race. Of course, he would be conscious of his superiority; nor could he (if otherwise constituted as man is) help manifesting his consciousness. Thus he would make himself enemies at all points. And since his opinions and speculations would widely differ from those of all mankind—that he would be considered a madman, is evident. How horribly painful such a condition! Hell could invent no greater torture than that of being charged with abnormal weakness on account of being abnormally strong.

In like manner, nothing can be clearer than that a very generous spirit—truly feeling what all merely profess—must inevitably find itself misconceived in every direction—its motives misinterpreted. Just as extremeness of intelligence would be thought fatuity, so excess of chivalry could not fail of being looked upon as meanness in its last degree:—and so on with other virtues. This subject is a painful one indeed. That individuals have so soared above the plane of their race, is scarcely to be questioned; but, in looking back through history for traces of their existence, we should pass over all biographies of "the good and the great," while we search carefully the slight records of wretches who died in prison, in Bedlam, or upon the gallows.

My friend, —, can never commence what he fancies a poem, (he is a fanciful man, after all) without first elaborately "invoking the Muses." Like so many she-dogs of John of Nivelles, however, the more he invokes them, the more they decline obeying the invocation.

The German "Schwärmerei"—not exactly "humbug," but "sky-rocketing"—seems to be the only term by which we can conveniently designate that peculiar style of criticism which has lately come into fashion, through the influence of certain members of the Fabian family—people who live (upon beans) about Boston.

“This is right,” says Epicurus, “precisely because the people are displeasèd with it.”

“Il y a à parier,” says Chamfort—one of the Kamkars of Mirabeau—“que toute idée publique—toute convention reçue—est une sottise; car elle a convenue au plus grand nombre.”

“Si proficere cupis,” says the great African bishop, “primo id verum puta quod sana mens omnium hominum attestatur.”

Now,

“Who shall decide where Doctors disagree?”

To me, it appears that, in all ages, the most preposterous falsities have been received as truths by at least the mens omnium hominum. As for the sana mens—how are we ever to determine what that is?

There are moments when, even to the sober eye of Reason, the world of our sad humanity must assume the aspect of Hell; but the Imagination of Man is no Carathis, to explore with impunity its every cavern. Alas! the grim legion of sepulchral terrors cannot be regarded as altogether fanciful; but, like the Demons in whose company Afrasiab made his voyage down the Oxus, they must sleep, or they will devour us—they must be suffered to slumber, or we perish.

What can be more soothing, at once to a man's Pride and to his Conscience, than the conviction that, in taking vengeance on his enemies for injustice done him, he has simply to do them justice in return?

Talking of puns:—“Why do they not give us quail for dinner, as usual?” demanded Count Fessis, the other day, of H—, the classicist and sportsman.

“Because at this season,” replied H—, who was dozing, “qualis sopor fessis.” (Quail is so poor, Fessis.)

An infinity of error makes its way into our Philosophy, through Man's habit of considering himself a citizen of a world solely—of an individual planet—instead of at least occasionally contemplating his position as cosmopolite proper—as a denizen of the universe.

The Carlyle-ists should adopt, as a motto, the inscription on the old bell from whose metal was cast the Great Tom, of Oxford:—“In Thomæ laude resonat ‘Bim! Bom!’ sine fraude:”—and “Bim! Bom,” in such case, would be a marvelous “echo of sound to sense.”

Paulus Jovius, living in those benighted times when diamond-pointed styluses were as yet unknown, thought proper, nevertheless, to speak of his goosequill as “aliquando ferreus, aureus aliquando”—intending, of course, a mere figure of speech; and from the class of modern authors who use really nothing to write with but steel and gold, some, no doubt, will let their pens, vice versâ, descend to posterity under the designation of “anserine”—of course, intending always a mere figure of speech.

ELD.

In a mist-enshrouded valley
Rolls a river deep and wide,
Bearing many a freighted vessel
Swiftly on its rushing tide;
From a darksome cave it cometh,
Rolling on its haughty might,
Down unto a shoreless ocean
Silent as the reign of night.

Where the waters, slow receding,
Long have left the lifeless strand,
Fearful in its solemn stillness
Doth a hoary castle stand:
Darkly rise the ruined towers,
Whence all sign of life hath fled—
Ghostly seem the vacant windows,
Like the cold eyes of the dead.

Heavily the brooding shadows
O'er the trembling wave are cast—
O'er the threshold stone, for ages
Living foot hath never passed;
For a grim and warded warder
Ever at the gate appears—
Drooping is his spectral figure
With the weight of countless years.

Not a word the warder speaketh—
Points one shadowy hand within;
Forward eagerly declining,
Listeth to the river's din;
Mingling with that wild commotion
Steadily his pulses chime;
Who upon that rushing river
Heeds the throbbing pulse of Time?

Ever through the open portal
Pale and shadowy forms appear,—
Some with proud and haughty bearing,
Some with mein of guilt and fear:
Warriors clad in rusted armor,
Queenly ladies, bright and fair;
Some with bosoms bare and gory,
Some with pale hands clasped in prayer.

In a dim and wan procession
Slowly pass the phantoms by,

Each as into distance gazing
 With a fixed and glassy eye;
 There is heard no clang of armor
 As the stony pave they tread—
 Not a word and not a whisper,
 From the pale lips of the dead.

There within a spacious chamber
 In the spectral light, alone,
 Sitteth one of aspect hoary
 High upon a crumbling throne.
 In his hand so cold and stony Still the iron pen is held—
 On the dusky pavement scattered
 Lie the Chronicles of Eld.

Once, within that dreary castle—
 So those olden records say—
 Gallant knights and beauteous ladies
 Walked in splendor's proud array;
 There within those gorgeous chambers,
 Princely pageants brightly shone;—
 There amid those silent dungeons,
 Many a guilty deed was done.

There was seen the gleam of jewels,
 There was heard the trumpet's clang;
 Mingled with the sounds of wailing
 Richest strains of triumph rang.
 Now those haughty tones are silent,
 Now those radiant forms are fled—
 Now those halls are haunted only
 By the pale and silent dead.

SUSAN.

FROM OUR PARIS CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS, April, 1849.

The great event of the month with us has been, without dispute, the production of Meyerbeer's new opera. Coming elections and instant Cholera, the struggles of internal factions, the rise and fall of the Italian republics, and even the agony of the Austrian Empire have been for a few days forgotten.

"Have you heard The Prophet?" is the first question upon the meeting of friends upon the boulevards or the Champs Elysées.

From every group in all the saloons and cafés, the exclamations C'est magnifique! quelle belle decoration! quel luxe d'harmonie! C'est étonnant! are sure to apprise you that The Prophet is the theme.

And learned and wearisome have been all the feuilletons in all the journals in their criticisms upon The Prophet.

In the midst of all this it is not surprising that they who have not heard it, should vote The Prophet to be a great bore. They go to the opera and forthwith join the cry—C'est charmant! C'est magnifique!

We had begun to fear that this opera, so long promised, so long deferred, so much desired, would never make its appearance. Meyerbeer has been ten years elaborating it. Such persisting application of Horace's rule is rare in these days of hot haste, when the grand contention seems to be who can produce, à la Alexandre Dumas, the greatest number of volumes per month.

Sæpe piget—
Corrigere, et longi ferre laboris onus.

The great composer was determined to sustain the reputation of the author of "Robert le Diable" and the "Huguenots." By admission of all he has done so. His last work is worthy of its predecessors, and will increase the fame of Meyerbeer. The poet composer carries us back three hundred years. John of Leyden, the fanatic prophet of the early Anabaptists, is the hero of the poem. His rise and fall, the capture of Munster, and the chief events which signalized the ephemeral kingdom of New Zion which he established there, are graphically portrayed in the music of Meyerbeer, and the words of Scribe. The music of this composer is characterized by a grandeur and an elevation which peculiarly fit it for the expression of deep and stormy passion. Rossini, with the pure and luminous melody of the Italian school, of which he is so great a master, could not have produced, with even greater labor, so effective an opera upon this subject. But Rossini would not have chosen that subject. The Prophet is German, entirely German—author, subject, style. It has been brought out upon the boards of the French Opera in Paris with unequalled magnificence. The administration has surpassed all preceding efforts. Sun-rise never, save by Nature herself in the glorious eastern sky, has been presented to the eye in so magical, so startling a reality! The effect is produced by the aid of electrical light employed in this way here for the first time. This, with the interior of the Cathedral of Munster, and the awful conflagration which closes the representation, show that Meyerbeer is not the only master whose powers have been tasked to insure this greatest operatic success, which has been known for many years. The stage decorations, the landscapes, the costumes being all of rigorous truthfulness, belonging to the age, the country, and the people represented, leave upon the mind of the spectator, after leaving the theatre, the impression of having spent the evening listening to delightful music, in the country of Holbein and Albert Durer.

Meyerbeer, if report be true, has applied for naturalization as a French citizen, with the intention of making Paris his permanent future residence.

The last steamer bore to the United States the sad intelligence that the great Italian composer, Rossini, tormented by enormous revolutionary taxation and threats of massacre on the part of the Roman republicans, had lost his reason. There would seem to be no truth whatever in this report. The illustrious maestro, to whom the world is indebted for The Barber of Seville, The Lady of the Lake, Cenerentola, and so many other of the masterpieces in his art, is in excellent health and spirits, and at the present moment residing in Florence without the reach of personal harm from his democratic countrymen. Frequent and heavy impositions have been laid upon his property, but that has not affected his mind or even his spirits. Rossini is no republican—what sensible man could be in Italy?—and the latest accounts speak of him as engaged in the composition of a cantate in honor of the restoration of the Grand Duke to the throne of the Medicis upon the ruins of the republic.

The past has been a glorious month for Scribe. Beside the triumph of The Prophet, which he shared with Meyerbeer, he has connected himself by his new drame, Adrienne Lecouvreur, with the brilliant and triumphant appearance of Rachel in quite a new sphere. The drame itself is admitted not to possess remarkable literary merit: and if Scribe were so wanting in good sense as to show himself much elated by the success of The Prophet, and Adrienne Lecouvreur one would be tempted to remind him of the apples in the fable: for the grand attraction that drew all Paris to the Theatre Francais on the 14th of April, was the debut of the great tragedienne, in a piece written in prose. Hitherto Rachel had confined herself to a very limited number of roles. Her matchless talent had revived the worship of the French classic tragic writers, and she for years resisted all persuasions to abandon for a moment their pompous Alexandrines. She would honor no modern author, however famous, by consenting to become his interpreter. It was not till after the revolution of February 1848, that she appeared upon the stage except as the heroine of strictly classic tragedy. Her first step without the circle was marked by a success well calculated to embolden her to advance. It was the Marseillaise. I had heard it sung in the street by torch-light, by a thousand revolutionary young Frenchmen. It was thrilling. But they were republicans of 1848, and they failed to impart to the Marseillaise the character of startling, soul-stirring actuality, by which it appealed so irresistibly to Frenchmen of former times. The imagination was still tasked to account for the terrible potency with which it swayed the popular mind in 1793 and 1794. But sung, or rather chaunted by Rachel and the Marseillaise in vivid, painful, oppressive reality stereotyped itself in your memory; you had it as Rouget de l'Isle conceived it in a moment of rapt and patriotic inspiration. It was the fury of Paris for two months: and by the special influence of Ledru-Rollin, Mlle. Rachel left Paris for a tour in the provinces to wake up throughout France, by singing the Marseillaise, a revolutionary republican spirit, preparatory to the April elections. But Ledru-Rollin is dethroned, the reactionists have succeeded him, and Rachel sings the Marseillaise no more.

Encouraged, however, by that success, she ventured another departure from the circle of tragic roles by appearing in the Moineau de Lesbie, a classic comedy, in one act, in verse, by M. Barthet. This was a daring adventure—far more so than the first: for the Marseillaise, if not a tragedy, is essentially tragic, and Rachel could hardly be said to have departed, in reciting it, from that special walk of her art which she has so illustrated by her talent. Rachel, too, as she will have to admit ere long, is herself essentially tragic by nature and by habit: and I predict she will only diminish the intensity of her fame by attempting to enlarge its area. Rachel could hardly fail, whatever she might essay: nobody mentioned but to praise her personification of the Roman Lesbie. But it did not run the town mad—and that is almost a failure for her. The drame is neither quite tragedy, or quite comedy, but Adrienne Lecouvreur, in which Rachel appeared two weeks ago for the first time, is a sad story, amounting in dignity and incident almost to tragedy. Adrienne Lacouvreur, a celebrated actress of the French Theatre, flourished in the early part of the eighteenth century. She loved the celebrated Count Maurice de Saxe as a devoted woman loves the man of her choice. The Count loved her as any illustrious general and gallant young nobleman, upon the worst possible terms with his wife, would love an actress. But a noble lady of the court is also enamored of the gallant Count. She is jealous of Adrienne, perfidiously poisons her, and the closing death-scene is highly tragic, affording fine scope for the powers of Rachel. This time it was a veritable triumph, and deservedly so. Rachel was all herself. She uttered the prose of Scribe with as much ease and elegance and power as if she had been all her life accustomed to it on the stage. Yet it was the first prose piece she ever bore part in. The house was full to overflowing. Many hundreds were refused at the door for want of room. It has been repeatedly performed since and always to crowded boxes. But it is remarked that the severe and classic representative of the heroines of Corneille and Racine, cannot prevail upon herself to submit her head to the sacrilegious powdering which strict conformity to the customs of one hundred and fifty years ago would enjoin. Adrienne appears amongst the powdered Marchionesses and duchesses of those days, her hair coiffed in modern style, smooth, glossy and black as jet. This is an affectation of which she should be ashamed, and a caprice which should not be permitted even in the undisputed queen of modern tragedy. In all other respects, her costume, as Adrienne, is unexceptionable, of surpassing richness and most exquisite taste. Rachel must regret that the exigencies of her profession as tragedian so inexorably exclude the gratification of her vanity as woman. As Adrienne, she is beautiful: but I have never thought her so in any of her strictly tragic characters.

Jenny Lind, the charming Swedish singer, has just relieved the apprehensions which had begun to be entertained of her permanent retirement from the stage. She re-appeared at the Queen's Theatre in London, in the Somnambula. Never, perhaps, say the English papers, noticing the event, has the theatre been thronged with so numerous and so brilliant a company. It would seem that her entrance by marriage into the family of a high dignitary of the established church is postponed for the present. Jenny Lind cannot be persuaded to visit Paris. I can hardly blame her. A lady of her spotless purity of mind and life, of her anti-Gallic character and habits, would enter at Paris into a most uncongenial social medium.

Mlle. Alboni who is, or is going to be, hardly less famous than the Lind, finds, on the contrary, in France her congenial element. There is much greater social sympathy and similitude between France and Italy, than between France and Sweden. Alboni is reaping a golden harvest in the provinces, where her tuneful voice is attracting something more agreeable than stones. Singing nightly at the rate of two thousand-francs per night is a highly satisfactory operation: and will enable her to pay the penalty of the French leave which she took of her Parisian manager two or three days before the legal expiration of her engagement. Alboni is admitted to be of a kind and generous nature. She is beloved no less than she is admired by the members of her profession. This is convincing evidence of the goodness of her heart, if it be not of her professional excellence. A needy brother artist was about giving a concert for his own benefit. A promise of Alboni to sing upon the occasion was sufficient to insure the beneficiary a handsome sum. The concert, with the irresistible attraction of Alboni's promise, was announced two weeks in advance. In the meantime Alboni hastily left Paris. With her engagement at the opera she had forgotten also the promise to her needy brother. As the day approached, numerous were the inquiries addressed to the anxious artist if Alboni, whose departure from Paris was generally known, would really be present.

"Je n'en sais rien!" was the disconsolate reply. "Elle me l'a promis."

In fact, Alboni, who had really forgotten her promise, recalled it to mind just in time to take post instantan, and arrive at the hour of the concert. This she did: and her appearance in the salle, just after the commencement of the concert, caused to the company assembled hardly less surprise than pleasure. The evil was done however—the Alboni had not been expected—and many were the vacant seats. It was a novel sight for Alboni's eye to dwell upon, so many unoccupied places. She sang, however, and in her best style.

After the concert was over, she beckoned to her side her unfortunate friend, whom she had honestly meant more effectually to serve.

"Mon ami," said she, "what may be the amount of your receipts this evening?"

"About a thousand francs," was the reply.

"And but for my sad blunder they would probably have been double that sum?"

"Ma foi, oui, signora! but it can't be helped now."

"It must be helped though," replied Alboni. "Believe me, I am heartily ashamed of my forgetfulness, and must repair the consequences of my error—accept this," at the same time placing in his hands two five hundred franc notes—"and I'll endeavor to have a better memory next time!"

Mdme. Pleyel reputed to be the most accomplished pianist living, is now in Paris playing at a series of concerts. Her concerts cannot be said to be popular: but they are much frequented by the aristocracy, who are attracted by the high price of the tickets, which perhaps even more than the character of the music, gives to these reunions the welcome prestige of exclusiveness.

Rome, if unfortunately the doomed republic should exist much longer, is destined to lose, and this time, for ever, many of those matchless works of art, which with but one short interval, have for ages formed the principal attraction of strangers within its walls. Bonaparte, the illustrious robber, removed nearly all that were capable of transportation into France to gratify his Parisians and ornament his Louvre. Upon all such the visitors of Rome have for many years past read a little label, upon which is written, "Brought back from Paris in 1815." This label was perhaps to most visitors the best, if not the only evidence of the artistic value of the object before them. What the destroying Goth spared, what the plundering Frank was compelled to restore, Rome herself in the middle of the nineteenth century is selling! The Republic wanted money—the republicans, whose only idea of freedom is license and exemption from taxation, refused to pay—and they hoarded their gold. But of what use to the Republic are the jewels and mosaics, the paintings and the statues that now encumber the walls of the churches and museums! There are fools in the world who will gladly pay for them. Money, money, money. Sell! sell! Rid the Republic of this trash and turn the Vatican into a National Workshop! And lo! with well-lined doublets flocked to Rome from Germany and France a horde of mercenary traffickers in objects of art—and wealthy virtuosos took post for the eternal city, ready to profit by the occasion, and exchange, pound for pound, their rubles and guineas against the master-pieces of the Roman museums, thenceforth destined, far from their natural home on the banks of the classic Tiber, to be lost to the world in the palaces of the Neva and the Thames. Much it is known has already been thus sacrificed. The Emperor of Austria anticipating the havoc which was about to be made, generously issued a proclamation forbidding his subjects to purchase any of the objects coming from the museums of Rome, Florence and Venice, (for all the Italian republics were making the shameful appeal to foreign cupidity.) Even the transit through any portion of the Austrian dominions, of objects thus acquired, was forbidden upon pain of seizure without indemnity, to be restored to the museums from whence they were taken. Mr. O'Connell endeavored to provoke from the English government a similar measure in behalf of the Pope. But, as might be expected in a country where the principles of liberty are so well understood and practised, the application was in vain. Lord John Russell could only reply, that if such articles were attempted to be introduced into the kingdom of Great Britain, they should be subjected to all legal duties, and that government would not become the purchaser. It is amusing to read the indignant comments of many of the French papers upon the conduct of the Italian governments who sell, and of the English and Russian and German amateurs who buy Italian statues and pictures. They forget the French wholesale robberies in 1797 and subsequent years. The most lamentable instance of disappropriation which has yet become public, is the reported transfer to an Englishman, for $5,000, of the world-famous master-piece of Raphael, The Transfiguration. It was his last and greatest work. Of course it bears the honor of the label—"Brought back from Paris in 1815." I ought to mention a further report in connection with this painting, namely, that the purchaser bought it to save it and means to restore it to the Pope, when the Pope himself shall be restored. If he does so, so soon as this last event takes place, The Transfiguration will soon resume its place in the Vatican. For the cause of Italian liberty wisely understood, for the good of the Romans themselves, their republic has already existed too long by just the number of days it is able to count. Among the innumerable objects of minor value which have without doubt been lately ravished from Rome, is a well-known statuette of the Virgin Mary in massive gold, called La Vierge aux Anges, taken from the chapel where the Pope daily worshipped. It is the work of Benvenuto Cellini. Its eyes are composed of diamonds of the value of $1,000, and the eyes of the angels at the feet of the Virgin are diamonds also of great price. The fortunate purchaser, at a very inadequate price, of this interesting work of art, is an English merchant. He exhibited his acquisition in Paris a few days since on his way to England.

The Palace of the Tuilleries, the last residence of the kings of France, which, during the first months after the revolution, was converted into a hospital, is now being fitted up for an appropriate destination—the annual Exposition of modern painting and sculpture. Heretofore the long gallery and other portions of the Louvre have been used for this purpose, to the great inconvenience of the public, and injury of the permanent objects of art forming the museum of the Louvre, which had to be removed, or covered, to make room for the exhibition of modern works during six or eight weeks of each spring. This new destination of the Tuilleries will restore animation to one of the most interesting monuments of the capital, which for the last year has worn a most lugubrious aspect, contrasting strongly with its brilliancy while the royal residence.

Since the date of my last, the Academy of Medicine of Paris, after solemn discussion and deliberation, has pronounced a verdict in favor of the use of Chloroforme as an agent for the production of insensibility. The investigation was provoked by the Ministers of Justice and Public Instruction. Several deaths had occurred in cases where this agent had been employed, under circumstances which left the public and the judicial authorities in doubt whether or not Chloroforme were the cause. A medico-legal jury was formed by the Academy and Chloroforme was duly put upon its trial. Written documents were read, oral testimony in relation to the suspicious cases was heard, the most able men of the profession pro and con were invited to the discussion, and the verdict was "not guilty." Not unanimous however. It still has some determined and irreconcilable enemies in the medical profession in France: but the general opinion seems to be that the knowledge of the stupefying effects of Chloroforme is one of the most brilliant and useful discoveries of modern science. Its use should by all means be continued; but with wise discretion and only by the hands of scientific and experienced practitioners. Imprudent as has hitherto been the use of it, the number of deaths indisputably chargeable to Chloroforme is very few. For the future the number may be lessened. It should be administered with much reserve to children, and females of susceptible nervous systems: to persons subject to hemorrhage or to attacks of epilepsy, of which Chloroforme would provoke the return: to persons whose lungs or heart are diseased, or who are subject to fainting for slight causes. Care should be taken to have Chloroforme pure. It should be administered in moderate doses proportioned to the age, constitution and temperament of the patient. According to M. Guerin thirty-one grains suffice to produce sleep and insensibility: forty-five or sixty might produce death in less than fifteen minutes: and with one hundred and fifty or sixty, animals were struck motionless in one or two minutes. An apparatus that would measure the exact quantity inspired, would certainly be preferable to the sponge or handkerchief ordinarily used. Special care should be taken to allow during inhalation sufficient atmospheric air to mingle with the vapour of Chloroforme to insure unimpeded respiration and circulation.

If some few cases of death may be attributed to Chloroforme, it is, on the other hand, proved that since the use of this agent, the number of deaths in grave surgical operations is materially lessened. Returns made by Simpson show mortality to be lessened 11 per cent. Similar returns by Roux for 1847-8, show twenty-five deaths for one hundred operations. The two preceding years gave thirty-three in a hundred.

By the way, M. Stanislaus Julien, of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres, has lately been making researches among Chinese authors—where so many of the discoveries of modern science which were supposed new have been proved to be some hundreds of years old—to ascertain if the use of Chloroforme, Ether, or some similar agent to paralyze nervous sensibility, could not be detected in Chinese practice. In a biographical memoir of the Chinese physician, Moatho, he came across the following passage, dating from the sixteenth century:

"But in certain cases when these remedies could not be applied, he gave to the patient a preparation of hemp. In a few moments the patient became insensible as if he were dead drunk or even deprived of life. While in this state the physician performed his surgical operations, making openings, incisions, amputating limbs and removing the cause of the evil. After a few days the patient was completely restored, without having experienced during the operations which had been performed upon him, the slightest degree of pain."

A new calculating machine, invented by a couple of indigent young Frenchmen, after many years of privation and persevering toil, has lately been the subject of a highly flattering report on the part of a committee appointed by the Academy of Sciences for its examination. It is said to be much more perfect than any which have yet been invented, and destined to facilitate in a most important manner, the long calculations of the astronomer. The inventors MM. Maurel and Jayet, accompanied by two members of the Academy, have had the honor of presentation at the Elysee-Bourbon and of exhibiting their machine to the President of the Republic. Being very poor they have received from government small sinecures, which will enable them at their ease, to perfect and superintend the construction of their machines till they shall be ready for delivery to the public.

The political sky of France is darkly overcast. I begin to apprehend that another terrible struggle like that of June will usher in a short reign of the Democratic and Socialist Republic, led by that pestilent demagogue, Ledru-Rollin. I have been hoping that the strong government, of which France has need, would be arrived at without passing as was done fifty years ago by ultra-democracy, and Terror, and Despotism. But most alarming symptoms are now discernible. It is to be feared that the army, upon which alone reliance was placed for the maintenance of order, has since June become deeply infected with the pernicious socialist doctrines preached by the red republican journals and agents. Taught by the experience of June, that their cause was utterly hopeless unless they could gain the army, they, about six months ago, organized a propagand for this special object. Obeying a word of order from the chiefs, a complete union took place between the socialists pure and the advanced democratic republicans; and all their organs, with the most striking unanimity and almost instantaneously, commenced paying court to the army—to the rank and file—and especially to the non-commissioned officers. Prior to June the army was the subject of their daily abuse—they insisted upon the removal from the capital of all regular troops. For a season the Provisional Government was intimidated into submission, and not a soldier of the line, horse or foot, was seen in Paris. But the evident revolutionary projects of the ultra party, the commotions consequent upon the establishment of the National Workshops, compelled government with as little parade as possible,—in some cases almost secretly—to introduce many regiments into the city. The crisis came. And it was the army alone which decided in favor of the cause of Order. From that time sixty thousand troops have been quartered in the capital. It was impossible again to procure their removal—it was impossible to conquer them. It was determined to win them, or at least so many of them as to paralyze their action in case of another insurrection. Hence their propagand was prosecuted with such success, that two months ago Ledru-Rollin openly boasted that the omnipotent Idea would prevail and the democratic and social republic be established in spite of all the reactionist parties. "It suffices," he tauntingly told the ministers, "it suffices for your regiments to be only six weeks stationed in Paris for them to become socialist!" In truth, notwithstanding the studied denials in behalf of Government, several regiments have been sent away from Paris, and a camp formed without the walls in order to remove them from socialist influence. Many of the socialist teachers were arrested, their tracts and journals were strictly forbidden entrance into the barracks, soldiers were punished for reading them. These coercive measures very naturally increased the evil they were intended to suppress. The soldiers felt, and their discontent was carefully fomented by their socialist friends, that their dignity as men and their rights as freemen were violated by these measures. They attended clubs, and banquets, and electoral ultra-democratic meetings, in spite of orders and punishment. The democratic socialists of Paris have just announced their list of candidates for the elections of the 13th instant for members of the new assembly. Three of the twenty-eight nominees belong to the army—a lieutenant and two sergeants. The result of all this is, I fear, that in the struggle—I mean the insurrection—which the socialist democrats are now preparing, the army will not be found where it was in June last, firm, united, obeying implicitly and promptly its officers, on the side of order.

These mischievous, but alluring socialist doctrines, have even made notable progress among many companies of the National Guards which in June marched resolutely to the storming of the barricades.

The socialist republicans all counted from, I am satisfied, a very small minority of Frenchmen: but their opponents are divided into four or more hostile parties. They are united, desperate, daring men, who have little to lose, and all to gain by change. If they have succeeded, to the extent apprehended, in seducing the army, they will not fail in a second appeal to the barricades of Paris. As Paris goes so goes France: the departments have not yet—free and republican though they pretend to be—effected their emancipation from metropolitan domination—and lo! the red republic and Terror reign in France! If things should come to this sad pass, their reign will not be of long duration, ere a strong monarchical government shall end at once Anarchy and Liberty.

Louis Napoleon Bonaparte is showing so little haste to put away the Republic; he persists so pertinaciously in retaining beside him the Barrot Cabinet, which is divided between the Orleanist and Bourbon factions, that the Bonapartists pure, in their hot haste to restore the Empire with its internal order and external glory, are beginning to desert him and take as their leader Napoleon Bonaparte, son of Jerome. This young man, from a warm supporter of the President, has lately become the opponent of his government. He is now becoming his rival. He will be run for the legislative assembly in thirty or forty different departments: and he hopes by this means, though he can represent but one department, to cover himself with the prestige of several millions of votes of which Louis made so much political capital. The ministry were so annoyed by his presence in France that they sent Napoleon as ambassador to Spain. On his way to Madrid, he publicly spoke, in conference with the ultra-Bonapartists, so disrespectfully of the President and so insultingly of his ministers, that Louis Napoleon wrote him a gently admonitory letter, which was published in the papers, doubtless with the privity of the President, even before it could have reached its destination by mail. Napoleon promptly, without leave, without even paying a farewell visit to the queen, left Madrid for Paris. Advised by the telegraph of this step of the young ambassador, the President instantly published in the Moniteur the dismissal of his cousin. They are now avowed opponents; and are rapidly severing the Bonapartist party. The majority, however, seems as yet disposed to adhere to Louis, waiting his own time, to put the Republic aside, and uniting cordially in the coming elections with the other monarchical parties against the anarchist red republicans. Unhappy France! "They would have had me become a Washington!" said the Emperor. "But it was impossible for me to be other than a Washington crowned. To avoid a counter-Brumaire, I was forced to pass by the Dictatorship!" The same necessity exists now. France wants a crowned Washington. But she will sooner find another Napoleon!

FLIRTATION.

BEING AN ESSAY BY A NEW CONTRIBUTOR.

Without thee, what were unenlightened man?
A savage, roaming through the woods and wilds—
Nor moral excellence, nor social bliss,
Nor grace, nor love were his.—Thomson's Seasons.

There is so little stirring now-a-days, that we feel disposed to discourse a trifle upon a subject much talked of, but little understood.

In saying that Flirtation is a subject much talked of, but little understood, we make no rash assertion. Every science has its pretenders, and none has more ignorant worshippers than this. Be it ours, writing from a chair, which, like its occupant, has seen better days; be it ours to expound some of its mysteries for the benefit of youthful "hearts now pregnant with celestial fire."

In the first place then, Flirtation is not love-making, nor any thing like it. For in the one case, a man starts on a voyage at the commencement of which he casts aside the rudder of reason and trusts to prosperous breezes and the favor of the gods for reaching in safety "the haven where he would be." In the other, like the experienced mariner sent to explore a hitherto unknown coast, he approaches it warily, sounds the depths and shallows, sends out boats hither and thither to make observations, takes the bearings of the headlands and inlets, carefully notes them all in his log-book; and, when all has been explored, sails away to other lands. In an expedition of this kind, however, there is no mistaking icebergs for continents, as the English journals say was the case with our famous Exploring Expedition.

Nor in the next place, is Flirtation to be mistaken for Coquetry. The foam of champagne is not that of the juice of night-shade, though the one resembles the other. There is some difference between an exhilarating beverage and a deadly poison. We need not caution our own sex, however, against the practice of coquetry. This belongs by prescriptive right only to women. The theory on this subject is, that there are no broken hearts amongst them; that they do not surrender their tender affections until their Papas have been duly consulted; but, as soon as leave is asked and obtained, that then the gentle feeling darts like lightning into their souls, subduing, controlling and changing their characters. But to them we would address a word of warning as to the use of this power, for we have known some manly hearts, beating high with generous aspirations, completely wrecked in this way; and the curse of a wounded spirit never fails to cling. Nor in the next place is Flirtation to be mistaken for friendship. They are not only distinct, but in most respects, antagonistic. Perhaps I cannot better explain this principle to the students of this science, than by relating the following narrative. They can also sharpen their wits by studying it.

Mr. A., a young law-student, left a certain town to the Eastward, for the purpose of attending a law-school. Whilst there, he became acquainted with Miss B., who had much to recommend her; at least sufficient to cause him to fall in love with her. He had reason to suppose that she was not indifferent to him, but being proud and unpossessed of fortune, whilst she was very wealthy, he tore himself away, pursued his studies elsewhere, and on obtaining his license, cast anchor in one of our large cities, there to struggle with those trials and mortifications, to suffer those anxieties, those sickening hours of hope deferred, which only a young, unfriended lawyer can fully know, and which drive some to the fearful guilt of self-destruction.

Nearly two years had elapsed, from the time that he first saw her, when she, whose image was graven on his heart, made an unexpected visit to the city in which he resided. He called to see her. She was cold and distant. Still something in her manner bade him call again. He went, went frequently. At last he addressed her. She refused him. He threw himself back on his pride, and although gentle and friendly in his demeanor, yet he laid aside his love for her altogether. She appeared perplexed. The period fixed for her visit expired, yet she lingered. At last she went, and they parted friends.

They met twice or thrice during the two years next succeeding. From each interview they parted friends. Another year passed on. They met again. Something in her tone brought back old times. His heart told him that he had not made due allowance for her wounded pride—that he should have said something in explanation of his abrupt departure from the law-school, before addressing her. So he once more stood before her as a lover.

"It was too late," she said. "Once she had admired—perhaps loved him—but it was too late."

No matter what happened further at that interview, nor what happened subsequently. As she well said—"it was too late"—but the heart of an ambitious and distinguished lawyer often turns despondingly to dream of the past, and to think of his friend.

We ought in the next place, after having shown what Flirtation is not, to define what it is. But Mephistopheles truly says—"he who wishes to define any living thing, seeks first to drive the spirit out of it. He then has the parts in his hand, only the spiritual bond is wanting." Such a catastrophe we by no means desire, for Flirtation we consider not only a spiritual thing, but one essentially and entirely spiritual. To drive the spirit out of it then would not even leave the parts in our hand. So we will proceed to consider the various shapes in which this "living" thing develops itself.

And here we premise that a flirtation, like man himself, is the creature of circumstances. The relative position of the parties is always so modified by the accidents of birth, wealth, personal appearance and the like, that it would be vain to attempt laying down rules invariably to be followed. But certain maxims, the result of experience and observation we may disclose, which if shaped a little to suit the occasion, may prove of service to those ambitious of becoming masters in a science of so much delicacy and dexterity as Flirtation.

As the first of these, we would say: Let no man enter on a flirtation with a lazy mind—Cogenda mens ut incipiat says Seneca, and in nothing is this precept more true than in matters of this kind. The intellect must be aroused, the faculties strained, memory made to yield up its hoarded stores of information, imagination to shed its varied lights over passing scenes, perception awakened to every tone of voice, to every light and shadow which passes over the countenance, while the will, like a strong man armed, must preserve a calm, serene composure within.

We admit that all this is difficult to attain. But let no one suppose it unworthy of his best efforts. In point of fact, woman constitutes, in one way or another, the principal object of man's existence during that long period, which reaches from boyhood to the grave, from the hour that we form dim, fantastic visions of happiness to be realized through her instrumentality, to the time when we look back with sorrowful hearts over dissipated delusions and dwell in those recollections which are "pleasant but mournful to the soul."

And here let an "old fellow," (as we are familiarly called by the wanton juveniles around us,) let one, who is no longer an actor in gay scenes, say somewhat as to the pleasures of memory. They are after all the most certain. We soon learn that the phantoms of hope glide delusively before our eyes; that to-morrow may deceive us; that the once loved may prove faithless; that change may come even to the wanderer, weary with his too long sojourning on earth.

But of the past, nothing can rob us. It changes not. Yesterday cannot deceive us. The well-known voice, the friendly face, the trusty hand, are ours forever. But a truce to our digressions.

We were saying that a flirtation was worthy of a man's best efforts. We deliberately repeat our assertion. No man can enter upon one with a woman of talent and feeling, without being greatly improved thereby both mentally and morally. To illustrate our meaning.

Many years ago, a friend of ours, about one-and-twenty, good looking, intelligent, and ambitious of improvement, had occasion to visit one of our large cities for some three or four months. Soon after his arrival there, he became acquainted with two young ladies, one of whom was staying at the house of the other on a friendly visit. My friend had his evenings entirely at his command, and as they told him that they approved highly of innocent Flirtations, he determined to try his powers by encountering two sprightly girls at once. A bold man, truly! But he succeeded, and returned to his home in appreciation of character and capacity to use his powers ten years older. Such had been the mental exercise to which he had been subjected.

My friend is one of those who are disbelievers in the theory held in polite society, that women never die of broken hearts. Accordingly he tells a touching story of one of these girls, which I cannot forbear relating briefly. It has a moral in it; besides which it has the rare merit of being true.

She was just seventeen the night he first became acquainted with her. Her portrait, which we have seen, bespeaks her as eminently beautiful, and yet all who ever knew her say, that it wants the holy lustre which shone upon her countenance. The beauty of her person, the charms of her conversation, the fascination of her manner, proved too much for my friend. He was young. His will was not yet the strong man armed. He loved and was loved.

She was to return some two or three weeks before the time fixed for his departure. The evening before she left, she sang to him once more the plaintive melodies which had so often delighted his ear, for not the least of her attractions was a sweet voice. She shed many tears at the thought of parting, for a presentiment that they would next meet in sadness came over her.

In the morning a little package reached him. It contained a lock of hair and a note, in which she prayed to the God, who is ready to answer the petitions of the pure in heart, that He would bless the object of her love.

He was hurried off to a distant part of the country:

"The Southern breeze was on his brow."

Travelling and exciting occupations soon changed the current of his thoughts, and he came to regard the whole affair as one of those childish attachments, which spring up like a flower and are just as short-lived.

But towards the close of the summer, chance made him acquainted with a gentleman from the place where the girl resided. She became the subject of conversation, and then my friend learnt that her family thought she was dying of consumption.

He had matters to detain him where he then was, but he cast all considerations aside other than the thought of ministering to her grief. He hastened as rapidly as possible to her father's house. It was late in the afternoon when he reached it. He paused as he lifted the latch of the wicket. The honey-suckle and the jasmine gave forth their perfumes, and the roses and lilies displayed their beauties.

He sat down for a moment, for he was sick at heart. But nerving himself, he entered the house. Was she indeed dying? No! She was only more beautiful than ever.

Several hours were spent together that evening—hours of fearful anguish and self-accusation on his part, of truthful forgiveness and gentle blessings on hers. She had never doubted him. She had only blamed herself. Day after day did she take less and less interest in the amusements of society, in the occupations of study. Her only recreation was to sing over, so long as the physicians would allow her, the songs which he had loved. Her only consolation was to dream that the past was no longer the past, but was once more the present. Night and morning had her prayers ascended to the throne of grace in his behalf. She was happy now, and felt that she should soon get well, for he loved her.

Ere the dawn of the next morning had fairly broken, my friend was called to her room.

She was dying. The death damps were on her brow, and yet her eye lighted up with something of its former glory as she turned to gaze on him. A few words of parting—a promise to watch over him through life—an entreaty so to live that she might welcome him to Heaven when he came to die—a prayer for his happiness—and her angelic spirit had left its mortal abode.

Three days of watching beside her corpse,—more than beautiful in death,—three days of that agony which man can know but once; one night beside her grave; and then—out again into the wide world.

But to return to my maxims. Another general maxim is—be careful to select a woman in a transition state. My language must appear as mystic as that of the Delphic oracle; but I will do what the Pythoness never did. I will explain.

“One who is formed,” says Goethe, “there is no such thing as pleasing; one who is forming will always be grateful.” For example: take a young girl before she fairly embarks in society, to whom all things promise enjoyment, who hastens impetuously to snatch the pleasures which mother earth spreads so bountifully before her, and if you can so command your powers as to render yourself agreeable to her, I know few things more likely to afford a summer's amusement than to study the developements of her mind, the fluctuations of her feelings, and your mutual action and reaction upon one another.

Another maxim is—that a flirtation in the country differs essentially from one in town. In the latter case, the comparative unfrequency with which the parties meet, and the variety of topics afloat, enable the gentleman to go always prepared; whereas, in the former, he is thrown back on his own resources, and is compelled to affect sentiment and to cherish a taste for the beauties of nature. On the other hand he seldom derives as much improvement from a flirtation in the city as from one in the country; because, in the city, he sees the lady chiefly in the masquerade which “good society” teaches its members to wear; but in the country he can enter more deeply into her character, explore more accurately her motives of action—and, by the way, if wise, he will make some of these discoveries a staple of conversation.

Speaking of conversation—let him be careful to cultivate a sportive, half-quizzing mode of talking, even upon the most seriously sentimental subjects. The most daring propositions may be made in a jocose manner with perfect impunity. The least touch of the lachrymose and a man is gone. He has given up “the ribbands.” Besides, women admire that graceful way which some men have of passing over the dull and dwelling only on the sprightly parts of a subject. The way in which a man talks is, with them, of more consequence than the matter. Let him not, however, forget the remark of De Staël (a great authority in these things)—en toute chose c'est la froideur qui offense, et l'imagination, au contraire, a presque toujours de la bonhomie.

“A knack at rhyming” is also quite necessary and must be cultivated. A little satire, or a bit of tenderness, or railery, when put into tolerable verse, will often prove of most essential service. As examples: here is something for an over-confident belle.

•Here's to broken hearts a plenty!
Bravo! fill the goblet high!
Never, until maids are scanty,
Never cease to woo and sigh.

*These verses have been set to the music of an air from the opera of L' Elisir d' Amore, Lo con ricco.

Theirs' are hearts were made for breaking Fragile things indeed are they—
Don't then disappoint the making,
But in flirting pass the day—

Who in woman's faith believeth?
Let the fool his cap put on—
Her glory is that she deceiveth
Trusting hearts too quickly won—
But to him who her well knoweth,
Who in her doth not confide,
At his feet she lowly boweth,
Lays aside her "female pride."

Truth and Honor heaped upon her
Are like water, poured on sands
Thirsting 'neath the suns of summer—
Truth and Honor buy no lands.
But bring wealth, and straight you'll gain her.
"Quick! my lady's carriage call!"—
Magic words those are to win her—
Take her to your lofty hall.

And here is something for a sentimental Miss.

I care not for Fame,
I care not for wine,
I care but for woman
In her beauty divine.
I know that good wine
Its pleasure can give,
But with woman's dear love
In rapture we live—
So give me not Fame—
Give me not wine—
Give me but woman
In her beauty divine.

I know Madam Fame
Her glory can shed
O'er the brows of the living,
And the tombs of the dead.
Still glory is but fleeting
And fadeth away,
Like the dew of the morning
Before coming day—
So give me not Fame—
Give me not wine—
Give me but woman
In her beauty divine.

I ask but in dying,
On her bosom to rest,
In her white arms folded,
To her beating heart prest—
To feel the tear falling
From her soft beaming eye—
To know that she drinks in My last earthly sigh.
So give me not Fame—
Give me not wine—
Give me but woman
In her beauty divine.

Or by way of mystifying some would-be man-killer, verses like these might be sent.

Oh, Leslie's Kate! Oh, Leslie's Kate!
When first with thee I met,
I little thought 'twould be my fate
A lesson strange to get—

But ever since I thee have known—
I know no reason why—
Thy face upon my path hath shone
Like stars in twilight sky.

Oh, Leslie's Kate! 'twill not be soon
That I forget the dance,
When to thy side I bent me down
To catch their earnest glance—
And then the pleasant morning call,
When by your side I sat—
You hinted that of all the ball
You only thought of that.

Nor, Leslie's Kate! will time so soon
That evening's spell efface,
When magic tricks and arts were shown
To childhood's wondering gaze—
For me, enchantments had no charm;
The arts did idle seem.
For near me breathed the living form
Of some bewitching dream.

We met no more in such gay hours—
For soon affliction came—
More potent far that life of ours
To nourish my wild flame.
I knew not that it lurk'd within—
But in my pulse it stirr'd
'Till other eyes were all unseem,
And other tones unheard.

I dream'd that Honor, Faith and Truth,
All in thy bosom dwelt—
Ah! shattered was the dream of youth,
And 'fore my God I knelt—
I prayed that I might thee forgive,
'This world I might forget,
And in his awful presence live
Though but too sinful yet.

I wandered 'neath those sunny climes
Rich in the gems of art—
The music of Cathedral chimes
Stole o'er my broken heart—
But not the halls where genius dwells
Could wake life in my breast;
And to mine ear the old church bells
Spoke of eternal rest.

Sad, solemn thoughts steal o'er me now—
We'll meet not as we've met—
For Death upon my youthful brow
His icy seal hath set.
Yet happy are the early dead—
In peaceful graves they sleep—
But may life's sweets on thee be shed
And God thy spirit keep.

These are given, not for their merit, but by way of specimens to the reflecting student. Valentines also come very well into play in their proper season. We once knew a very doubtful field carried by a judicious use of this species of artillery. Like verses, however, they should be spicy, rather than sentimental.

Another maxim is—rather under, than over, dress. This may seem a startling paradox; nevertheless it is true. That passion which St.

Paul has so appropriately called "the lust of the eye" has but little more than a momentary influence over women. A dazzling exterior may produce a first impression, but no one, who is merely "varnished over with good-breeding," as Sir Fopling has it, can hope to expect any thing more thereby.

The attentive student, however, will carefully note the dress of women. Nothing perhaps is so indicative of female character as female costume. From the ill-made, awkwardly put on gown and unbecoming hat of the elderly Puritan female, whose heart is overflowing with the "milk of human kindness," to the "gay and debonaire" attire of the fashionable belle, which is so well calculated to display in luxurious freedom the charms of the wearer; female fancies, tastes, feelings and principles are disclosed to the discerning eye in ribbands, flowers, jewels and frocks. There are indicia to be found here from which conclusions may be drawn with almost unerring accuracy. The Philosophy of Female dress is yet to be written. One of these days a little entreaty from my young female friends may extract something from me on the subject. One thing I will now say: Let my student behold yonder girl. The neat straw hat, so delicately yet so tastefully trimmed, that ten minutes after she has left your sight you cannot say whether it was trimmed or not; the quiet yet well-chosen color of that dress, so modestly made, so neatly fitting, coming up close to the well-formed throat which emerges from a little frill of lace, like the bust of Iris from the lotos leaf: the well-arranged hair, gracefully brushed back from the temples, giving thereby the clear line of that part of the face where genius most loves to dwell, and disclosing the small white ear sitting close to the head: the little edging of lace-cuff just falling on the well-selected glove: the snowy stockings and the neat but easy slipper scarcely, yet still, visible beneath a dress neither too long nor short: let him behold her well, then flee away. Depart! Let him not seek lessons of her. It may not be. She is too earnest and beautiful of soul. She looks upon life with too trustful an eye, too confiding a heart. Like the sensitive plant she may not be touched without suffering, and though too gentle doubtless to express her feelings in words, yet let him beware. The curse of a wounded spirit never fails to cling.

I have not even opened this subject. I had something to say on the Italian adage Donna che prende, tosto se rende, and quite a little sermon to deliver on that pithy, pregnant remark of Mephistopheles to Faust:

Mein guter Freund, das wird sich alles geben;
Sobald du Dir vertraust, sobald weisst Du zu leben.

I had something to say about the various classes of women, the prude, the blue, the belle, et omne id genus; and the different modes of approaching them; some more maxims to suggest, and some more tales to tell. But I am not expected to say so much as to take up a whole number of the Messenger, and therefore I will say no more at present. But I have left my address with my friend, the Editor, who will duly forward all packages, and I stand ready to counsel with any one disposed to seek and take the advice of an elderly gentleman.

One word, however, before I close this essay. We all remember the tale in the Arabian Nights, in which Ali Baba (I believe) goes to the cave of the thieves, and on pronouncing certain magical words, the door opens and he enters a store house full of curiosities and treasures. Thus, I confess, human nature appears to me a vast receptacle of wondrous mysteries, of hidden oracles, οὐδὲ

Μὴν ποτε λαβὰ κατακοιμησῶσι.
Μεγας εν τούτοις ΘΕΟΣ.*

prophecies, eternal in their nature, with Divinity mighty in every line. To this cave,—filled with mournful truths, unexplained problems, unsatisfied desires, unheeded sympathies,—Flirtation is the key, the "open sesame" by which we gain admittance. If we are wise we will return to our homes laden with jewels and all manner of precious stones.

THE BROKEN GOBLET.

From the German.

BY R. H. STODDARD.

A cloven-footed faun was found one day
Beneath an oak asleep, the shepherds found him;—
(This was in Arcady, of olden time!)
Said they, "Come let us bind him to the tree,
And he shall sing a song before we loose him;—
They say these fauns are sweet and pleasant singers;—
One would not think so, they are clad so rough!"
They tied him to the tree, with viny strings,
And pelted him with acorns, and they stung him,—
He turned and rubbed his eyes, and woke at last,—
"Where am I?" said the faun, "where is my flute?
My slender flute!—where is my goblet gone?
I see my flute—and yonder lies my cup—
Shivered to pieces—Bacchus! I have broken it!
I must have been quite jolly! I am tied too;
Who has been fooling with me? Ah! I see you
Peeping around the trunk. I see your crook,

My quaint Arcadian—and you, my lad,
Perched on the swinging limb—(take care, you'll fall!)—
Cease pelting me, you hurt me, let me loose;
Undo these viny fetters if you please!"
"But no," said they, "we do not please at all;
Sing us a song and we will set you free."
"What shall I sing about, mischievous boys?
I cannot sing, as I was wont to do,
For I have dropped my flute and broke my cup.
I'll sing about my goblet, sit beside me."
They sat beside him, and the faun began.

I.

Alas my goblet!

My goblet was exceeding beautiful!
I never saw its like, and I've seen many.
Pan's is not richer, and it is the gift
Of golden Midas, and he gave it to him,
To shame Apollo at their piping match,
(For which he made his ears as long as mine!)
It was the jewel of my cave; I had
A corner where I hid it, in the moss,
Between the jagged crevices of rock;
I used to drain it twenty times a day,
Pledging the Dryads and the Hamadryads;
And when a wood-god or a nymph passed by,
I filled it to the brim with bravest wine,
And offered them a draught, and told them Jove
Had nothing richer on Olympus' top;—
His nectar is not richer than my wine,
Said I, and for my goblet—look at it!
But well-a-day! 'tis broken, my sweet cup;
Its precious fragments strew the common dust!

II.

Alas! my goblet:—

Sometimes my brothers of the wood, the fauns,
Held gay carousals with me in my cave;—
I had a skin of Chian wine therein,
Whereof I made a feast, and all who drank,— (I'd like to see the faun, who failed to do it!)—
Made ditties on the figures, and the tales
Engraven on the part their lips had kissed;—
But we shall drain the goblet never more,
My brothers of the wood, and never more
Make ditties on it, never, never more!
For I have shivered, broken my sweet cup;
Its precious fragments strew the common dust!

III.

Alas, my goblet,—

Pan was engraven on it, rural Pan,
And all the story of his nymph transformed;—
He stood in horror, in a marshy place,
Clasping a bending reed; he thought to clasp
Syrinx, but clasped a reed and nothing more!
There was another picture 'graved below it;—
Pan, after he had learned to play the flute:—
He learned it by the wind among the reeds,
Solemnly sighing o'er the vanished maid:—
He sat at noon within a shady bower,

With all his berds around him, and he piped;—
(I thought at times I saw his fingers move,
And caught his music, but I must have dreamed!)
And Satyrs danced around, and Dryads peeped
From out the mossy trunks of ancient trees;
And nice-eared Echo mocked him, till he thought
—The simple god—he heard another Pan,
Playing, and wonder shone in his large eyes!—
I shall behold those pictures never more!—
Ah never more, for I have broke my cup,
Its precious fragments strew the common dust!

IV.

Alas! my goblet!

And Jove was pictured on it—Jove himself,
Transforméd for the nonce into a bull,
Bearing forlorn Europa through the waves,
Leaving behind a track of ruffled foam!
A-mort with fear, she held him by the horns,
Her golden tresses streaming on the winds!
And Cupids sported round on wingéd dolphins,
And sea-gods peeped from out their weedy caves,
(The deep was full of wonder-startled faces!)
And on the shore were maids with waving scarfs,
And hinds a-coming to the rescue—late!
Alack! I shall not see the like again,
Since I have broken my delightful cup
And cast its precious fragments in the dust!

V.

Alas! my goblet!

And youthful Bacchus, too, was pictured there;—
He sat in a green arbor hung with vines,
A loving nymph reclining by his side;—
His arm was thrown around her slender waist,
His head lay in her bosom, and she held
A cup a little distance from his lips,
And teased him with it, and he wanted it!
A pair of spotted pards were sleeping near,
Couchant in shade, their heads upon their paws,
And revellers were dancing in the woods!
But all is vanished, lost, forever lost!
Wail! Ai! Ai!—my divinest cup,
Earth's paragon, is shivered at my feet,
Ruined and trampled in the worthless dust!

The swains unbound the faun, delighted with him;—
He gathered up the fragments of his cup
And gave them each a piece and went his ways.—
—This is the Idyll of the Broken Goblet—
I told you of, when we were wandering
To seek our straying flocks: I've marred it some,
I own in singing:—I am like the faun,
And can not sing as I was wont to do;—
I have been sleeping—drunken with the wine,
The enchanted and voluptuous wine of Love,
And in my slumber I have dropped my flute
And broken the bright cup of Poesy!
Alas, and I have broken the rich cup
Unwittingly, and trampled under foot
The golden fragments in the dust of Earth!

The Epic Paintings of Thomas Cole.*

BY CHARLES LANMAN.

"His departure has left a vacuity which amazes and alarms us. It is as if the voyager on the Hudson were to look to the great range of the Catskills, at the foot of which Cole, with a reverential fondness, had fixed his abode, and were to see that the grandest of its summits had disappeared, had sunk into the plain from our sight. I might use a bolder similitude;—it is as if we were to look over the heavens on a starlight evening and find that one of the greater planets, Hesperus or Jupiter, had been blotted from the sky."
[Funeral Oration by William Cullen Bryant.]

Upon the romantic life of the greatest of American Landscape Painters, it is not our province to discourse, for that task has been assigned to a gifted poet and friend of the departed—the reverend Louis L. Noble;—nor do we purpose to expatiate upon his beautiful character as a man, and his genius as an artist; for that labor of love has already been accomplished by the eminent poet, from whom we have borrowed our motto. The only idea that we have in view, is simply to describe the truly Epic productions of the late Thomas Cole, for the edification of those of our readers who have never had an opportunity of examining them.

In the first place, then, we will turn our attention to the series of five pictures, entitled "The Course of Empire." This work is an epitome of the life of man, and is conceived and executed in a manner which must convince the beholder that the artist possessed many of the attributes of the philosopher, the poet and the Christian.

In the first picture we have a perfectly wild scene of rocks, mountains, woods, and a bay of the ocean, reposing in the luxuriance of a ripe Spring. The clouds of night are being dissipated by the beams of the rising sun. On the opposite side of the bay rises a lofty promontory, crowned by a singular, isolated rock, which would ever be a conspicuous landmark to the mariner. As the same locality is preserved in each picture of the series, this rock identifies it, although the position of the spectator changes in the several pictures. The chase being the most characteristic occupation of savage life, in the foreground we see an Indian clothed in skins, pursuing a wounded deer, which is bounding down a narrow ravine. On a rock, in the middle ground, are other Indians, with their dogs surrounding another deer. On the bosom of a little river below are a number of canoes passing down the stream, while many more are drawn up on the shore. On an elevation beyond these is a cluster of wigwams, and a number of Indians dancing round a fire. In this picture we have the first rudiments of society. Men are already banded together for mutual aid in the chase. In the canoes, huts, and weapons, we perceive that the useful arts have commenced, and in the singing, which usually accompanies the dance of savages, we behold the germs of music and poetry. The Empire is asserted, to a limited degree, over sea, land, and the animal kingdom.

Ages have passed away, and in the second picture we have the Simple or Arcadian State of Society. The time of day is a little before noon, and the season early summer. The "untracked and rude" has been tamed and softened. Shepherds are tending their flocks; a solitary ploughman, with his oxen, is turning up the soil; and in the rude vessels passing into the haven of a growing village, and in the skeleton of a barque building on the shore, we perceived the commencement of Commerce. From a rude temple on a hill the smoke of sacrifice is ascending to the sky, symbolizing the spirit of Religion. In the foreground, on the left hand, is seated an old man, who, by describing strange figures in the sand, seems to have made some geometrical discovery, demonstrating the infancy of Science. On the right hand is a woman with a distaff, about crossing a stone bridge; beside her, a boy is drawing on a stone the figure of a man with a sword; and beyond these, ascending the road, a soldier is partly seen. Under some noble trees, in the middle distance, are a number of peasants dancing to the music of pipe and timbrel. All these things show us that society is steadily progressing in its march of usefulness and power.

Ages have again passed away, and in the third picture we have a magnificent city. It is now mid-day, and early Autumn. The Bay is now surrounded by piles of architecture, temples, colonnades, and domes. It is a day of rejoicing. The spacious harbor is crowded with vessels, war-galleys, ships, and barques, their silken sails glistening in the sunshine. Moving over a massive stone bridge, in the foreground, is a triumphal procession. The conqueror, robed in purple, is mounted on a car drawn by an elephant, and surrounded by captives and a numerous train of guards and servants, many of them bearing pictures and golden treasures. As he is about to pass the triumphal arch, beautiful girls strew flowers in his path; gay festoons of drapery hang from the clustered columns; golden trophies glitter in the sun, and incense rises from silver censers. Before a Doric temple, on the left, a multitude of white-robed priests are standing on the marble steps, while near them a religious

* Nearly all the matter contained in the following article has already been printed elsewhere, but only in detached paragraphs, and never before, in the condensed form in which it now appears ceremony is being performed before a number of altars. The statue of Minerva, with a Victory in her hand, stands above the building of the Caryatides, on a columned pedestal, near which is a company of musicians, with cymbals, "trumpets also, and shawms." From the lofty portico of a palace, an imperial personage is watching the procession, surrounded by her children, attendants and guards. Nations have been subjugated, man has reached the summit of human glory. Wealth, power, knowledge, and taste have worked together and accomplished the highest meed of human achievement and Empire.

Another change—and lo! in the fourth picture, the Vicious State, or State of Destruction. Behold the consequences of luxury, in the weakened and debased condition of mankind. A savage enemy has entered the once proud and happy city; a fierce tempest is raging; walls and colonnades are lying in the dust, and temples and palaces are being consumed by the torch of the incendiary. The fire of vengeance is swallowing up the devoted city. An arch of the bridge, over which the triumphal procession had before passed, has been battered down, and broken pillars, ruins of war-engines, and the temporary bridge which had been thrown over, indicate that this has been the scene of direst contention. Now there is a terrible conflict on the bridge, whose insecurity accelerates the horror of the conflict. Horses, and men, and chariots, are precipitated into the raging waves. War-galleys are contending; others in flames; and others still, sinking beneath the prow of a superior foe. Smoke and flames are issuing from the falling and prostrate edifices; and along the battlements and in the blocked-up streets the conflict is dreadful indeed. The foreground is strewn with the bodies of the dead and dying. Some have fallen into the basin of a fountain, tinging the water with blood. One female is sitting in mute despair over the dead body of her son; another leaping over a battlement, to escape the grasp of a ruffian soldier; and other soldiers drag a woman by the hair down the steps, that form the pedestal of a mutilated colossal statue, whose shattered head lies on the pavement below. A barbarous enemy has conquered the city; Carnage and Destruction have asserted their frightful Empire.

The last and most impressive picture of this series is the scene of Desolation. The sun has just departed, and the moon is ascending the twilight sky over the ocean, near the place where the sun rose in the first picture. The shades of evening are gradually stealing over the shattered and ivy-grown ruins of that once great city. A lonely column rises in the foreground, on whose capital a solitary heron has built her nest, and at the foot of it her mate is standing in the water, both of them apparently conscious of being a living mockery. The Doric temple and triumphal bridge may still be identified among the ruins, which are laved by the waters of the tranquil sea. But though man and his works have perished, the steep promontory with its isolated rock, still rears itself against the sky, unmoved, unchanged. Time has consumed the works of man, and art is resolving into its elemental nature. The gorgeous pageant has passed, the roar of battle has ceased, the multitude has mingled with the dust, the Empire is extinct.

The first, second, and last of these paintings are the best of the series, not only in the poetry they portray, but in their execution. The style is more varied and natural, and has less the appearance of paint than many of the artist's later productions. As to the third and fourth paintings, the conception of both is exceedingly fine and poetical, but they are deficient in execution. The architecture is admirably done, but the numerous figures which it was necessary to introduce, are poorly drawn and arranged; and there is a feebleness in the effect. It would be, perhaps, too much to ask that an artist should be a great painter of scenery, and also a master of the human figure. As a whole, however, the Course of Empire is a work of art worthy of any nation or any painter. These pictures were painted for the late Luman Reed, at a cost of eight thousand dollars, but are now the property of the New York Gallery, which institution owes its existence to Mr. Reed, whose collection of Pictures formed the foundation thereof.

The next work to which we would call the attention of our readers is called "The Voyage of Life." It is a series of four pictures, allegorically portraying the prominent features of man's life, viz: childhood, youth, manhood, and old age. The subject is one of such universal interest, that it were almost impossible to treat it in an entirely original manner, but no one can deny that the conception of the painter displays a high and rare order of poetic power.

In the first, we behold the dawn of a summer morning. A translucent stream is issuing from an unknown source, out of a deep cavern in the side of a mountain. Floating gently down the stream, is a golden boat, made of the sculptured figures of the Hours, while the prow is formed by the present hour holding forth an emblem of Time. It is filled with flowers, and on these a little child is seated, tossing them with his up-raised hands, and smiling with new-born joy, as he looks upon the unnumbered beauties and glories of this bright world around him; while a guardian angel is at the helm, with his wings lovingly and protectingly extended over the child. Love, purity, and beauty emanate like incense from the sky, the earth and water, so that the heart of the gazer seems to forget the world, and lose itself in a dream of heaven.

A few fleeting years are gone, and behold the change! The Stream of Life is widened, and its current strong and irresistible, but it flows through a country of surpassing loveliness. The Voyager, who is now a youth, has taken the helm into his own hands, and the dismissed angel stands upon the shore looking at him with "a look made of all sweet accord," as if he said in his heart, "God be with thee, thoughtless mortal!" But the youth heeds not his angel, for his eyes are now riveted by an airy castle pictured against the sky, dome above dome, reaching to the very zenith. The phantom of worldly happiness and worldly ambition has absorbed the imagination and eager gaze of the wayward voyager, and as he urges his frail bark onward, he dreams not of the dangers which may await him in his way. To the boat, only a few flowers are now clinging, and on closer observation we perceive that the castle in the air, apparently so real, has only a white cloud for its foundation, and that ere long the stream makes a sudden turn, rushing with the fury of a maddened steed down a terrible ravine. The moral of the picture it is needless to elucidate.

Another change, and lo! the verge of a cataclysm and a fearful storm. The rudderless bark is just about to plunge into the abyss below, while the voyager (now in the prime of manhood) is imploring the only aid, that can avail him in the trying hour, that of heaven. Demoni- cal images are holding forth their temptations in the clouds around him, but he heeds them not. His confidence in God supports him, the previous agony of his soul is dispelled or subdued, by a reflection of immortal light stealing through the storm, and by the smiles of his guardian angel, visibly stationed in the far-off sky.

The Voyage of Life is ended, and our voyager, now white with hoary hairs, has reached that point where the waters of time and eternity mingle together—a bold conception, which is finely embodied by the daring genius of the painter. The hour-glass is gone, and the shattered bark is ready to dissolve into the fathomless waters beneath. The old man is on his knees, with clasped hands and his eyes turned heavenward, for the greenness of earth is forever departed, and a gloom is upon the ocean of Eternity. But just above the form of our good voyager is hovering his angel, who is about to transport him to his home; and, as the eye wanders upward, an infinite host of heavenly ministers are seen ascending and descending the cloudy steps which lead to the bosom of God. Death is swallowed up in life, the glory of heaven has eclipsed that of the earth, and our voyager is safe in the haven of eternal rest. And thus endeth the allegory of Human Life.

With regard to the mechanical execution of these paintings, we consider them not equal to some of the earlier efforts of the same pencil. They are deficient in atmosphere, and have too much the appearance of paint. The water in the first, second and third pictures, is superior, but the perspective and atmosphere in the second are masterly. In all of them the figures are very fine, considering the difficulty of managing such peculiar characters. In the first we are pleased with the simplicity of the composition; in the second, with the variety, there being portrayed the elm of England, the plains of Tuscany, the palm of tropic climes, the mountains of Switzerland, and the oak of America; in the third, with the genius displayed in using the very storm to tell a story; and in the fourth, with the management of the shadows, and the apparent reality of the light from heaven. These pictures were painted for the late Samuel Ward of New York City, and the price received for them was six thousand dollars. During the last year, however, they were purchased by the American Art Union, and distributed among the prizes at their annual lottery in December.

Duplicates of the above paintings were executed by Cole, and sold to a gentleman in Cincinnati in the year 1846.

The last, and in many respects the most impressive, of Cole's more ambitious productions, is a series of five pictures entitled The Cross and the World. The designs or studies for these pictures were all executed, but owing to the untimely death of the artist, only two out of the five were ever finished on a large scale. This series of pictures constitute a christian poem of a high order, and in describing them, we shall employ the language of one who has probably studied the entire work more thoroughly than any other man. The idea is that two youths enter upon a pilgrimage—one to the cross and the other to the world.

In the first picture the eye of the beholder first strikes the bold termination of a chain of mountains, with craggy peaks lost in the clouds.

The same lofty range is seen through the entire series.

To the left, a straight and narrow path takes its way up a rugged gorge, down which there beams a silvery light from a bright cross in the sky. The path at first leads off through fields of real flowers, betokening the early part of the Christian life, neither difficult nor uninviting. In the distance a dark mist, hovering over the track, conceals from the advancing way-farer the real difficulties of his journey, and betoken the sorrows which of necessity befall him. To the right, a gracefully winding way leads down into a gently undulating and pleasant vale. Stretching forward through delightful landscapes, it finally fades away, and leaves the eye to wander on to the dim pinnacles and domes of a great city. A golden light falls through an atmosphere of repose, and lends warmth, softness, and beauty, as well to crag and precipice as to the rich valley. By-paths, serpent-like, steal up upon the sunny slopes of the mountain, inviting the traveller to the enjoyment of the prospect and the coolness of the waterfall.

Vegetation of unnatural growth, and gorgeous and unreal flowers skirt the borders of the way.

At the foot of the mountain stands Evangelist with the open Gospel. A little in advance are the waters, symbolical of Baptism.

Two youths, companions in the travel of life, having come to the parting of their road, are affectionately and earnestly directed to the shining cross. While one, through the power of truth, enters with timid steps upon his holy pilgrimage, the other, caught by the enchantment of the earthly prospect, turns his back upon Evangelist and the Cross, and speeds forward upon the pathway of the world.

In the second picture we have a wild mountain region now opening upon the beholder. It is an hour of tempest. Black clouds envelope the surrounding summits. A swollen torrent rushes by, and plunges into the abyss. The storm, sweeping down through terrific chasms, flings aside the angry cataract, and deepens the horror of the scene below. The Pilgrim, now in the vigor of manhood, pursues his way on the edge of a frightful precipice. It is a moment of imminent danger. But gleams of light from the shining cross break through the storm, and shed fresh brightness along his perilous and narrow path. With steadfast look, and renewed courage, the lone traveller holds on his heavenly pilgrimage.

The whole symbolizes the trials of faith.

In the third picture the beholder looks off upon an expanse of tranquil water. On the right are the gardens of pleasure, where the devotees of sensual delights revel in all that satiates and amuses. Near a fountain, whose falling waters lull with perpetual murmurs, stands a statue of the goddess of Love. An interminable arcade, with odoriferous air and delicious shade, invites to the quiet depths of a wilderness of greenery and flowers. A gay throng dances upon the yielding turf, around a tree, to the sound of lively music. Near an image of Bacchus, a company enjoys a luxurious banquet.

On the left is the Temple of Mammon, a superb and costly structure, surmounted by the wheel of Fortune. Beneath its dome, a curiously-wrought fountain throws out showers of gold, which is eagerly caught up by the votaries below.

From the great censers, rising here and there above the heads of the multitude, clouds of incense roll up and wreath the columns of the temple—a grateful odor to the God. The trees and shrubbery of the adjacent grounds are laden with golden fruit.

Far distant, in the middle of the picture, a vision of earthly power and glory rises upon the view. Splendid trophies of conquest adorn the imposing gateway; suits of armor, gorgeous banners, and the victor's wreath. Colonnades and piles of architecture stretch away in the vast perspective. At the summit of a lofty flight of steps stand conspicuous the throne and sceptre. Suspended in the air, at the highest point of human reach, is that glittering symbol of royalty, the crown. Between the beholder and this grand spectacle are armies in conflict, and a city in flames, indicating that the path to glory lies through ruin and the battle-field. To the contemplation of this alluring scene the Pilgrim of the World, now in the morning of manhood, is introduced. Which of the fascinating objects before him is the one of his choice, is left to the imagination of the spectator. The picture symbolizes the pleasure, the fortune, and the glory of the world.

In the fourth picture, the Pilgrim, now an old man on the verge of existence, catches a first view of the boundless and eternal. The temptations of life are behind him; the world is beneath his feet. Its rocky pinnacles, just rising through the gloom, reach not up into his brightness; its sudden mists, pausing in the dark obscurity, ascend no more into his serene atmosphere. He looks out upon the infinite. Clouds—embodiments of glory, threading immensity in countless lines, rolling up from everlasting depths—carry the vision forward toward the unapproachable light. The Cross, now fully revealed, pours its effulgence over the illimitable scene. Angels from the presence, with palm and crown of immortality, appear in the distance, and advance to meet him. Lost in rapture at the sight, the Pilgrim drops his staff, and with uplifted hands, sinks upon his knees.

In the last picture, desolate and broken, the Pilgrim, descending a gloomy vale, pauses at last on the horrid brink that overhangs the outer darkness. Columns of the Temple of Mammon crumble; trees of the gardens of pleasure moulder on his path. Gold is as valueless as the dust with which it mingles. The phantom of glory—a baseless, hollow fabric—fits under the wing of death to vanish in a dark eternity. Demon forms are gathering around him. Horror-struck, the Pilgrim lets fall his staff, and turns in despair to the long-neglected and forgotten Cross. Veiled in melancholy night, behind a peak of the mountain, it is lost to his view forever.

The above pictures are in the possession of the artist's family.

We did think of describing at length all the imaginative productions of our great master in landscape, but upon further reflection we have concluded merely to record their titles, by way of giving our readers an idea of the versatility of Cole's genius. They are as follows:—The Departure and Return, which is a poetical representation of the Feudal Times, The Cross in the Wilderness, Il Penseroso, L' Allegro, The Past and Present, The Architect's Dream, Dream of Arcadia, The Expulsion of Adam and Eve, and Prometheus Bound. As the last mentioned picture is owned in England, and is unquestionably one of the wildest and most splendid efforts of the painter's pencil, we cannot refrain from a brief description. The scene represented is among the snow-covered peaks of a savage mountain land, and to the loftiest peak of all, is chained the being who gives the picture a name. Immediately in the foreground, is a pile of rocks and broken trees, which give a fine effect to the distant landscape, while, just above this foreground, is a solitary vulture slowly ascending to the upper air, to feast upon its victim. The idea of leaving the devouring scene to the imagination, could only have been conceived by the mind of the most accomplished artist. The time represented is early morning—and the cold blue ocean of the sky is studded with one brilliant star, which represents Jupiter, by whose order Prometheus was chained to the everlasting rock.

This is one of the most truly sublime pictures we have ever seen, and possesses all the qualities which constitute an epic production. The unity of the design is admirable,—one figure, one prominent mountain, a cloudless sky, one lonely star, one representative of the feathery tribes, and one cluster of rocks for the foreground,—and it is also completely covered with an atmosphere which gives every object before us a dreamy appearance. In point of execution we cannot possibly find a fault with this glorious picture, and we do not believe that the idea of the poet was ever better illustrated by any landscape painter.

With regard to the actual views and other less ambitious productions of Cole, we can only say that the entire number might be estimated at about one hundred. The majority of them are illustrative of European scenery, but of those which are truly American, it may be said that they give a more correct and comprehensive idea of our glorious scenery, than do the productions of any other American artist. In looking upon his better pictures of American scenery we forget the pent up city, and our hearts flutter with a joy allied to that which we may suppose animates the woodland bird, when listening in its solitude to the hum of the wilderness. Perpetual freedom, perpetual and unalloyed happiness, seem to breathe from every object which he portrays, and as the eye wanders along the mountain declivities, or mounts still farther up on the chariot-looking clouds, as we peer into the translucent waters of his lakes and streams, or witness the solemn grandeur and gloom of his forests, we cannot but wonder at the marvellous power of genius. The style of our artist is bold and masterly. While he did not condescend to delineate every leaf and sprig which may be found in nature, yet he gave you the spirit of the scene. To do this is the province of genius, and an attainment beyond the reach of mere talent. The productions of Cole appeal to the intellect more than to the heart, and we should imagine that Milton was his favorite poet. He loved the uncommon efforts in nature, and was constantly giving birth to new ideas. He had a passion for the wild and tempestuous, and possessed an imagination of the highest order. He was also a lover of the beautiful and occasionally executed a picture full of quiet summer-like sentiment: but his joy was to depict the scenery of our mountain land, when clothed in the rich garniture of autumn. He was the originator of a new style, and is now a most worthy member of that famous brotherhood of immortals whom we remember by the names of Lorraine, Poussin, Rosa, Wilson and Gainsborough.

The name of Cole is one which his countrymen should not willingly let die. A man of fine, exalted genius, by his pencil he has accomplished much good, not only to his chosen art, by becoming one of its masters, but eminently so in a moral point of view. And this reminds us of the influences, which may be exerted by the landscape painter. That these are of importance no one can deny. Is not painting as well the expression of thought as writing? With his pencil, if he is a wise and good man, the artist may portray, to every eye that rests upon his canvass, the loveliness of virtue and religion, or the deformity and wretchedness of a vicious life. He may warn the worldling of his folly and impending doom, and encourage the Christian in his pilgrimage to heaven. He may delineate the marvellous beauty of nature, so as to lead the mind upward to its Creator, or proclaim the ravages of time, that we may take heed to our ways and prepare ourselves for a safe departure from this world, into that beyond the Valley of the Shadow of Death. A goodly portion of all these things have been accomplished by Thomas Cole. As yet, he is the only landscape painter in this country who has attempted imaginative painting, and the success which has followed him in his career, even in a pecuniary point of view, affords great encouragement to our younger painters in this department of the art. He has set a noble example, which ought to be extensively followed. Observe, we do not mean by this that his subjects ought to be imitated. Far from it; because they are not stamped with as decided a national character, as the productions of all painters should be. Excepting his actual views of American scenery, the paintings of Cole might have been produced had he never set foot upon our soil. Let our young artists aspire to something above a mere copy of nature, or even a picture of the fancy; let them paint the visions of their imagination. No other country ever offered such advantages as our own. Let our young painters use their pencils to illustrate the thousand scenes, strange, wild, and beautiful, of our early history. Let them aim high, and their achievements will be distinguished. Let them remember that theirs is a noble destiny. What though ancient wisdom and modern poetry have told us that "art is long and time is fleeting!"—let them toil and persevere with nature as their guide, and they will assuredly have their reward.

ENGLISH BALLADS.

The earliest poets of Europe were the Scalds, or bards of the Scandinavian tribes. Their name is explained to mean "Smoother (or Polishers) of Language;" though some derive it from "skal," a word which often occurs in their poems. Coming from the East, with Odin and his followers, when those wild hordes overran the countries which lie along the shores of the Baltic, they celebrated in verse the great wants in the history of their people, and the martial renown of their kings and heroes. They were held in the highest esteem and reverence—were honored with the companionship of monarchs and warriors—and looked up to by the inferior classes with superstitious veneration. It was their province to preserve the memory of glorious deeds of arms, and to transmit to posterity the fame of the illustrious brave. Unlike the laureates of later days, they are said to have exercised their high calling with great independence, and to have denied the immortality of song to such as were unworthy of it. Hence it was not uncommon for the leaders to place them near their own persons when going into battle: that the Scalds might be eye-witnesses of the prowess which they were expected to commemorate. Thus the warlike temper of the nation and the heroic spirit of the bards stimulated each other, and united to swell the tide of war, upon which the Gothic conquerors rode triumphantly over the armies of the Roman Empire.

The Anglo-Saxons, and perhaps their predecessors, the Britons, were descendants of these fierce barbarians: the Danes were a later swarm from the same great northern hive: and even the Normans were but the remote progeny of kindred-tribes who had possessed themselves of a part of Gaul some centuries before the memorable invasion of England. In the history and traditions of them all, antiquarians trace the presence and agency of the old bards; modified, at one time, by local circumstances—at another by revolutions in the political or social condition of the people; and changing their name and character with the vicissitudes of language and manners. It is related of the great Alfred, that in the year 878 he entered the Danish camp in the disguise of a minstrel, accompanied by one trusty friend who officiated as harp-bearer. Secure of hospitable treatment in his assumed character, he had leisure to survey all their military arrangements, and to plan the attack, which resulted in the overthrow of the invaders. Sixty years afterwards the Danish king Aulaff (or Olave) tried the same experiment upon the Saxon, Athelstan, but with different success. He got out of the camp in safety: but was observed to bury the money which he had received; which circumstance excited suspicion and led to a discovery of the stratagem. Whether these tales be received with implicit credit or not, it is fair to presume that they must have accorded with the manners of the age in which they gained currency and belief. And, thus considered, they prove not only that the Danes and Saxons retained their hereditary regard for the masters of song, but that, even in time of war and amid hostile armies, their profession entitled them to great and peculiar privileges.

Among the Normans the combined arts of poetry and music (acts always combined in their infancy, and separated only in a very advanced state of society) were cultivated to a much higher degree of excellence than among their contemporaries. Their minstrels preceded by more than half a century the famous Troubadours of Provence, who exerted so large an influence over the poetry of France, Italy and Spain. And one of the most romantic incidents connected with the Norman Conquest is to be found in the conduct of Taillefer, a minstrel, at the battle of Hastings. Having obtained the permission of William he advanced to the combat, in front of the Norman army, rousing the hearts of his countrymen by chanting ballads in praise of Charlemagne, and of the gallant peers who fell at Roncesvalles: till at last inflamed by the ardor with which he sought to inspire others, he rushed forward into the thickest ranks of the Britons and, fighting desperately, was slain.*

During the first ages after the Norman Conquest, the language of the conquerors was the only one spoken and written at Court. In the Norman French, therefore, the minstrels, who aspired to please noble ladies and knights, composed their romances: and hence the productions of Englishmen, at that period, are very difficult to be distinguished from those of their contemporaries in France. Another cause has contributed to this confusion. We refer to the common usufruct, which all the romances of Europe then enjoyed, in the heroes of chivalry and their adventures. So that an English poem about King Arthur or Charlemagne, Roland or Sir Lancelot, would have been nearly, or quite, the same thing in subject matter, dialect and style, as if it had been produced on the other side of the channel.

But the exclusive preference of the Court and nobility for their hereditary language was not at all shared by the middle and lower classes of the conquered Saxons—nor by the relics of their aristocracy, who cherished in retirement the memories of former days, and loved the native tongue which preserved them. To all these the Saxon harper or gleeman was still a welcome guest, and oftentimes a favored officer in the service of the great. In process of time the vigor of the old language prevailed over its more polished but weaker antagonist: and, enriched by additions, not only from the modern dialects of Europe, but from the classic originals of Greece and Rome, it has become the nervous, varied and comprehensive English of the present day.

But while "the pure well of English undefiled" has been certainly replenished and refreshed by the tributes thus poured into it, we have to lament, on the other hand, the loss of the early ballads and romances, the diction of which was rendered by these changes obsolete and uncouth. Ritson, a critic of unsurpassed erudition and acuteness, gives it as his opinion, that not more than two ballads have descended to us of a higher antiquity than the age of Elizabeth: though Dr. Percy and other eminent scholars have received a much larger number as genuine productions of the preceding reigns. However, this may be, it is obvious, that almost all of the ballads now extant are either modernized versions of the older poems, translated as it were (time after time) from a dead into a living dialect, or acknowledged imitations of them, which have attempted only to clothe the substance of the ancient poesy in the familiar phraseology of the eighteenth century. Both of these processes, while they have added to the smoothness and elegance of the verse, have detracted not a little from its boldness, energy and fire: as will readily appear to the reader of taste, who will take the pains to compare the few genuine reliques which have come down to us, with the paraphrases and imitations already alluded to.

We cannot choose a better illustration of these remarks than that which is to be found in the two versions of "Chevy Chase" now extant: although even to the elder of the two is not ascribed an earlier date than the reign of Elizabeth, while the later one was so old, in the time of Addison, as to have been mistaken by him for its more venerable predecessor. His admirable critique upon this ballad, in Nos. 70 and 74 of the Spectator, is familiar to every English reader, as well as the eulogium of the gallant Sir Philip Sidney, there quoted, which obviously referred to the old ballad—"I never heard the old song of Peirce and Douglas, that I found not my heart moved more than with a trumpet; and yet it is sung but by some blinde crowder, with no rougher voice than rude style; which beeing so evil apperelled in the dust and cobweb of that uncivill age, what would it work, trimmed in the gorgeous eloquence of Pindare!" We fully agree, by

* This occurrence is almost literally described in the exquisite "Troubadour" of Hortense Beauharnais, and seems certainly to have suggested it. The noble authoress was born too late. She was far better fitted to grace the age of chivalry, as it appears to us in poem and romance, than to be lost in the theatrical parade and vulgar magnificence of the Court of Napoleon. We subjoin the last verse of the ballad referred to, and the translation by Sir Walter Scott.

"Ce troubadour, pour prix de sa vaillance,
Trouva bientôt le trepas en chemin;
Il expira sous le fer d'un lance,
Nommant sa belle, et chantant son refrain.
Mon bras a ma patrie
Mon cœur a mon amie
Mourir gaiment pour la gloire et l'amour;
C'est le devoir d'un vaillant troubadour!"

Alas! upon the bloody field
He fell beneath the foeman's glaive:
But still, reclining on his shield,
Expiring, sung the exulting stave:
My life it is my country's right,
My heart is in my lady's bower;
For love and fame to fall in fight,
Becomes the valiant Troubadour.

the way, with the illustrious critic in his dissent from this objection of Sir Philip to the rude style and evil apparel which (in his eyes) disfigured the beauty of the poem. It would have been no gainer by being travestied in the fashionable elegance and quaintness of Sydney's contemporaries; nor even by assuming the classic attire and the lyric fervors of the Grecian bard. We have more reason to lament, that it did not enjoy the good fortune of Addison's acquaintance: whose keen appreciation of the merits of the paraphrase sufficiently indicates what would have been his admiration of the original.

The following quotations from the two ballads will serve to exhibit the contrasts in style and language, already suggested:—

Old Version.

The Perse owt of Northombarlande,
And a vowe to God mayd he,
That he wolde hunte in the mountaynes
Off Chyviat within days thre,
In the mauger¹ of doughtè Dogles,
And all that ever with him be.

The fattiste hartes in all Cheviat
He sayd he wold kill, and cary them away:
Be my feth, sayd the dougheti Douglas agayn,
I will let² that hontyng if that I may.

The blewe a mort²⁰ uppone the bent,
The semblyd on sydis shear;²¹
To the guyn²² then the Persè went,
To se the brytlynge²³ off the deare.

While the English are busily engaged in "the brytlynge off the deare," and while the Percy is in the act of expressing his chagrin at the non-appearance of Douglas, according to the challenge sent and accepted, the Scottish army is seen approaching—"twenty hundrith spearmen bold:" and the "fifteen hundrith archares" of merry England make ready to receive them. Douglas, with the courage and humanity of a noble heart, purposes to spare the lives of their respective followers, and to decide the quarrel between Percy and himself by single combat. To this Percy eagerly consents: but their purpose is defeated by the resolute spirit of an English squire, named Wytharynton or Withorington, whose refusal to stand idly by, as a spectator, brings on a general engagement.

Old Version.

"Leave off the brytlyng of the dear," he sayde—
"And to your bowys²⁴ look ye tayk good heed;
For never sith²⁵ ye wear on your mothers borne
Had ye never so mickle²⁶ need."

The dougheti Dogglas on a stede²⁷
He rode att his men before;²⁸

Later Version.

The stout Erle of Northumberland,
A vow to God did make,
His pleasure in the Scottish woods,
Three summers days to take;

The cheefest harts in Chevy-chace
To kill and beare away.
These tydings to Erle Douglas came,
In Scotland where he lay:

Who sent Erle Percy present word,
He would prevent his sport—

The gallant greyhounds swiftly ran,
To chase the fallow deere:
On Munday they began to hunt,
Ere daylight did appeare;

And long before high noone they had
An hundred fat buckes slaine;
Then, having dined, the drovyers went
To rouse the deere againe.

The bowmen mustered on the hills,
Well able to endure;
Theire buckesides all, with speciall care,
That day were guarded sure.

The hounds ran swiftly through the woods,
The nimble deere to take,
And with their cryes the hills and dales
An echo shrill did make.

Lord Percy to the quarry went,
To view the slaughtered deere—

Later Version.

—"O cease your sports," Erle Percy said,
"And take your bowes with speed:—"

"And now with me, my countrymen,
Your courage forth advance;
For never was there champion yett,
In Scotland or in France,

His armer glytterydde³⁹ as dyd a glede;³⁹
A bolder barne⁴¹ was never borne.

"Tell me what men ye ar," he says,
"Or whos men that ye be:
Who gave youe leave to hunte in this Chyviat chays⁴² in the spy:⁴³ of me?"

The first mane⁴⁴ that ever him an answer mayd,
Yt⁴⁵ was the good lord Persè:
"We wyll not tell the⁴⁶ what men we ar," he says,
"Nor whos men that we be:
But we wyll hount hear in this chays,
In the spyte of thyne, and of thee.

The fattiste hartes in all Chyviat,
We have kyld,⁴⁷ and cast to carry them away"—
"Be my troth," sayd the doughtè Dogglas agayne,
"Ther-for the ton⁴⁸ of us shall de⁴⁹ this day."

Then sayd the doughtè Doglas Unto the lord Persè—
"To kyll all these giltless men Alas! it wear great pittè!"⁵⁰

"But, Persè, thowe⁵¹ art a lord of lande,
I am a yerle⁵² callyd within my contre;⁵³
Let all our men uppone a parti stande;⁵⁴
And do the battell off the and of me."⁵⁵

"Nowe Christes cors⁵⁶ on his crowne," sayd the lord Persè
"Who-soever ther-to says nay;
"Be my troth, doughtè Doglas," he says,
"Thow shalt never se⁵⁷ that day;

"Neithar⁵⁸ in Ynglonde, Skottlonde, nar France,
Nor for no man of a woman born,
But and⁵⁹ fortune be my chance,
I dar met him on man for on."⁶⁰

Then bespayke a squyar⁶¹ off Northombarlonde,
Ric: Wytharynton was his nam;⁶²
"It shall never be told in Sothe-Ynglonde," he says,
"To king Herry the fourth, for sham—"⁶³

I wat⁶⁴ you byn⁶⁵ great lordes twaw,⁶⁶
I am a poor squyar of lande;
I wyll never se my captayne fyght on a fyldè,⁶⁷
And stande my-selfe, and looke on,
But whyll I may my weppone welde,⁶⁸
I wyll not fayl both harte and hande."

The battle was commenced, as usual, by the English archers; whose cloth-yard shafts told fatally upon their enemy, at a distance too great for the employment of other weapons. But the intrepid advance of the Scottish spearmen soon placed them foot to foot with their adversaries; who now threw aside bows and arrows and fought no less valiantly, sword in hand. And now also the heroic leaders encountered each

Old Version.

The Ynglyshhe men let their bowes be,
And palde owt brandes⁶⁹ that wer bright;
It was a hevvy sight to se
Bryght swordes on basuites⁷⁰ lyght.

"That ever did on horsebacke combe,
But if my hap it were,
I durst encounter man for man,
With him to break a spere."

Erle Douglas on his milke-white steede,
Most like a baron bold,
Rode foremost of his company,
Whose armour shone like gold.

"Show me," said hee, "whose men you bee,
That hunt soe boldly heere,
That, without my consent, doe chase
And kill my fallow-deere."

The first man that did answer make,
Was noble Percy hee;
Who sayd, "wee list not to declare,
Nor show whose men wee bee:

"Yet wee will spend our deereest blood,
Thy cheefest hartes to slay."
Then Douglas swore a solempne oathe,
And thus in rage did say,

"Ere thus I will outbraved bee,
One of us two shall dye:
I know thee well, an Erle thou art;
Lord Percy, soe am I.

"But, trust me, Percy, pittye it were,
And great offence to kill
Any of these our guiltlesse men,
For they have done no ill.

"Let thou and I the battell trye,
And set our men aside."
"Accurat bee he," Erle Percy said,
"By whome this is denied."

Then stept a gallant squier forth,
Witherington was his name,
Who sayd, "I wold not have it told
To Henry our king for shame,

"That ere my captaine fought on foote,
And I stood looking on.
You bee two erles," sayd Witherington,
"And I, a squier alone:

"He doe the best that doe I may,
While I have power to stand:
While I have power to weeld my sword,
He fight with hart and hand."

other. A fierce conflict ensues between them; followed by a short breathing time, and what Addison aptly terms "a generous parley." Their discourse is unhappily cut short by an English arrow, which stretches Douglas dead upon the field: and his loss is speedily revenged by the fall of his gallant foe, beneath the spear of Sir Hugh Montgomery.

Later Version.

They closed full fast on every side
Noe slacknes there was found;
And many a gallant gentleman
Lay gasping on the ground.

Thorowe ryche male,⁶¹ and myne-ye-ple⁶²
 Many sterne the stroke⁶³ doune strenght ;

 My landes for years thre,
 For a better man of hart, nare⁸⁸ of hande,
 Was not in all the north countrè."

Off all that se a Skottishe knyght,
 Was callyd Sir Hewe the Mongon-hyrry,
 He sawe the Duglas to the deth was dyght ;⁸⁹
 He spendyd⁹⁰ a spear a truati tre :

He rod⁹² uppon a corsiare⁹³
 Through a hoodrith archery ;
 He never styntyde,⁹⁴ nar never blane,⁹⁵
 Tyll he came to the good lord Persè.

He set uppone the lord Persè
 A dynte,⁹⁶ that was full soare ;

 Then that day slain wear ther.

* Two.

O Christ ! it was a griefe to see,
 And likewise for to heare,
 The cries of men, lying in their gore,
 And scattered here and there.

At last these two stout erles did meet,
 Like captaines of great might :
 Like lyons wood,⁷⁸ they layd on lode,⁷⁹
 And made a cruell fight :

They fought untill they both did sweat,
 With swords of tempered steele ;
 Untill the blood, like drops of rain,
 They trickling downe did feele.

"Yeeld thee, Lord Percy," Douglas sayd ;
 In fayth I will thee bringe,
 Where thou shalt high advanced be
 By James our Scottissh king :

"Thy ransom I will freely give,
 And this report of thee,
 Thou art the most courageous knight,
 That ever I did see."

"Noe, Douglas," quoth Erle Percy then,
 "Thy proffer I doe scorne ;
 I will not yeelde to any Scott,
 That ever yet was borne."

With that, there came an arrow keene
 Out of an English bow,
 Which struck Erle Douglas to the heart
 A deepe and deadlye blow :

Who never spake more words than these,
 "Fight on, my merry men all ;
 For why, my life is at an end ;
 Lord Percy sees my fall."

Then leaving life, Erle Percy tooke
 The dead man by the hand ;
 And said, "Erle Douglas, for thy life
 Wold I had lost my land.

"O Christ ! my very heart doth bleed
 With sorrow for thy sake ;
 For sure, a more redoubted knight
 Mischance cold⁹¹ never take."

A knight amongst the Scotts there was,
 Which saw Erle Douglas die,
 Who streight in wrath did sow revenge
 Upon the Lord Percy :

Sir Hugh Montgomery was he call'd,
 Who with a spere most bright,
 Well mounted on a gallant steed,
 Ran fiercely through the fight ;

And past the English archers all,
 Without all dread or feare ;
 And through Erle Percy's body then
 He thrust his hateful spere ;

With such a vehement force and might
 He did his body gore,
 The staff ran through the other side
 A large cloth-yard, and more.

An archer off Northanberlonde
Say slean¹⁰⁰ was the lord Persè,
He bar a bende-bow¹⁰¹ in his hande,
Was made of trusti tre :

An arow, that a clothe yarde was lang,
To th' hard stele halyde¹⁰² he ;
A dynt, that was both sad and soar,
He sat on Sir Hewe the Mongon-byrry—

The dynt it was both sad and sar,
That he of Mongon-byrry sete ;
The swane-fethars,¹⁰³ that his arrowe bar,
With his hart blood the wear wete.

Mr. Addison says of the thought in the last stanza, that "it was never touched by any other poet, and is such an one as would have shined in Homer or Virgil." The remainder of the ballad is mostly taken up with an enumeration of the nobles and knights slain on either side : but there are two or three particulars worth notice.

The impetuous Witherington made good his

The poet, obviously an Englishman, has not failed to glorify his countrymen. They go into the battle with fifteen hundred men : the Scots with two thousand. Fifty-three Englishmen survive the fight, and only fifty-five of the Scots. But in one point of contrast, it seems to us, that

* It is the swiaw, who wails "in doleful dumpes"—i. e. laments with deep grief.

So thus did both these nobles dye,
Whose courage none could staine ;
An English archer then perceiv'd
The noble erle was slaine ;

He had a bow bent in his hand,
Made of a trusty tree ;

boast at the beginning, and not only fought as long as he could stand, but afterwards. In the old ballad, his obstinate valor is described in appropriate terms : but, in the late version, the language partakes so much of the ludicrous, that Addison feared to expose it to the "little buffoons," who would not "take its beauty"—

Later Version.

"For Witherington, needs must I wayle
As one in doleful dumpes ;*
For when his legs were smitten off,
He fought upon his stumpee."

the author has overshot his mark, and placed the conduct of the Scottish king in a far more attractive light, than the behavior of "King Harry the Fourth." We allude to the speeches of the two monarchs, on receipt of the fatal tidings—

Later Version.

The news was brought to Edden-borrow
Where Scotland's king did raigne,
That brave Erle Douglas suddenlye
Was with an arrow slayne.

"O, heavy newes," king James did say,
"Scotland may witness bee,
I have not any captaine more
Of such account as hee."

Lyke tydings to King Henry came,
Within as short a space,
That Percy of Northumberland
Was slaine in Chevy-Chese :

"Now, God be with him," said our king,
"Sith it will noe better be ;
I trust I have, within my realme,
Five hundred as good as hee ;
Yet shall not Scotta, nor Scotland say,
But I will vengeance take ;
I'll be revenged on them all,
For brave Erle Percy's sake."

The lamentation of King James is a natural and affecting tribute to the memory of his best and bravest subject, thus suddenly cut off in the midst of his usefulness. The false and vain-glorious boast of the English king, and his assumed indifference to the loss of Percy, betray far more of unfeeling arrogance, than of the kingly magnanimity which the poet intended. It is not, however, wholly out of character.

We fear that we have trespassed already too much upon the pages of the present number, to be indulged in making further extracts from the "Reliques." Perhaps we may crave admission for them hereafter.

LINES.

BY MRS. SARAH H. WHITMAN.

"Away, away! Thou speakest of that which in all my earthly life I have not found and shall not find."

Jean Paul.

I bade thee stay. Too well I know
The fault was mine, mine only;
I dared not think upon the past
All desolate and lonely.

I know not if my soul could bear
In absence to regret thee,
To strive alone with its despair,
Still seeking to forget thee.

Yet go—ah go! those pleading eyes,
Those wild, sweet tones appealing
From heart to heart, ah! dare I trust
That passionate revealing?

For ah, those dark and pleading eyes
Invoke too keen a sorrow—
A pang that will not pass away
With thy light vows to-morrow.

A love immortal and divine
Within my heart is waking—
A dream of passion and despair
It owns not but in breaking.

THE CAPTAIN'S STORY.

A PENINSULAR ADVENTURE.

In the neighborhood of the Haymarket, London, there are several minor chess, whist, and gossip clubs, held principally at cafés, in an apartment which, for club evenings, is sacred to the members, consisting chiefly of superannuated clerks, actors, and other professional mediocrities, with a sprinkling of substantial, steady tradesmen. In one of these modest gatherings, Captain Smith, an extremely communicative and anecdotal gentleman, may occasionally be met with, surrounded by an attentive circle of admiring friends, listening, with all their ears, to one of the many marvellous adventures it has been his lot to encounter during a wandering and varied life. He is not a frequent visitor; his tastes inclining him to scenes of more boisterous conviviality than cigars and coffee, with a seasoning of theatrical and political gossip, can afford or supply; and he accordingly uses these, to him hum-drum assemblies, only as resting-places between more exciting orgies; valuable chiefly for affording him listeners, much more easily amused and astonished than men of larger life-adventure and experience. He is, however, a real captain, and I fancy something of a hero too, in the conventional use of the term, as he seems to have very different, and, I believe, much truer notions of war and glory, than gentlemen who shout about "bright swords," and dilate with a periphrastic unction of "red battle-fields." A lithe, active man is he; and stiff as a ram-rod withal. His harsh, stubby hair, is brushed in one particular direction with parade precision; and his high, bald forehead, when in convivial mood, glistens as brightly as his sharp, gray eyes; which, one can see with half a one, have been wide open all his life. He rose, it is understood, though he never mentions it himself—perhaps from a feeling of modesty, a quality, albeit, in which, like most field heroes, he is somewhat deficient—from the ranks. From his perfect knowledge of the Spanish tongue, (he passed his youth at Gibraltar, with occasional trips to the Spanish coast with his father, who turned an honest penny in the smuggling line,) he was frequently employed during the Peninsular war by the British commanders in the very necessary, but extremely ticklish, duty of making himself personally acquainted with the state of the French camps and fortresses—in other words, as a spy; an exceedingly uncomfortable office for any gentleman troubled with “nerves.” Captain Smith frequently thanks God that he never had any, to his knowledge, in his life; no more, he sometimes says, after reading the debates—no more than a member of parliament.

Thus much premised, suppose we step in for a minute, and make his acquaintance. That is the captain with his back to the fire. The gentleman who has just handed him a cigar, and is addressing such martial queries to the old campaigner, is a neighboring haberdasher. Just before we entered, he inquired, as is his nightly wont, if the waiter was sure the clock was quite right. He is always a little nervous about the time, as his spouse is apt to be unpleasantly lively for a lady of her colloquial and other prowess, if he is not at home at half-past ten precisely. He loves peace “at home,” as much as he seems to delight in war “abroad,” and is consequently extremely punctual. But see, Tape is tapping the captain again. The veteran cannot fail to flow forth presently; at first, perhaps, a little jerkily—glug, glug, glug—but after a little coaxing, in the freest, easiest style imaginable.

“A splendid march, Captain Smith, that of Wellington upon Ciudad Rodrigo?”

“Sloppy, Mr. Tape, sloppy; nothing but mud, and snow, and slush. Winter-time; I remember it well,” replied Captain Smith.

“Beautiful account Napier gives of it,” rejoined the martial Tape. “Wellington,” he says, “jumped on the devoted fortress with both his feet!”

“Does Napier say that?” demanded the veteran, knocking the consumed ashes off the end of his cigar on the mantelpiece. “Does Napier say that?”

“Yes indeed he does.”

“Then Napier tells what is —,” replied the matter-of-fact captain. “The lightest, longest-legged of the ‘Light Bobs’ could’nt have done it, much less the duke. The duke’s short in the legs—sits high in the saddle, though—long body, dumpy legs. Could no more do it than he could fly; did’nt try either. All a flam!”

Mr. Tape explained that the jumping was metaphorical; and, after a time, Captain Smith seemed to have acquired a misty notion of what was meant. Still, it was, he said, a very bad way of writing “history;” which species of composition should, he emphatically observed, be all facts, and no mistakes.

“The retreat from Burgos was a masterly affair,” persisted warrior Tape; “masterly indeed—uncommon!”

“I dare say it was; and as you seem to admire it so much, I wish you had been one of the ‘prentices under the master, just to see how it was done, and how agreeable and pleasant such a masterly job is to the people that do the work. I was one of them; and I declare to you I had much rather have been in this café, smoking this abominable cigar, which wont smoke”—and the captain threw the unsatisfactory weed into the fire; immediately, however, accepting another from the ready hand of the obsequious Tape. That, fortunately, drew uncommonly well; the spiral columns ascended with the fulness and freedom in which the veteran loved to luxuriate. He swallowed his demi-tasse at a gulp; and his sharp, gray eyes twinkling with fresh lustre, said—“It was in coming from Burgos that I got into one of the miserablist scrapes I ever experienced in my life; and all owing to my tender-heartedness, the very worst thing for a campaign a man can carry about him.”

“Tell us, captain! What was it? How was it?” cried half a dozen voices. Two elderly gentlemen, who had been playing draughts for the previous four or five hours, finding it impossible, amidst so much clamor, to bestow the requisite attention on their extremely intellectual game, also drew near to listen, as the very best thing, after draughts, they could do.

Captain Smith smiled graciously, seated himself, indulged in a few prefatory whiffs, and proceeded. “During the many journeys I at different times made through the province of Leon in Spain, I fell in with a very worthy couple, whom I took a great liking to. Pedro Davila was by trade a cooper; he made all the casks and tubs for miles round the little town near which he lived; which was situated, I should tell you, a good deal out of the direct road, or rather the nearest road—for there is nothing very direct in that country—from Burgos to Asterga. For my part I preferred round-about ways at that time to straight ones; I found them safer. Pedro had a nice garden too, beautifully cultivated, and the prettiest little black-eyed Andalusian wife—Pedro was also a native of the south of Spain—a man’s eyes ever lighted upon. Pedro, in his youth, had taken service with a Spanish grandee, who being compelled to fly his country—a common, every-day thing abroad—took up his abode in Paris; and there Pedro got rid of his fine old constitutional prejudices against foreigners, and obtained in exchange some modern universal philanthropy—about the most dangerous article to go to market with in Spain it is possible to imagine. And sure I am that if Pedro had known what a dreadful mess his turning philosopher would get me into, to say nothing of his wife, he was far too good a fellow to have done any thing of the sort."

"But what on earth, Captain Smith," interrupted Tape, "could philosophy, Pedro's, or any one's else, have to do with you?"

"You will hear, Tape: it was his liberal-mindedness and my tender-heartedness joined together, that played the mischief with us both. An excellent fellow, notwithstanding," continued the captain, after a brief pause, "was Pedro Davila, too good for a Spaniard, much; one could hardly believe it of him. I was going to say he was equal to an Englishman, but that, perhaps, would be pushing it too far. Many a skin of wine have we emptied together; none of the sloe stuff you get here, but the genuine juice of the grape itself." The captain smacked his lips at the pleasing reminiscence, and then, to reward them for the exercise, imbibed a portion of another demi-tasse, craftily qualified to his taste.

"At the time I speak of, it was highly dangerous to harbor, succor or conceal any Frenchman, woman or child. Death, or worse punishment, was pretty sure to be the doom of any one offending against that law of vengeance; and it happened that one of the most ferocious of minor guerilla leaders, a relentless hunter and slayer of miserable fugitives, was Ramez, a native of the village or town near which Pedro lived. He was seldom long absent from home; and was, in fact, the real governor of the place.

"Well, it chanced one unfortunate day, that a wounded French officer, who had been chased for several days by Ramez and his fellows, crawled into Pedro's cottage, and implored shelter and succor. His request was, as you may anticipate, after what I have told you of Pedro's notions of philosophy, granted; and the hunted man was successfully concealed, carefully tended, and restored to health. The day of his departure had arrived; he was carefully disguised, mounted on Pedro's mule, and was just bidding his benefactor good-bye at the garden gate, (Marietta, fortunately, as it turned out, was not at home,) when who should poke up his diabolical snout from the other side of the hedge but Ramez! The ugliest rascal, gentlemen," continued Captain Smith, with violent emphasis, "the most ill-favored scoundrel I ever saw in my life was Ramez: and that from a man who has been twenty years in the army, and who has lived upwards of twenty in London, is saying a great deal."

This was quite cheerfully assented to. The ugliness that after such a lengthened and first-rate experience bore off the palm, was pronounced necessarily incomparable by the entire auditory.

"He gave poor Pedro," continued the captain, "one most diabolical look, (I'll be bound the streaks from his eyes—he always squinted both sides inwards when he was in a passion—crossed each other within an inch of his nose,) then rushed forward, and bawled lustily for help. The Frenchman spurred furiously into the adjoining forest and escaped. Pedro was seized, and the alpha and the omega of it, as the chaplain of the old half-hundredth used to say, was, that he was lugged to prison, tried a few hours afterwards, and condemned to death as a traitor. It was a wild time then: most places managed their own affairs their own way, and this was master Ramez and the alcalde's way. Pedro was to have been strangled, gavotted they call it, but there was no apparatus handy, and nobody that particularly liked the job; so, as a particular heavenly grace to him, the alcalde said, it was determined he should be shot on the third day after his arrest."

"It happened," resumed the captain, after again refreshing himself, "that I was, on the very day after Pedro's arrest and condemnation, returning from Burgos to General Picton's headquarters, a good way beyond Astorga; and being near, and in no very particular hurry, I turned out of my road to visit Pedro. When I arrived at the cottage, I found things, as you may suppose, in a very different state from what I had been imagining for the last hour or so. Instead of wine, there was hysterics; and for an omelette and salad, shrieks and faintings. Marietta clung round my neck with tremendous energy—I should not have thought, if I had not experienced it, that a pretty woman's embrace could have been so very unpleasant—frantically beseeching me to send for the British army to liberate her Pedro. Extricating myself from her grasp as speedily as possible, I began to cast about in my mind as to what could be done; but I could not at all clear up my ideas. Remembering that I never had been able to do so on a lean stomach, I suggested that we should first dine, and then perhaps I might hit upon something for poor Pedro's benefit. Marietta agreed with me; and we had, considering that her husband and my dearest friend was to be shot the day after the next, a very nice, comfortable dinner indeed—very—and some capital wine afterwards; and then, gentlemen, the father of mischief, or the wine, or Marietta's black eyes, I don't know which, perhaps all together, induced me to make as spoony a proposal as ever fell from the lips of a green cockney."

"There are clever, sensible men in the city," interjected Tape, as the Captain paused an instant to supply a himself with a fresh cigar.

"Perhaps so, Mr. Tape, but those gentlemen seldom volunteer into the army, I believe. I knew," said the veteran, continuing his narrative, "that I might as well whistle jigs to a milestone, and expect it to get up and turn partners, as ask the general in command of the division, about forty miles off, to rescue Pedro from the grasp of the Spanish authorities. The British generals never meddled with the administration of Spanish justice under any pretence whatever; but I also knew that if he received a message stating that I was in danger, he was bound by general orders to afford me every assistance in his power. 'Marietta,' said I at last—the wine must have been unusually strong—I have hit upon it. We'll save Pedro yet, in spite of them all!" The pretty creature jumped up, clapped her hands, and sobbing, laughing, and talking, all in a breath, exclaimed, 'Dear Ingleso, I knew you would!' 'You, Marietta,' said I, as soon as she was sufficiently calm to listen, 'go to Ramez and the alcalde, and tell them you will deliver into their hands the famous Afrancesado spy, Henriquez Bajol, on condition of their releasing Pedro. If they consent denounce me.' 'You, Henriquez?' said she, starting bewilderedly. 'Never you mind,' I replied. 'A note to General Picton—I'll write it at once—will soon get me out of their clutches, whoever I am.' I wrote the note and gave it her. 'Now mind, Marietta,' said I solemnly, 'that Pedro sets off with this note the instant he is liberated. How soon can he reach the General on foot?' 'By to-morrow night,' she answered. 'Very well; and now then about it at once.' She was off in a twinkling, and I was at leisure to reflect on what I had done. To tell the truth, I did not, after a few minutes' quiet cogitation, feel excessively comfortable. They would be certain to believe the story; Henriquez being, I was sure, known to none of them personally. I was a precious deal more like a Spaniard than an Englishman; and I spoke the language so well—not altogether grammatically, it is true, but so like a native of the south of Spain—that I felt I should have some difficulty, should occasion require it, to undeceive them. Then they had such a pestilent way of making not only sure, but short work with whoever they suspected of commerce with the hated French, that it flashed unpleasantly across my mind—the General's help might perhaps arrive too late! However, I was in for it; and so, taking another glass of wine, and re-filling my pipe—there's great philosophy in a pipe, as we all know—I awaited the result of my charming scheme as calmly as I could.

"It was not long coming. About half an hour after Marietta's departure, the door was slammed open, and I found myself sprawling and kicking, or rather sprawling and trying to kick, for they wouldn't let me, in the arms of five or six ugly rascals, who, showering upon me all the time the vilest abuse, hurried me off to prison. Into it they thrust me like a dog; and there, when I could recover breath and speech, I greeted Pedro, my fellow-prisoner. The alcalde and Ramez had only promised to release him, and, of course, when the object was gained, refused to abide by the bargain. If I had not been the most consummate ass that ever browsed or brayed, I might have guessed as much. Ramez had now two victims, and that promised a double holiday.

"Well, gentlemen, this was, you may suppose, a very unpleasant situation to find myself in; but as, thank Heaven, I was never much troubled with nerves, I did not so much mind it after a bit. Marietta, I was sure, would be off to the general with her best speed when she saw the ugly turn matters were taking: so that if my captors were not in a very patriotic hurry indeed, there was a chance on the cards yet. Pedro obtained some cigars of the jailor, an old acquaintance of his; they were first-rate, and we both became gradually calm and composed. Ah, gentlemen, I have often thought that if the moral observations I addressed that evening to my friend Pedro, upon the duty of respecting national prejudices, particularly with regard to sheltering wounded foreigners, and the shocking folly of making rash engagements with young women, especially after dinner, had been taken down by a short-hand writer, they would have raised me to the next rank after Solomon!"

"No doubt of it," said Tape, looking nervously at the clock; "but do get on, captain; don't stop, don't!"

"I will not, Tape; but don't you hurry me as they did. Well, the next day I was dragged before the alcalde and that rascal Ramez, where, to my very great and most unpleasant surprise, two men, guerilla soldiers, swore that they had frequently seen me in communication with the French outposts, and that they verily believed me to be no other than the infamous Henriquez. Vainly I protested, finding the thing was getting much too serious, that I was an English officer; my assertions were laughed at, and I was reconveyed to my dungeon, after having heard myself sentenced to be shot at the same hour which was to see the last of Pedro. Mr. Tape, please to touch the bell. I'll take another cup; for my tongue always feels dry and hot when I come to this part of the story."

Mr. Tape did as he was desired, quickly, and bade the waiter who answered the summons "jump about." The anxious haberdasher had but just three minutes to spare.

"That, gentlemen," continued the captain, "was a very uncomfortable night. I was never, from a child, particularly fond of water-drinking; but I remember crawling off the straw many times during the night, and almost emptying both pitchers. At ten o'clock we were to suffer, to be shot to death by half a dozen rusty muskets. It was dreadfully aggravating! Day dawned at last; six, seven, eight, nine, ten o'clock tinkled through the jail; the door opened, and in stalked Ramez and the alcalde, followed by the rusty shooting-party. We were politely informed that 'time' was up, and that we must both come to the scratch at once, as the spectators didn't like to be kept waiting. They then kindly pinioned us, and away we marched. You never, perhaps, walked in your own funeral procession, Tape, did you?"

"Lord, Captain Smith, how can you ask such a horrid question?"

"Well, if you ever should, you'll remember it, that's all. Seeing King Lear is nothing to it, though that's reckoning pretty deep. On we marched, the priests praying, the bells tolling, and the infernal musket-men eyeing us as if to make up their minds exactly where to have the pleasure of hitting us. One scoundrel, with a short, ugly snub of an apology of a nose, meant, I could see, to send his bullet through my Roman. Altogether, it was the most disagreeable walk I ever took in my life. We soon arrived at the place of sacrifice, and were ordered to kneel down. 'Pedro,' said I, 'that jewel of a wife of yours has played us a sweet trick; but perhaps she'll arrive in time, if she comes at all, to return thanks for all the good things we are about to receive; and that's a consolation anyway.' I then took another look in the direction in which the expected succor ought to appear, when I saw, and tried to rub my eyes with my elbows to make sure I saw, but couldn't, a horsewoman on a summit of the hill; it was Marietta! I roared out like a raging bull, and Pedro gave chorus. As soon as Marietta caught sight of what was going on, she curbed her horse sharply back, and beckoned with eager gestures over the hill. A minute afterwards the ridge was crowned by half a regiment of British dragoons. The instant they saw us they gave one loud cheer and came on like a whirlwind.

"A narrow escape, Smith!" said the commanding officer. "But come, mount at once. There is a large French force in the neighborhood, and the general's orders are not to halt an instant.' I was delighted to hear it. The less said was, I felt, the soonest mended. If the general, thought I, were informed why he had been put to this trouble and risk, our meeting would scarcely be a very amicable one. 'Who is this?' said the officer, pointing to Pedro, who, though he had hallooed lustily was by no means out of the wood. 'One of ours,' I boldly replied. 'Then mount, my good fellow, at once,' replied he, motioning to one of the led horses. Pedro understood the gesture, though he didn't the language; and giving Marietta, who had unpinioned him, one hug, was in the saddle in a jiffy. 'Out of the way,' cried the commanding officer to the alcalde, who, instigated by Ramez, was approaching to claim Pedro at least as lawful prize. 'Out of the way, fellow!' and he struck him sharply with the flat of his sword. The frightened functionary tumbled out of our path; the bugle sounded and we were off safe, sound, and merry."

"Bravo!—Hurra!—Hurra!" resounded in irregular chorus through the room. Tape was off like a shot; the unfortunate man was full seven minutes behind his time.

"Gentlemen," said Captain Smith, after the applause had subsided, "do not, if you please, forget the moral of my story. Everything, the chaplain used to say, has a useful moral—even short rations—though I never could agree with him to that extent. The moral of this adventure I take to be this—Never, under any circumstances, assume to be what you are not; for if shot or hanged in a wrong character, you will never be able to amend the 'errors of description.'"

TO ONE SLEEPING.

Sleep on! thy meek and thoughtful brow
Is free from care and sorrow now,
And weareth not
The traces of the frequent tear,
And pain, and weariness, which here
Have been thy lot.

Sleep on! for ever in thy dream
The lost ones, whom thou lovest seem
Again to stand
Close by thy side, and round thee press
With looks of love and tenderness,
A spirit band.

Sleep on! for here on earth no more
Shalt thou find love, like that of yore.
When thou didst give
Thy heart's affection, not in vain,
To him with whom thou seem'st again
In dreams to live.

The little one, who from its rest
On thine, has passed to Jesus' breast
In peace to dwell,
Is with thee, lovelier than when thou
In meek submissiveness did'st bow,
And say—"Tis well."

Sleep on! for oft the spirit seems
To pass from earth, and catch bright gleams
Of hidden things;
Hears voices from the better land,
And earthly slumberers are fanned
By angel wings.

"He giveth his Beloved sleep;"
Oh, then dream on, nor waking weep
When dreams they prove;
These holy visionings are given
As foretastes of the promised Heaven
Prepared above!

Boston, Mass.

IDIOCY IN MASSACHUSETTS.

We perused with interest a communication in the February No. of the Southern Literary Messenger with regard to the "Education of Idiots," containing interesting extracts from letters of Dr. Conolly and Mr. Sumner concerning the condition of this unfortunate class of beings in the institutions established in Europe for their relief, and it was not without some feeling of pride in the reputation acquired by our ancestral State that we read the following sentence of the conclusion of the article to which we refer—"we do not know, but we will lay any wager, even 'our dukedom to a beggarly denier' that Massachusetts has done something decided, something generous upon this subject before now!"

Through some delay in the reception of our Nos. of the Messenger, the communication of which we speak has but recently met our eye, or we should sooner have replied to it, for it has been both our duty and our pleasure to procure such information as we might with regard to the degree of attention which this subject has received from the Legislature of Massachusetts, happy, if through our humble efforts, a wider sympathy may be created in behalf of these sorely-stricken ones, and if the example of our own State may impel sister-states to exertion in their cause.

Through the kindness of Dr. S. G. Howe, Principal of the Perkins Institute for the Blind, at South Boston, a gentleman whose philanthropic exertions are too well known to need comment here, we have been furnished with works* from which is derived the information which we present to the correspondents and readers of the Messenger.

"Strange," says Dr. H. in an article on this subject in the Massachusetts Quarterly, "strange how men reading the lessons of the past can be heedless of the cries and demands of humanity in the present! but so it ever is. Nobility in his saddle, Aristocracy in his coach, Respectability in his gig, Property in his counting-room, Propriety in his pew, ever have, and still do cry—"Peace be still!" when the poor and lowly strive to struggle up a step higher upon the platform of humanity. The foremost countries of the world (and Massachusetts is one of them) are, however, beginning to heed the warning of the past and the threatening of the future. Some of the claims of the poorer classes are beginning to be understood, and granted, though still too much as boons, rather than rights. The time was when colleges were considered all that was necessary for national education; the time has come when the common school is considered still more necessary; and the time is at hand when universities for the rich alone shall dwindle into insignificance compared with the vast machinery which shall be put in operation for the education of the children of the poorest citizens. The pay of the dismissed soldier, and the honor now paid to his tawdry tinsel shall go to encourage and elevate the teacher, and the hulks of navies shall be left to rot, that the school-house may be built up and adorned. In the way, too, of what is called charity, but which should be called religion and duty, we are advancing. The time was when deformed children were exposed and left to perish; a Sayge-tus and Eurotas were everywhere at hand for those who could not be reared to beauty and strength, but now the more deformed they are the more solicitude is manifested in their behalf. The sick are gathered into hospitals, the dumb are taught to speak, the blind to read, the insane to reason, and at last the poor idiot is welcomed into the human family."
